O&M gets account; ads to feature trustee

By Jennifer Lawrence

Martin Shugrue, the court-appointed "savior" for financially troubled Eastern Airlines, is planning to become the next Lee Iacocca.

The first Eastern ads from new agency Ogilvy & Mather, picked last week to handle the $45 million account, will feature Mr. Shugrue, who unceremoniously dumped Lintas:New York as the airline's agency.

Within two weeks, the court-appointed trustee will become familiar to consumers through TV commercials and print ads that portray him as a corporate rescuer/healer.

Mr. Shugrue, 49, will follow a flight plan loosely fashioned after Mr. Iacocca's celebrated turnaround of Chrysler Corp. that was helped by an early 1980s federal loan guarantee and his own appearances as a corporate spokesman.

Last week, an ad headlined "An open letter from Martin R. Shugrue" appeared in several East Coast editions of national newspapers. The ad outlined his goals for Eastern.

Mr. Shugrue initiated the ad himself, sources said, without creative help from Lintas.

His task is to guide through Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings what one insider called the "most whipsawed company in corporate America." A bankruptcy judge last month took control of the company from Texas Air Corp. Chairman Frank Lorenzo.

One agency source involved in developing the new marketing strategy said Eastern will focus on a new corporate sensitivity—to consumers, labor unions and employees. Advertising will suggest that Mr. Shugrue is no Frank Lorenzo, who fought his airline's unions and failed to manage Eastern to the satisfaction of the bankruptcy court.

Shortly after his own appearance in ads, Mr. Shugrue will share the ad limelight with employees, at least according to initial plans.

N.Y. drops PR, magazine tax

ALBANY, N.Y.—Public relations and magazine executives sighed with relief and applauded their own lobbying efforts last week after the Legislature abandoned a proposal to extend the 4% state sales tax to their industries. Several companies in both fields had threatened to move their operations if the plan were approved.

"We're relieved, but on the other hand we're appalled that it ever got to this stage," said Donald Durgin, vice chairman at Newsweek and one of a group of magazine executives who traveled to Albany to lobby lawmakers.

"We made a strong case, and thankfully they recognized that," said Donald Kummerfeld, president of the Magazine Publishers of America.

"I really think we made a difference," said David Bicofsky, president of the Public Relations Society of America's New York chapter.

But some industry officials said they won't be certain the proposal is dead until the budget bill is formally published and voted on. A final draft of the overdue budget is expected this week.

Saatchi stock down

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s share price fell after Havas, Paris, rumored to be planning a bid for Saatchi, issued a statement May 10 saying it's wary of major acquisitions of international ad agencies. Saatchi stock, which

HHCC aims to stem trouble on coasts

By Cleveland Horton and Pat Sloan

Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos is shaking up its West Coast office, attempting to steer Infiniti back on course.

At the same time, there are rumblings around its Boston headquarters that all's not well with new client Reebok International.

Hill Holliday today is expected to announce that Charles J. Kushell IV will be recalled to Boston from the Marina del Rey, Calif., office, which created the "rocks and trees" campaign for the upscale car unit of Nissan Motor Sales USA.

Mr. Kushell, exec VP-managing director of that office, will take on the corporate position of exec VP-director of corporate development. Officially assuming his new responsibilities on June 11, Mr. Kushell will assist Jack Sansolo, U.S. president, in finding a new managing director for the California office.

Earlier this month, the agency abruptly dismissed John W. Palmer, the senior VP-management supervisor who headed up Infiniti's national advertising account team. Walter A. Verbanic was named to replace him.

Mr. Verbanic, 43, came from Grey Advertising's Cypress, Calif., office, where as senior VP-management supervisor he managed the Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America account.

This reorganization follows the departure earlier this year of Exec VP-Creative Director Don Easdon. He was succeeded by Dan Mountain, formerly with Hal Riney & Partners, who created the current product-oriented campaign for Infiniti.

Infiniti plans to continue running similar advertising through the end of this year, said David Hubbard, Infiniti national advertising manager.

On the East Coast, there have been rumblings that Hill Holliday may be having some problems with the Reebok account.

Reebok plans to screen its new spot featuring celebrity endorser Madonna at its June sales meeting in Hawaii, but no creative has been produced yet. Reebok last week approved two Hill Holliday creative ideas for the account, including at least one Madonna execution.

But the Madonna creative still must be approved by the singer. Until she approves advertising, her Reebok agreement isn't finalized, sources say.

Some sources said the account is safe and that Reebok Chairman Paul Fireman is just being tough on Hill Holliday.

One source said the agency might be in danger of losing the account, but others said the account is safe and that Reebok Chairman Paul Fireman is just being tough on Hill Holliday, nixing all except one or two of its ideas for ads.

"Paul is being Paul . . . and working them over now that they have the account," noted one source close to the company. "But [Hill Holliday] will do whatever it takes to keep the business."

Both Reebok and Hill Holliday management denied there's any trouble between them.

Jack Connors, president-ceo of the agency, described Hill Holliday's relationship with Reebok as "spectacular" and said there are no problems handling the account.

Likewise, Mr. Sansolo and Infiniti executives said their relationship is firm despite the persistent rumors to the contrary, fueled by rapid reversals in creative strategy and the agency management changes.

Hill Holliday "was never out of our good graces," Mr. Hubbard said of Infiniti. "They're not in any jeopardy" of losing the account.

When asked last week about Mr. Kushell's reassignment, Mr. Hubbard said he was unaware of it.

The changes in the West come as Infiniti and Hill Holliday are in the midst of market planning for the fall. Mr. Sansolo characterized the timing of Mr. Kushell's appointment as "perfect." He's replacing Susan Smith, who recently was named managing director of the agency's New York shop.

Mr. Sansolo added he's been spending time in the West Coast office to assist on the Infiniti account for several months.

Infiniti sales, though improving, still trail rival Lexus, the upscale division of Toyota Motor Sales USA. In April, Infiniti sold 1,661 cars, compared with Lexus' 5,117.

Infiniti has never revealed its internal sales projections but insists its goal is nowhere near Lexus' projected first-year sales of 60,000 vehicles.

Infiniti dealers seem pleased with the new direction of the TV campaign, which uses a more conventional approach than the launch effort.

For Reebok, Mr. Connors said Hill Holliday is in preproduction on two spots and some of the material tested in focus groups is being produced.

He also noted that the agency is "working out a situation where Bill Heater will be actively involved with Hill Holliday" in what he described as an active part-time consulting role on unspecified Boston-office accounts, believed to include Reebok.

Mr. Heater is a former exec VP-creative director at Hill Holliday who resigned late last year but

DMB&B eyes Mars

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles is trying to get some satisfaction from Mars Inc., which is getting its own satisfaction from the Rolling Stones.

Already handling much of Mars' pet foods internationally, D'Arcy is making presentations for the $20 million Whiskas domestic cat food account, sources say. The account is now at Backer Spielvogel Bates.

D'Arcy already handles several M&M/Mars candy products in the U.S. and abroad, and has also pitched the Snickers account, another $20 million brand at Backer.

Sources close to secretive Mars say it's unlikely the company would move the Snickers business because it recently paid nearly $2 million for the worldwide rights to the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction."

Backer is producing commercials using the song in London, and they're expected to air in the U.S. later this year.

Mars is much more likely to ness, sources say, because it has a longstanding policy of keeping more than one agency involved in major lines of business.

John D. Murray, VP-marketing and sales at Kal Kan Foods, which makes Whiskas, said Kal Kan has no plans to shift any business away from Backer.

"We have no intention of moving from BSB," Mr. Murray said. "There is absolutely no question of changing the agency."

But others sources aren't so sure that's true.

D'Arcy had handled Crave cat food until it was renamed Whiskas in 1988 and the assignment was consolidated at Backer, which already handled several other pet food brands. At the time, Mars insisted Kal Kan Foods give D'Arcy an opportunity to repitch the business after a period of time.

"Backer has to be 25% better than D'Arcy to hold onto the business, because all things being equal, they'd rather have more than one agency," said one executive close to Mars. "That's not going to be easy to do."

Last week, Kal Kan broke a new Backer campaign for Whiskas using the theme, "The world's most preferred food for cats." The spots feature celebrity cat owners Marlee Matlin, the Oscar-winning actress, and Mike Singletary, the Chicago Bears linebacker.

Backer also handles Sheba cat food and Kal Kan Pedigree dog food in the U.S. for Mars.

Mars had set no timetable for deciding on whether to reassign its pet food brands, sources say.

"That company moves like a glacier usually," said an executive who formerly worked for a Mars agency.

Executives at D'Arcy and Backer declined comment.

Mars is also believed to be concerned about reports that former Ted Bates Worldwide Chairman Robert Jacoby might try to buy Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide from parent Saatchi & Saatchi Co., London, and earlier reports of Backer Chairman Carl Spielvogel's offer to purchase his agency. □

Tough times for ad spending

National advertising index

The McCann-Erickson national advertising indexes are key barometers of the month-to-month changes in national advertising spending. These indexes are seasonally adjusted measures of the monthly advertising revenues for the major national media. The general index is a composite of network TV, spot TV, magazines and newspaper expenditures by national advertisers.

Advertising's re-expansion is still on hold.

A significant upturn in ad spending was expected to appear at the end of last year, leading into better trends for 1990. The strong network TV upfront sales market in mid-'89 was considered to be a leading indicator of improving growth.

But now that the final figures for the closing months of 1989 are on the record, it's apparent better times will be temporarily delayed. It's inevitable, however, that re-expansion will arrive once economic uncertainties diminish.

Fourth-quarter 1989 network prime-time ad sales were very strong, but the increases in other dayparts were disappointing. A number of other media also experienced weaker than expected ad growth in the closing months of '89. U.S. economic growth slowed considerably in the quarter, and it's now clear the expected strong surge in 1990 ad growth is on hold.

The final figures for 1989 add up to a 5% growth in advertising compared with nominal gross national product growth of 7.2%. The 1990 economy is in the doldrums, and the poor economic performance in the closing months of last year has led to even tighter budget controls so far this year.

The consensus forecast for 1990 GNP growth is 6%. Back in December, we expected a 6% growth in ad spending in 1990, but current trends suggest this forecast may be difficult to attain.

We now expect U.S. ad expenditures to rise somewhere between 5% and 6% in 1990.

U.S. ad expenditures should exceed $130 billion this year, but they're not likely to surpass the $132 billion mark we forecast in December.

Nevertheless, there are signs that many national marketers are gradually re-expanding the role of traditional advertising in their marketing activities.

Final 1989 figures

The final 1989 ad spending total was $123.9 billion. The 5% gain just beat inflation, which, as measured by the U.S. Consumer Price Index, was 4.8%.

We expected a slowdown in ad growth last year because it was a post-Olympic year. Few could

Agency employment decline continues

By Gary Levin and Jon Lafayette

The top 10 U.S. agency employers dropped 80 people from their payrolls in a recent six-month period, continuing a long-term downsizing trend, according to the latest Advertising Age survey of agency employment trends.

Advertising-related jobs with the top 10 employers fell 0.4% to 21,438 as of April 1, after an average 1% gain reported as of Oct. 1.

Seven of the agencies, including five in New York and two in Chicago, reported minor staff reductions averaging less than 1%.

Lintas:USA and Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide said their U.S. staffs grew slightly, while Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising reported no change (see chart). Lintas became the seventh-largest employer, switching places with D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles.

DMB&B/USA President Clayton Wilhite said he's "holding the line pretty closely" on staffing, in part due to increased compensation pressures from clients.

Mr. Wilhite said most clients have adjusted to the fact that lower compensation often means less staffing, but "there are clients who, when faced with the explanation we offer, express some surprise."

Other shops expressed the same sentiment.

"We're obviously trying to become more productive, cutting down on corporate overhead and reducing support staffs around the world through attrition and minor layoffs," said Graham Phillips, chairman-ceo of Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide.

"We're trying to get more efficient, be more productive," said Edward Wax, chairman-ceo at Saatchi & Saatchi North America. "When someone leaves, hiring a replacement is not automatic. We want people to justify hiring someone to fill the spot."

But he said he gets few client complaints about reduced staffing.

"I don't think clients count people, they look at the quality of service," Mr. Wax said. "If the work's good, we've got no problem."

Despite an average 1% increase reported as of Oct. 1 (AA, Nov. 13), the long-term trend continues downward and isn't expected to reverse.

The American Association of Advertising Agencies said the average number of employees per million dollars in billings—a long-standing benchmark of productivity—dropped to 1.73 in 1988 from 2.37 in 1984, the last year before major agency mergers began.

In these uncertain times, many agencies are concentrating on upgrading their staffs, not simply expanding them.

"We're not going to find ourselves in the position in the next year or two of adding talent in terms of numbers," said Ronald Burns, ceo of J. Walter Thompson Co.'s North American unit. "What we're talking about is adding quality in terms of the numbers we have." □

Chiat wins work in Minneapolis

MINNEAPOLIS—Speculation that Chiat/Day/Mojo will expand its office here to full-service status could grow with the agency's recent win of the $1 million-plus Ringer Corp. natural lawn and garden products account.

"You never know, but you can't read that [full-service status] out of the acquisition of a single account," said Tom McElligott, exec VP-executive creative director.

Ringer, based in Eden Prairie, Minn., is the first Twin Cities client to land at Chiat since Mr. McElligott opened the office in January (AA, Jan. 22).

Mr. McElligott said he will manage Ringer's creative work from here; account work will be handled from Toronto, led by Tony Wright, VP-director of account management. Slater Hanft Martin, New York, previously handled.

Mr. McElligott added that he's closely involved with creative work for the Calvin Klein Eternity and Obsession fragrances. □

Anti-inflation plan hits ad spending

By Julia Michaels

SAO PAULO—Brazil's largest ad agencies, including U.S.-based multinationals, are reducing staff and other expenses to adapt to marketers' massive ad spending cutbacks.

Ad executives here say the prognosis isn't good for the industry as marketers respond to newly installed President Fernando Collor de Mello's plan to curb Brazil's 1,765% inflation rate.

Large agencies have seen billings drop an average of about 35% since the plan went into effect in March, said Paulo Salles, co-founder of Salles/Inter-Americana.

The government has frozen corporate and individual investments and savings for at least 18 months.

Real estate, automobile, computer and sportswear companies have stopped most advertising, and cigarette marketers have cut back spending as well.

"Ad spending has been almost zero in the past 30 days," said Carlos Eduardo Jardim, R.J. Reynolds Tabacos do Brasil corporate spokesman.

Many advertisers, including Gessy Lever, reacted to the inflation-fighting plan by immediately stopping short-term ad spending plans. And though several food, electronics, retail and personal hygiene marketers are gradually resuming TV commercials, even those companies are spending just a fraction of their original ad budgets.

"Economists say the [gross national product] will shrink 10% to 15% this year, and I think the ad industry will follow suit," said Luiz Celso de Piratininga, president of the Brazilian Association of Advertising Agencies.

"Economists say the [gross national product] will shrink 10% to 15% this year, and I think the ad industry will follow suit."

Brazil's agencies billed around $2.5 billion last year, but he estimates that will drop to $2.1 billion to $2.2 billion in 1990.

The ad spending cuts have had "an adverse effect on our company financially; it's hurt us in that marketplace," said Peter Schweitzer, New York-based vice chairman-agency operations at J. Walter Thompson Co.

"We hope we're going to be out of it by the end of the year," Mr. Schweitzer added. "We have no intention of pulling out of the country."

The agency laid off 20 to 25 people from its offices here and in Rio de Janeiro; 332 staffers remain.

"Our revised [second-quarter] billings [estimates] are 30% under budget," said John Florida, president of JWT in Brazil.

Young & Rubicam laid off 20 employees last month, half of them in support jobs; 109 staffers remain.

Salles cut 60 of its 549 staffers. No creative or production people have been cut, Mr. Salles said, but two VPs and four directors were laid off.

MPM Propaganda, Brazil's largest agency, reorganized its staff late last year, anticipating reduced 1990 business. At that time, the staff here was cut 21.1% to 292 members. The office accounted for about half of MPM's $220.7 million in billings last year.

"We expected billings of $6.4 million in April and got only $3.6 million," said Petronio Correa, MPM partner-founder. MPM is an affiliate of Grey Advertising.

Other agencies made no staff reductions but cut back on the workweek. For example, Almap/-BBDO, minority-owned by BBDO Worldwide, cut wages by 25% and work hours by 30%.

The plan hasn't been all bad news for agencies, however. When there are ads to make, there are big savings on production and media, down as much as 40% since the plan was announced.

The average bare-bones 30-second TV spot now costs $75,000 to $100,000 to produce. Media costs also have dropped. Further, the networks have extended their payment terms from 15 days to 90 days. □

Agencies begin annual Lion hunt

By Julie Skur Hill

Recent political events could give even Jimmy the Greek trouble in making odds on which country will win the most Gold Lions at the International Advertising Film Festival June 18 to 23 in Cannes.

Brazil won four golds last year, placing among the top five worldwide winners. But this year, Brazilian agencies will be entering a relative handful of ads—about 35 to 40—compared with last year's 171. Earlier this year, President Fernando Collor de Mello imposed severe economic restrictions that have forced agencies to closely watch expenses such as entry fees.

The reduction in Brazilian entries could pave the way for other countries to take more Gold Lions.

At the 1989 festival, the U.K. walked away with the most Gold Lions, 12, while the U.S. came in second with nine (see chart). The U.K. had 461 entries last year vs. 826 for the U.S.

In the past five years, the country earning the most Gold Lions has seesawed between the U.K. and U.S.

Since 1985, Spain and France have been forces to be reckoned with. Five years ago, France claimed only one Gold Lion while Spain won none. Last year, France had 361 entries and took seven Gold Lions, the third highest total, while Spain had 250 entries and won five Gold Lions, including the top prize, the prestigious Grand Prix.

Japan has also gained ground, winning five Gold Lions last year on 274 entries, compared with three in 1985. □ goal is to develop circulation in the city to 80,000.

Mr. Van de Kamer said Telemedia so far has focused on New England-based titles because of geographic and cultural ties between the region and Canada.

But recognizing the realities of the market, the company earlier this year opened its first ad sales office in New York.

After the initial bite-size acquisitions, which were easily digested by the parent company, Telemedia decided to make its first substantial investment in the U.S. with the launch of Eating Well, the brainchild of Harrowsmith Publisher James Lawrence.

The every-other-monthly will focus on the relationship between food and health. Initial rate base is 225,000. Eating Well is expected to carry an average of 40 ad pages per issue in its first year and will compete with such titles as Bon Appetit, Cooking Light, Cook's, Food & Wine and Gourmet.

The launch comes at a time when magazine ad pages are down and many industry analysts are predicting a shakeout. But Craig Neal, associate publisher of Eating Well, said he expects to meet all launch goals. The title's low charter rates have already pulled in several marketers, he said.

Telemedia expects to spend at least $10 million on Eating Well before it's profitable. But the food magazine has the potential to triple Telemedia's U.S. revenues, now at $12 million.

In 1992, if Eating Well is alive and growing and its sister publications are profitable, Telemedia will move to the second phase of its nine-year plan.

"We'll take a fairly substantial chomp at another acquisition, only this time, it would be a profitable acquisition," Mr. Van de Kamer said. "Then we'd sit with that for three years and then take another chomp at another large acquisition that will put us in the $80 million to $90 million range.

"After the last three years," he said, "we'll take another more substantial chomp. Our goal is to be a fairly significant media company by 1998." □

Dairy board ads slashed

WASHINGTON—The National Dairy Promotion & Research Board's ad budget for fiscal 1991, begun May 1, is down 10.9% to $57 million.

Butter advertising took the biggest cut, down 42.4% to $8 million, an official said. Grey Advertising, New York, handles that account.

Other dairy board agencies are DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, and McCann-Erickson Worldwide, San Francisco. □

Ad spending forecast

foresee, however, a severe hurricane and earthquake and the virtual absence of economic growth toward the end of the year.

In light of these adverse happenings, we can better understand the current softness in advertising activity and also recognize the reasons why it will eventually get better.

National advertising rose by 5.2%, compared with a gain of only 4.8% for local advertising. However, the trend in mass consumer media demand was better than the overall change implies, because direct mail advertising was included in the national ad total. Direct mail expenditures are counted in the national advertising total because the mail can't be opened and clearly identified in terms of origination and destination.

In 1989, mail advertising piece volume dropped sharply because of higher postal rates, and ad revenues for this large medium were up only 3.9%.

Excluding direct mail revenues, national advertising increased 5.7% last year. This compares favorably with 5.5% in 1985, 4.9% in 1986 and 4.6% in 1987, the last three non-Olympic years.

The trends in national advertising have been gradually strengthening and are basically better than recent reports suggest.

Local advertising, with a rise of only 4.8%, was another reason for the underperformance of advertising in 1989.

Retail advertising in newspapers was the most visible sign of softness, as debt-burdened department stores cut ad linage sharply. But other local media also were affected by the competitive change in retail advertising, and local ad revenue growth in most media was lower than it had been in recent years.

Local media revenue growth was further depressed by a falloff in classified help-wanted and real estate ads.

Unlike national advertising trends, local advertising is not yet showing signs of improvement.

Outlook for 1990

The outlook for 1990 appeared to improve at the beginning of the year, before it was clear that economic expansion had stalled. Unfortunately for the sellers of advertising time and space, ad expansions tend to lag behind an upturn in business conditions.

Economic expectations are for only moderate improvement relative to last year's fourth quarter, and 1990 will fall short of being a really good ad year as related to the economy.

During the first quarter, local ad spending reports became even more gloomy. The most important local medium, newspapers, has experienced more declines in retail and classified ad linage levels.

Although the rest of 1990 may improve somewhat, it will still be a year of mediocre growth in local advertising. The outlook for national ad budget growth appears a little better.

The McCann-Erickson General Index of national ad spending shows a preliminary estimate of 5.1% growth in the first quarter of 1990 despite a lot of negative pressures. Growth in the second quarter should be somewhat better, and unless the economy turns sour in the second half, the projection for national ad growth should remain on track.

Most of the current reports on the state of the advertising industry tend to suggest a worse condition than the one that truly exists. An expansion in advertising activity is long overdue and, in time, it will make its appearance.

Things are not as bad as they appear, but strong re-expansion is temporarily on hold. □

Halsa gets new image

RACINE, Wis.—S.C. Johnson & Son is giving Halsa a new image.

Last week, it relaunched the eight-item shampoo and conditioner line i redesigned packages with a contemporary European spa image.

A $10 million network and cable TV, magazine and point-of-purchase campaign from Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, supports.

This is the first effort since FCB won the account last year from Lotas Minard Patton McIver, New York.

Halsa had a 5% share of the $1.9 billion shampoo and conditioner segment in 1985, its launch year, but by last year had fallen to 2%, said Diana Temple, a health & beauty aids analyst from Salomon Bros. □

Murdoch shops 'TV Guide'

Media baron seeks ways to cut debt

By Scott Donaton

Rupert Murdoch is sounding out prospective buyers for TV Guide less than two years after he rocked the industry by paying $3 billion to buy the magazine's parent, Triangle Publications.

Publishing industry sources say top Murdoch executives have met with a number of major publishers in recent weeks to gauge interest in the weekly, which has been in an ad page and circulation slump since it was acquired by News Corp. in 1988.

The asking price: an estimated $2.6 billion.

"There's no question about it—they're selling it," said one industry source, adding he recently met with Murdoch executives to discuss TV Guide. "They're doing it very, very quietly, because right now they don't have to sell it. But they've been meeting with people."

Another industry source familiar with the discussions said, "It's been shown around to carefully selected people. [Murdoch executives] won't admit it, but the truth is it's being shopped."

Murdoch executives vigorously denied the reports.

"News America Publishing categorically denies TV Guide is for sale," a company spokesman said. "It is a rumor that is ridiculous and silly."

Analysts say Mr. Murdoch has been under pressure to reduce News Corp.'s heavy debt load, which they estimate at about $6.5 billion. A TV Guide sale would significantly shrink the debt and let Mr. Murdoch focus his resources on other holdings, especially Sky Television, a money-losing U.K.-based satellite TV service, and Fox Broadcasting Co.

But selling TV Guide would mar Mr. Murdoch's near-perfect track record and would likely be viewed as a sign of deeper problems at News Corp., and that's why sale discussions are said to be under tight wraps.

Finding a buyer may not be easy. Only a handful of companies could afford the hefty price tag, and those that can

Ad drop-off causes magazine shakeout

By Scott Donaton

In what could be the start of a shakeout in the magazine industry, publishers are selling and, in some cases, folding titles.

"We have never been busier than we are at this minute," said John Veronis, chairman of Veronis, Suhler & Associates, a top media investment company.

Plagued by a continuing ad-page shortage, some publishers are trying to raise cash to reduce debt by unloading magazines that don't strategically mesh with their other titles. Smaller publications are looking for investors as they struggle to stay afloat.

The activity reached a fever pitch last week, high-

REP. HENRY WAXMAN

Anti-cig bill packs it all in

Waxman omnibus measure would virtually kill tobacco ads

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The most comprehensive anti-tobacco bill ever pieced together is making the rounds in Congress.

The draft legislation, a copy of which was obtained by Advertising Age, would virtually eliminate tobacco advertising. It would also put an end to tobacco-sponsored auto, musical and cultural events, and "Joe Camel"-type T-shirts and related merchandise.

Advertising and tobacco industry officials say Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.), the bill's sponsor, is trying to line up support to guarantee passage by the 23-member House Health & Environment Subcommittee. Rep. Waxman chairs that panel.

Because the long-rumored bill hadn't been introduced by late last week, industry officials said Rep. Waxman may have encountered more opposition than he anticipated.

Waxman aides didn't return repeated phone calls, but it appears the congressman is still pushing the bill hard.

Rep. Waxman spearheaded the 1985 bill that banned broadcast advertising of smokeless tobacco products.

The new measure combines elements of previously introduced anti-tobacco bills, including those from Reps. Thomas Luken (D., Ohio) and Mike Synar (D., Okla.). Rep. Waxman apparently believes such a bill faces a greater chance of passage by his own subcommittee than by any other.

"We think he's put everything that's been raised in Congress into an omnibus bill for the purpose of seeing what votes he can put together," said Wally Snyder, exec VP at the American Advertising Federation. "I don't think he expects to get all of it . . . but maybe he wants to get a vote."

Even Rep. Luken acknowledged that such an all-encompassing bill would probably stand a better chance in Rep. Waxman's subcommittee than in Rep. Luken's

Lintas savors $35M win from Sara Lee

By Julie Liesse and Jon Lafayette

Sara Lee Corp.'s decision to consolidate most of its food advertising at a single agency follows similar moves by other industry powerhouses.

The company last week awarded Lintas:USA, New York, an estimated $35 million in media billings. The account includes Sara Lee Bakery plus a host of processed meat brands: Bryan, Hillshire Farm, Ball Park, Kahn's, Mr. Turkey and Grillmaster. Lintas already was agency of record for Bil Mar Foods, maker of Mr. Turkey.

Sara Lee executives, including Chairman John Bryan and President Paul Fulton, felt the need to consolidate because the food industry in general—notably Campbell Soup Co. and Kraft General Foods—is consolidating brands and advertising. Sources said the decision to consolidate wasn't based on creative considerations.

Like Campbell and Kraft, Sara Lee is trying to maximize brand strength in media and promotions. Mr. Bryan has often endorsed the concept of cross-brand advertising and merchandising.

"We're going to do the total integrated communications for them," said William Weithas, chairman-ceo of Lintas:Worldwide.

Lintas' compensation is based on a fee-plus-incentives agreement.

For Lintas, the timing of the win was especially sweet.

"It's a wonderful win for us. It's so wonderful because of that tank job we got on Eastern Airlines," Mr. Weithas said.

Eastern two weeks ago abruptly moved its $45 million account to Ogilvy & Mather.

Losing Sara Lee business to Lintas are Chiat/Day/Mojo (Sara Lee Bakery); Ally & Gargano (Bryan meats); Puskar Gibbon Chapin, Dallas (Hillshire Farm, Kahn's); and W.B. Doner & Co., Southfield, Mich. (Ball Park, Grillmaster).

Chiat's 9-month-old campaign starring the real Sara Lee Schupf (daughter of the company's founder) will continue, sources said. □

Senate hits green claims

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Senate last week threatened to jump into the controversy over environmental product claims.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D., N.J.) told a Senate Commerce Committee subcommittee he's preparing legislation that would require the Environmental Protection Agency to set uniform criteria for environmental claims in product marketing.

He also said his legislation might create an environmental labeling program that would give marketers seals of approval for "environmentally preferable products."

"The folks in the advertising world have caught the wave of environmentalism," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D., Conn.). "Unfortunately, accuracy and truth often are being drowned out."

Other witnesses, representing government, business and environmental groups, expressed concerns that cast doubt on the immediate future of marketers' "degradable" and "recyclable" claims.

An executive from Procter & Gamble Co., the nation's leading disposable diaper marketer, said spurious green claims confuse consumers and cloud the issue of what's really environmentally sound.

"Packaging that claims to be made of biodegradable plastic material may in fact be a technically true claim, because the plastic may break up due to biological action," said P&G Associate Ad Manager Robert Viney. "But if placed side by side with a non-degradable plastic material in a landfill, there is no real difference in how quickly the landfill fills up. Then we believe such a claim would be misleading."

Missouri Attorney General William Webster agreed standardized definitions are needed and said the National Association of Attorneys General has been cooperating with the Federal Trade Commission in that effort.

But Mr. Webster, part of an eight-state task force that met in March to develop standards for green claims, said states mustn't be constrained from acting on their own, "and the FTC seems to share that view."

But Mr. Viney argued that national marketers should be held accountable to a single standard.

"We would agree that a standard definition of key terms and claim support requirements, applicable nationally, vs. different definitions and regulations in every state, is a major need," he said.

Much of the day's rhetorical heat targeted plastic bag and diaper marketers. And Mr. Webster told Advertising Age he's met with representatives of seven plastic bag and diaper companies, which he declined to name, and said he expects enforcement action against at least some of those companies by summer.

Barry Cutler, director of the FTC's Bureau of Consumer Protection, said his office has more than a dozen investigations under way into products' environmental claims, including those of diaper and plastic bag marketers.

"For example, the staff is looking at whether products are actually 'photodegradable,' 'biodegradable,' 'ozone-friendly' or 'recyclable,' " he said.

Mr. Cutler also touched on seal programs, saying they "have the potential to be deceptive."

If seal programs become operational, "the commission will review product advertising and labels," he said, "to ensure that they do not result in deceptive or misleading advertising claims." □

Continental touts service

By Jennifer Lawrence

HOUSTON—Continental Airlines starts an image makeover May 22 in a $7 million ad campaign showcasing the first TV creative work from new agency Wells, Rich, Greene, New York.

The new approach—both strategically and creatively—sets the stage for a major repositioning for the No. 5 carrier.

Once the price airline advertising leader, the Texas Air Corp. unit now will use a service message.

Past summer marketing initiatives have typically centered on low fares or value-added promotions such as "kids fly free."

Continental uses little girls trying on bathing suits to show it's easy to find a low fare that's just the right fit.

The new campaign features four 15-second spots paired as :30s. All open with "Get ready. Get set. Go." The theme line is "Continental summer. We're ready."

"We wanted to do a broad-scale message just when people are planning their summer," said Richard Metzner, Continental senior director-marketing services. "We also wanted to begin to reposition the airline as one that has accomplished a great deal and offers a good service product."

The new TV spots will be used in 10 markets for the first five-week flight. Local and national newspaper ads will support.

Continental is trying to bounce back from service problems following the acquisition of People Express in early 1987.

How to market that comeback was said to be a key issue in the review that landed the $40 million-to-$50 million account at WRG from N W Ayer, here and New York. □

McDonald's tops in spending

Big Mac reigns supreme.

McDonald's Corp. piled up expensive broadcast spending in 1989 to pad its lead as the nation's largest advertised brand name.

McDonald's spent $424.8 million in measured media, up 6.1% from 1988, according to Advertising Age's first quarterly report on the nation's top 200 brands. (See accompanying box for definition of "brand." Brand rankings appear on Pages 26 and 27.)

The fast-food chain boosted broadcast 7.8% to $417.8 million to once again outdistance another broadcast-sustained name, No. 2 Kellogg's cereals, at $373.3 million, up 5.3%. In fact, broadcast pulled 98% of the total measured media spent by the top two brand names.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., which passed AT&T Co. for the third spot with $363.7 million, spent 57% of its measured outlay in broadcast. Entry into the top 200 required an expenditure of $25.3 million in 1989. AT&T spent $314.3 million on its telephone services, up 8%.

Philip Morris Cos. claimed 12 positions—the most of any company—among the 200 with aggregate spending of $753.7 million, up a modest 3.5%. But it could not pull past General Motors Corp., which remained the largest brand parent in total expenditures within the 200 with $778.7 million, up only 1.1%. GM pulled its leading tally from eight brands.

PM's largest brand, Miller beers, ranked No. 11 based on $146.8 million in measured spending, down 10.3% from 1988. Five of its cigarette brands—Marlboro, Merit, Virginia Slims, Benson & Hedges and Alpine—occupied top 200 positions, as did Post cereals, Kraft cheeses, Maxwell House coffees, Kraft salad dressings and mayonnaises, Jell-O desserts and General Foods International Coffees.

Procter & Gamble Co., supplanted by Philip Morris Cos. as the nation's largest advertiser among all brands in 1988, spawned the third-largest retinue of leading brands among the 200. Its entries—Folgers, Tide, Oil of Olay, Crest, Head & Shoulders and Nyquil—accounted for an aggregate $283 million in measured media, up a dramatic 35.9%, but placing P&G only 11th among brand parents.

National spending by the 200, based on nine-media totals compiled by Leading National Advertisers, grew to $12.43 billion, up 10.4% over 1988. The 200 aggregate rose from 31.7% to 32.4% of all LNA-monitored national ad spending. That amount rose 7.9%, hitting $38.34 billion in 1989, for more than 39,000 brands.

The 200 exercised their economic clout in broadcast media, comprised of network and spot TV, and syndicated and cable TV networks. They propped up network TV by spending $5.12 billion in the medium, up 8.3%. Meanwhile, the nation's advertisers as a whole trimmed TV budgets to produce an overall 0.2% decline in network advertising.

The brand elite commanded 53.5% of all network TV expenditures of $9.56 billion in 1989, up from 49.3% of the total in 1988.

The 200's spot TV spending rose 7.3% to $2.66 billion, which was 29.4% of all spending in the medium in 1989, up from 28.7%.

In the burgeoning syndicated TV market, the 200 claimed 39.3%, up from 35.8% in 1988 as their spending grew 57% to $505.5 million. Syndicated TV's total expenditures were $1.29 billion, up 43% for the year.

Likewise, the 200 captured 32.2% of all cable network advertising of $952.5 million, up from 29.9%, with an expenditure of $306.7 million.

The 200's spending in magazines rose 14.5% to $1.75 billion to claim 26.6% of all national magazine spending of $6.59 billion, up from 26% of the total in 1988. In newspapers, the 200 accounted for 16.9% of $8.78 billion national spending in the medium, as their expenditures grew only 3% to $1.48 billion.

Category composition of the top 200 brand names is weighted toward three categories: Passenger cars, general retail and restaurants. As a group, they claimed 39% of total spending by the 200.

Passenger cars, comprising 28 of the top 200 brands, totaled $2.42 billion. This represented a growth of 18.2%, virtually all from Japanese imports and Chrysler Corp., whose car total rose 6.8% to $252.7 million.

Enhancing the category's strong growth performance was $146.3 million in 1989 advertising for No. 97 Lexus, No. 140 Infiniti, and No. 53 Geo compared with $9.6 million in 1988, all for Geo.

Spending in the category declined for both General Motors and Ford Motor Co. The lead name among passenger cars was No. 5 Ford passenger cars with $197.4 million, down 7.3% from its category leading total in 1988.

General Motors' first entry on the chart was Chevrolet passenger cars, No. 7 with $180.6 million, down 1.9%.

Total general retail spending increased 14.9% to $1.24 billion among the 15 brands in the category. Retail, a composition of household, apparel and miscellaneous spending, was paced by the No. 3 brand overall, Sears, Roebuck & Co. stores with $363.7 million, a 57% increase reflecting a massive ad infusion in broadcast to push its "Everyday low prices" marketing theme launched in early 1989.

Macy's stores pulled past K mart Corp. stores for the category's runner-up spot in 1989 although spending for both declined from the prior year. Macy's took No. 12 overall with spending of $146.8 million, down 0.2%, and K mart claimed No. 14 with $128.7 million in spending, a 19.1% drop.

Restaurants, as a category of 11 brands, grew 9.4% to $1.17 billion. Burger King, the No. 9 brand name overall at $170.4 million, up 11.5%, remained the perennial runner-up to McDonald's, which accounted for 36% of category spending.

PepsiCo amassed $272.1 million in restaurant spending behind No. 18 Kentucky Fried Chicken, No. 30 Pizza Hut and No. 63 Taco Bell. The category served up the bulk of PepsiCo's $401.3 million in total expenditures among its top 200 brands, ranking it sixth among brand parents. □

Defining what constitutes a 'brand' is no simple task

What is a "brand"?

Our working definition in this report is a line of products or services bearing the same name within an industry subclass as defined by Publishers Information Bureau Codes.

This definition captures most line extensions of brands; identifies the product in its most recognized and heaviest advertised segment of the market; and narrows the brand to a single subclass.

But there are objections, which we acknowledge. Some purists may say this definition errs on the side of inclusiveness by producing "mega-brands," as in No. 70 Kraft cheeses as opposed to Cracker Barrel or Philadelphia Cream Cheese.

Another example: No. 2 Kellogg's cereals as opposed to Kellogg's Frosted Flakes.

Others may say our subclasses are too exclusive. If Alka-Seltzer jumps across the antacid boundary into cold remedies, this reasoning goes, the brand tally should follow the "name."

Even limiting subclass coupling produced such entries as No. 5 Ford passenger cars and No. 17 Ford trucks and vans, which show up separately when really the brand name is the same.

Likewise, PIB code subclasses in areas such as cosmetics are much more specific—skincare creams, lip & eye, scents & fragrances, etc.—than subcategories identifying beer (one subclass). This prevents such brands as Revlon and Maybelline from making the top 200 because they don't spend enough in a single subclass.

We are interested in your comments on our methodology and will be making refinements as we go along. □

DIRECT MARKETING AGENCY REPORT

Ted Carr

Busy direct shops soar 12%

Data-base development and package goods tapped as biggest growth areas

By Kenneth Wylie

Despite continual grumbling over the high cost of mailing, advertisers' direct-mail activities pushed the direct-response business to record revenue levels, according to Advertising Age's exclusive survey of direct-response agencies.

The boom in direct mail, along with substantial spending in direct-response broadcast efforts, helped direct the industry back into the double-digit growth column in 1989 with a 12% gain in billings, up from a 9.6% gain in 1988.

But the future looks a lot like the past, with 80 agency executives surveyed by Advertising Age estimating the industry will grow only 9.5% this year.

Last year's spending increase, monitored for 200 agencies with direct-response activities, propelled billings to $3.8 billion compared with $3.4 billion in 1988.

The industry's 12% leap looks particularly impressive when judged against the 6.9% growth figure in billings of advertising agencies.

Matching the growth pace of direct marketing—and again keeping well ahead of the pack—is No. 1 Ogilvy & Mather Direct, New York, an independent WPP Group unit that posted 1989 U.S. direct-response billings of $305 million, up 12.1%.

Wunderman Worldwide, a Young & Rubicam subsidiary, remained No. 2 despite a drop of 1.4% in billings to $262.4 million for the year.

These hefty totals don't indicate the magnitude of direct-response activity by U.S.-based shops.

The top two agencies, for example, had combined non-U.S. billings of $655.3 million, an aggregate greater than their U.S. billings and up 15.7% from the prior year. Such growth from foreign business is causing more U.S. direct-response agencies to look for international business.

In a companion survey of 80 fully direct-response agencies, 42.5% expect international growth to be a factor contributing to 1990 agency growth. Many of those agencies also entered this year without foreign billings.

Agencies in the study were less bullish on overall growth trends, however. The anticipated dip in growth this year is attributed to the expected postal rate increase and higher printing costs.

Agencies particularly see the proposed rate increases next January by the U.S. Postal Service—22% for second class and 17% for third class—cutting into their growth.

The agencies say clients, as a result of the rate boost, most likely will reduce the size and number of their mailings; exploring alternate delivery was the third most likely option (see related story on P. S-4)

Direct mail, at $1.03 billion, accounted for 57.5% of $1.79 billion in direct-response media spending by the 200 agencies. Markups for materials and services and fee income are other components of total billings volume.

While direct mail accounted for the bulk of media spending, radio recorded the sharpest increase, up 28.8% to $49 million. TV climbed 20.5% to $332.5 million. Print edged upward 4.8% to $278 million.

The leading growth agency among the 10 largest direct-response shops is Lintas:Marketing Communications, New York, whose billings soared 111% to $107.5 million. Lintas attributed the growth to a surge in business from its advertising clients into direct response.

Next in growth among the 10 leaders was Kobs & Draft, Chicago, rising nearly 30% to $116.9 million in 1989. Kobs & Draft was surprised by its rapid growth, which came from new accounts and existing clients; the company has projected only 10% growth entering 1989.

Forty percent of the shops identified package goods as the prime source of future industry growth for their agencies. This was by far the largest percentage attributed to an industry category. Another 17.5% of the agencies identified package goods as their second or third most likely source of growth.

The study shows a need for many agencies not only to build up their direct-response services, but also to develop a more universal mission that encompasses non-direct-response disciplines and international expansion.

Alternate delivery picks up the pace

By Janet Meyers

MAIL TROUBLE

To mailers, developing alternatives to the U.S. Postal Service is no longer a temporary bargaining chip. It's a long-term necessity.

Mailers have used alternate delivery in the past as a lever against Postal Service rate hikes.

Magazine publishers in 1980, for example, took credit for curbing an expected 9% increase in second-class rates with their alternate-delivery efforts. When rates rose only 2%, publishers virtually abandoned alternate delivery.

But a weighty, across-the-board rate increase in 1988, the Postal Service's deteriorating financial condition and a proposed average increase in January of 22% for second class and 17% for third-class mail have forced mailers and publishers to consider alternate delivery as a long-term solution.

Advertising Age's survey of direct-marketing agency executives shows serious consideration of alternate delivery as an option in the face of postal-rate increases.

When asked how their clients would react to the most recent postal-rate increase proposal, 32.8% of responding direct-marketing agency executives report alternate delivery to be one of three options most likely to be exercised by clients. Clients' most likely response, they speculate, is cutting down each mailing's pros-

SURVEY BRIEF

Sample this item

Postal carriers beware! Mailbags aren't going to get any smaller this year. They actually may come only in an industrial-strength version to handle an increase in package-goods product samples and direct-response promotional pitches.

The direct-response agency executives surveyed by Advertising Age indicate package-goods clients hold the greatest revenue growth potential of any product or service category.

Package goods received 21.7% of the mentions to an open-ended question asking respondents to select five growth categories, followed closely by traditional direct-response powerhouse financial services (including insurance companies) with 20.8%.

The field dropped off dramatically to the No. 3 category of business-to-business, which received 9.2% of total mentions.

The remaining leading categories, in descending order, are travel and leisure (7.1%); retail (6.6%); automotive (5.3%); computers and high-tech (4%); communications and telecommunications (4%); healthcare (3.1%); and publications (2.7% of total mentions). □

Most Companies Do Targeted Direct Marketing By Default.

Most direct marketing today suffers a double whammy. A lack of vision as well as aim. The key is identifying your most profitable target. The challenge is knowing how and where to look.

And the place to turn, like so many national companies have discovered, is to Targetbase Marketing from MARC. We've spent the last quarter of a century analyzing, understanding and predicting consumer behavior. So we can leverage both our knowledge and experience in improving your direct marketing results.

With Targetbase, how we target is just as important as who we target. For example, traditional direct marketing looks at your database as a whole. We see a number of segments, each one motivated by different reasons for purchase.

Through research and analysis, we identify profitable segments within your total audience. Then we determine the most important product benefit, appeal and message to stimulate purchase from each targeted segment.

By feeding the responses from those programs back into your database, you establish ongoing relationships with customers and prospects. You communicate with customers as individuals, not just as

Use-tax issue moving toward day in high court

TAX TROUBLE

In their continuing fight over sales taxes with revenue-hungry states, direct marketers appear to be winning.

Encouraged by recent court decisions denying states the right to collect sales tax on residents' mail-order purchases from direct marketers in other states, the Direct Marketing Association is looking to settle the matter for good, says Robert Levering, DMA VP-general counsel.

Mr. Levering says DMA and Multistate Tax Commission, a lobbying group composed of state tax officials that favors taxing advertising and other professional services, are near agreement on a test case they hope will work its way to the U.S. Supreme Court. If that happens—and it probably wouldn't until 1992 or 1993, Mr. Levering says—the court will have a chance to uphold or overturn its 1967 decision that largely precludes states from taxing mail-order purchases from out-of-state marketers.

The case will arise from Nevada, says Mr. Levering, declining to identify the direct marketer that will serve as guinea pig. The fight will determine whether individual states can recoup an estimated $3 billion annually in "lost" tax on direct-response sales. Direct-mail sales in 1988 were estimated at $35 billion.

Based on the U.S. Supreme Court's 1967 decision in National Bellas Hess vs. Illinois, states can't tax out-of-state mail purchases unless a marketer maintains a significant presence such as property or personnel—in legal parlance, a nexus—in the taxing state.

That decision remained unchallenged for years, but the growing use of techniques such as 800 numbers and home-shopping TV channels have led states to increase pressure to recoup what they see as lost tax revenue by questioning what constitutes nexus.

"Realistically, no state court is going to overrule the U.S. Supreme Court," admits Michael Mazerov, director of research for the tax group. "Ultimately, the only way to see if Bellas Hess remains good law is to challenge it in the Supreme Court."

That 1967 high court ruling so effectively prevented states from taxing mail-order sales that U.S. Rep. Jack Brooks (D., Texas) last year introduced legislation designed to alter the decision.

His measure would allow states to collect sales tax on purchases from most mail-order retailers. But that bill has foundered.

Prospects for the legislation appear slight, at least for now.

"Calling that bill dormant is being kind," says Mr. Levering, who notes that legislating a solution rubs some politicians the wrong way. "For one thing, it strikes people as a new tax."

With the legislation still awaiting consideration by Rep. Brooks' economic and commercial law subcommittee, the two warring factions are moving to settle the growth, according to the agencies, was through data-base development, named as one of the top three choices by 83% of the agencies (see story on P. S-10). Also listed among the top three in growth potential was international business (by 55%) and sales promotion (by 63%).

The crossover into sales promotion by direct-response agencies is not surprising (AA, April 30), given the interest in direct response by the sales promotion agency community.

Direct-response agency executives also indicate better utilization of direct response as a marketing method would stimulate growth, with many saying the industry strategy is underused by client companies.

> "Marketers haven't been making good use of direct response. There will be an explosion of growth in direct response in the 1990s as business realizes the value of repeat customers."

"Marketers haven't been making good use of direct response," says Harold Brierley, president of No. 38-ranked Brierley & Partners, Dallas. "There will be an explosion of growth in direct response in the 1990s as business realizes the value of repeat customers."

He sees this shift resulting from better utilization and greater sophistication of computer data bases—the lifeblood of direct response—and a realization among advertisers of the importance of creating and maintaining personal relationships with their customer base.

"Very few senior marketing executives understand direct-response marketing," Mr. Brierley says. "More precisely, the lack of broader use of direct response is because management doesn't understand it, and because it is much more labor-intensive, takes more time, costs more and is much more complicated than general media advertising." □

pect list.

Pushing alternate delivery up in priority appears crucial to making it viable. "If alternate delivery is going to work, mailers need to be in it forever," says Howard Rosen, director of alternate delivery for Time Warner.

Despite agency executives' interest, alternate delivery is still far from becoming mainstream.

The volume of mail now being delivered by private means is negligible—only about 3%, according to the Association of Alternate Postal Systems.

Many of those companies specialize in delivering saturation, or non-addressed mail, which is exempt from the postal monopoly. But under the postal-rate proposal, saturation mail rates would decrease through new discounts—from 10.1¢ to 9.1¢ per mailed piece—discouraging mailers from using alternate delivery.

"We could be hurt [by the proposal]," says Ken Bradstreet, president of AAPS and VP-general manager of Advertisers Postal Service Corp.

Mailers of hefty catalogs and magazines stand to reap the greatest savings from alternate delivery. That's because alternate-delivery companies' costs are based more on the number of pieces mailed than on weight.

Alternate Postal Delivery, one of the largest private-delivery companies, is positioning itself for an expected increase in volume.

President-CEO Phillip Miller says the market potentially is worth as much as $500 million.

Mr. Miller intends to expand the network from its Midwest base. Targets include Greensboro, N.C., and Salt Lake City. The service delivers more than 1 million third-class pieces per month.

Time Warner, the nation's largest U.S. mailer, last year launched Publishers Express partly to gain clout with the Postal Service.

Time Warner has much at stake: Its postal bill is expected to jump 20% to $360 million after the 1991 rate change.

The service delivers magazines published or printed by Time Warner and equity partners R.R. Donnelley & Sons, Quad Graphics, Meredith, Murdoch Magazines, New York Times Publishing Co. and Times Mirror.

Publishers Express now delivers 85,000 magazines to 70,000 Atlanta-area households. By fall, Publishers Express will add catalog mail from Johnny Appleseed, Penney's and Sears. □

Finishing a project and getting it mailed on time are two of the very satisfying aspects of our business. But, by far, the most satisfying is the knowledge that our clients are getting the results they want. That's why, at every stage of every job, we make sure it merits our stamp of approval. It's the only way we know to get these results.
Helping you reach the most qualified prospects possible has also been extremely gratifying. We are proud of our industry, and proud to be a part of this growing, exciting business. To us, the best way to ensure its continued growth, and your success, is to put our stamp of approval on everything we do.

How data were compiled

The rankings include returns from fully direct-response agencies and ad agencies with direct-response billings.

Data from both groups were solicited by questionnaire, although separately. Advertising agencies were surveyed at the beginning of the year for the Agency Income Report, published March 26.

Ad agencies were asked to list not only media placed by their direct-response units but materials and services and capitalized fees related to direct-response activity.

A number of agencies for various reasons still only identified direct response as a portion of their media total. Those numbers were used to determine their direct-response ranking in this report.

Purely direct-response agencies were mailed questionnaires that also contained additional questions relating to industry trends.

Both advertising agencies with direct-response billings and direct-response agencies were ranked together by their billings volume (see charts beginning on Page S-2).

Excluded from billings in this report were returns from internal operations such as catalog production and data base and telemarketing operations. □ matter with a test case.

The decision to seek an ideal legal challenge comes as more states—28 at last count—pass laws "purporting to give the states the authority to collect taxes on mail-order purchases," Mr. Levering says.

"It's kind of like a protection racket," he says of states' legislative efforts to strong-arm direct mailers into compliance rather than risk losing a precedent-setting legal challenge.

Still, other legal battles continue. Mr. Mazerov says a case involving the state of North Dakota and Illinois-based Quill Corp. appears ripe to rise to the Supreme Court.

The case, now awaiting trial in the South Central District Court in Bismarck, N.D., raises the usual sales tax question—but with a twist, Mr. Mazerov says. The state will rely on a new argument: that the direct marketer's goods—in this case, office products and computer supplies—constitute nexus until the purchaser inspects them and officially takes delivery on the purchase. According to that argument, the goods themselves, at least for a time, remain the property of the sender and constitute nexus.

What encourages DMA about its chances before the Supreme Court are two recent state court rulings in Pennsylvania and Connecticut. In both, courts ruled in favor of direct mailers.

The Connecticut ruling was the most significant to DMA because it was rendered by the state Supreme Court. In its 6-1 decision March 28, the court held that a California marketer didn't have to collect the state's use tax because Cally Curtis Inc., a marketer of training videos, had only a nominal presence in Connecticut.

In the other case, the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania ruled that Bloomingdale's By Mail Ltd. isn't responsible for collecting use taxes on its mail-order sales to Pennsylvania residents.

Direct marketers continue to be reassured by the courts' definitions of nexus, which will remain the crux of the use tax issue.

"Once again, a state court has reaffirmed the 1967 national Bellas Hess decision of the U.S. Supreme Court . . . that an out-of-state direct marketer could not be required to collect taxes from in-state customers unless it has a physical presence, or nexus, in the taxing state," Mr. Levering says. □

We're teaching executives how to use the telephone.

Most marketing and advertising executives don't have a clue about how to use the telephone.

They don't know that the telephone expands the selling power of their TV commercials. Delivers demographics and research information in real-time. Makes callers to games and contests instant winners. Or even that the telephone can self-liquidate advertising and promotion costs before anyone actually buys their product.

Which is why smart executives rely on Teleline.

Fact is, Teleline programs have already generated tens of millions of call minutes. And, the Teleline SuperSystem℠ delivers all types of AT&T passive and interactive MultiQuest℠ 900 services, as well as toll-free 800.

And because Teleline is the only voice information company with advertising and sales promotion experience, we can show you more ways you can make the telephone work.

Data-base work arrives as direct's hot button

By Alison Fahey

SEARCH FOR GROWTH

Direct marketers are calling on the computer to help ring up revenues in the early 1990s.

Direct-response agency executives surveyed by Advertising Age identified data-base development as the technology representing the greatest revenue-generating potential for their businesses in 1990.

More than 45% of respondents say data-base marketing is the hot growth area. Growth from international activities and sales promotion functions were a distant second place with 16.9% of surveyed executives selecting each of these as areas with the greatest promise.

Agency executives say data-base marketing is becoming more important to their clients as they struggle to target consumers more effectively.

"I think data-base marketing has always been the domain of traditional direct marketers like insurance and financial services [companies], and now we're seeing tremendous growth from package goods," says Gary Blau, partner, Computerized Marketing Technologies. "The package-goods community has come to the harsh realization that mass media doesn't work."

Mr. Blau expects more package goods marketers to follow in the footsteps of Quaker Oats Co., a CMT client that will break in September a multi-year effort revolving around a customized direct-mail piece and including coupons for 16 Quaker brands. The initial data base contains the names of 18 million consumers.

Some say a result of the shift to data-base development will be growth in telemarketing's role as a direct-response device.

"As direct marketing has grown in sophistication with data-base building and management, people are realizing the telephone is a marketing communications medium [and not] an untargeted, unsophisticated way of selling," says Steven Idelman, chairman-ceo of the telemarketing company that bears his name.

While data bases are making telemarketing more efficient, new interactive telephone systems are helping to build data bases. For example, callers who leave their names and addresses for a 900 number phone-in sweepstakes provide advertisers with a ready-made mailing list.

"In that case, the marketer is collecting information at no additional cost," says Bob Lorsch, president of Teleline, a developer of telephone marketing programs.

Marketers that have experimented with interactive phone numbers include Anheuser-Busch Cos., Gannett Co.'s USA Today, Paramount Pictures and American Express Co.

Mr. Lorsch also says 900 numbers, which are sometimes ad-supported, can generate extra dollars for more advertising and promotional programs.

Brad Gillum, VP and partner of Lave & Associates Marketing, one of the agencies that listed telemarketing as the No. 1 growth area in the Advertising Age survey, says he sees more smaller companies using telemarketing as new hardware makes interactive voice response more affordable.

The key to telemarketing's growth, however, appears to reside in not only technological improvements in telecommunications but a desire to refine customer data bases to improve telemarketing's effectiveness.

"Clients used to have a lot of consumer information at their fingertips and just ignored it," says one agency executive who asked not to be identified. "Before, they didn't want to invest in it, but now they

Coupons go in-store

Growth trend shifts from media distribution

By Scott Hume

The pendulum has swung away from media-delivered coupons in favor of in-store promotions.

Package-goods marketers distributed 263 billion coupons through print media in 1989, up 4% from 1988, reported the Summary Scan! division of the Advertising Checking Bureau.

But the percentage growth of in-store and on-shelf promotions was higher, up 12%. Included were on-pack coupons, refund offers, bonus packs (such as buy-one-get-one), contests, sweepstakes and packages touting new or improved products.

In 1988, the number of media coupons (distributed by free standing inserts, newspapers, magazines and direct mail) rose 14.6% from 1987 to 252.7 billion, while use of in-store/on-shelf promotions rose 5%.

Summary Scan! Director Kermit Myers attributed the shift primarily to "pure economics."

"In 1987, when the number of coupons distributed rose 6%, I thought things had finally leveled off after several years of double-digit increases. But, surprise, the FSI companies dramatically reduced their prices in 1988 and boom, everybody raced back into couponing," he said.

"In the old days, you saw coupons for cookies and crackers but not coupons for everything, as you do now."

"Insert prices rose again in 1989 and manufacturers again shifted budgets, back away from coupons and into promotions," Mr. Myers added.

Another factor in last year's shift out of media couponing was renewed fears about "coupon clutter" as a result of 1988's large increase, he said.

"In the old days, you saw coupons for cookies and crackers but not coupons for everything, as you do now. [Categories] that never used to coupon now do it regularly, such as small-volume products like hemorrhoid treatments and allergy medication, and that's added to the clutter," he said.

It's too early to tell whether the balance between print media coupons and in-store/on-shelf promotions will again flip-flop in 1990, but early indications are that the growth of both "probably is leveling off," Mr. Myers said.

The face value of the coupons distributed in 1989 was about $115 billion, but because redemption rates stayed flat at less than 4%, the total redemption cost (including handling) was $4.5 billion, down 3.4% from 1988.

Although it's possible to track the number of promotional offers, it's impossible to give them a monetary value, Mr. Myers said.

FSIs remain the distribution vehicle of choice for package-goods marketers, accounting for 88.7% of all coupons distributed through print media in 1989. That's about even with 88% in 80% in 1986.

Other sources reported different numbers of coupons circulated last year. Carolina Manufacturer's Service estimated 273.4 billion coupons were distributed last year, up 9.4%. Mr. Myers noted that Carolina includes on-pack coupons and tracks only coupons distributed by marketers it serves as a fulfillment house.

Summary Scan! functions solely as a tracking service, monitoring newspapers in 57 markets for print ads and inserts, tracking 45 consumer magazines and examining every promotion distributed through direct mail. For in-store promotions, Summary Scan! examines every package and display in selected grocery stores in 10 major cities.

Marketers spent $979 million on print ads with coupons in 1989, and $207 million on print ads supporting promotions but not carrying coupons—such as ads for refunds, contests and sweepstakes.

Health & beauty aids again accounted for the highest share of all coupons distributed, 21.6%, up from 20.2% in 1988. □

Disney eyes 'Games Junior'

Editorial and business-side developments in print media.

Is Disney playing "Games"? PSC Publications, New York, may be close to a deal to sell Games Junior to Walt Disney Co. PSC is also seeking a buyer for Games, bought in 1987 from Playboy Enterprises; PSC launched the spin-off Games Junior in 1988. Both are every-other-monthlies. "There is a fair amount of interest in Games Junior and some interest in Games," said PSC President Jerry Calabrese. "There have been conversations, and still are, with Disney about Games Junior." PSC filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection earlier this month.

In March, PSC sold Creative Ideas for Living to Sampler Publications, St. Charles, Ill. The every-other-monthly women's magazine has a rate base of 700,000.

Selling to Soviets. Amtorg Trading Corp. and International Delaware Corp., both New York, in November will jointly publish what they call the first directory of U.S. companies offering services to Soviet industry. American Business Directory for the U.S.S.R. will be distributed to 200,000 Soviet managers and government officials. The publishers have gathered at least 380,000 prepaid subscriptions for the estimated 350-to-400-page directory, said Basil Pegushin, Amtorg managing director. A b&w page is $10,000; a color page is $12,500.

"Penthouse" publisher adds "Compute!" General Media International, New York, publisher of Penthouse and Omni, bought Compute!, Compute's Amiga Resource, Compute's Gazette and Compute's PC from ABC Publishing, a division of Capital Cities/-ABC, New York. The frequency of monthly Compute! will be reduced, and the other titles are being evaluated to determine whether they will continue publishing, said Kathy Keeton, General Media vice chairman. At least one book is expected to survive.

New name, broader focus. ABC Publishing, New York, changed the name of its consumer magazine sales company to City Media from California City Magazine Network, as it expands into other cities and plans to develop more multiple-city buys. The network also added Palm Springs Life to its package buy, including Los Angeles Magazine, San Diego Magazine and San Francisco Focus.

Discount for animal lovers. Brant Publications' Interview, New York, will offer a 5% discount in its June, July and August issues to cosmetic and fragrance advertisers that stop using animal testing in product development. A regularly priced b&w page is $5,960; a color page is $9,940.

McGraw-Hill pushes print. McGraw-Hill, New York, formed a Magazine Publishers Council of executives from its 39 trade titles. The group, chaired by Joseph Dionne, chairman-ceo of McGraw-Hill, will meet quarterly and was formed "to reinforce McGraw-Hill's commitment to the business magazine industry," Mr. Dionne said. That commitment has been questioned by members of the industry in recent years following a series of restructurings that led to books being folded or sold.

"Sassy" plans readership control. Lang Communications' Sassy, New York, will publish in December an issue produced entirely by its teen-age readers. No advertiser tie-ins have been announced but Sassy executives hinted special programs may be made available to marketers. Ad close is Sept. 25. A b&w page is $10,160; a color page is $14,730. □

SPOT CHECK

April showers brighten spring

Spot Check is a monthly survey of purchasing activity in the top 20 TV markets as a projection of future activity, compiled by Horizon Media, New York. Markets are ranked by spot availability after April sales.

Top 20 overlook: Markets are generally tight after a shower of sales in April. Denver, Los Angeles, New York, San Francisco and others have rebounded, said William Koenigsberg, Horizon president. He expects advertising for early June movie releases to increase future demand for spot TV.

(1) Very tight—Little time available.

Denver: Aggressive political races and heavy automotive, retail and fast-food spending mean near sellouts in most dayparts.

Los Angeles: Political spending is at an all-time high. Automotive spending leads the market despite lower levels than last year. Entertainment, home video and fast-food spending are strong.

San Francisco: Despite flat spending by financial institutions, the market is very tight. Retail, fast-food, political and foreign cars are fueling demand for time.

(2) Tight—Time available but demand keeps prices stable.

Atlanta: The market is primed to pick up dramatically from political spending. Financial institutions, local auto dealerships, retailers, fast-food chains and corporations also are spending heavily; time could be sold at a premium in June.

Cleveland: Fast-food, automotive and political spending leave few prime-time spots available. Early and late news time periods and sports are also in demand.

Dallas: Financial services spending is up from last year. Increases in retail and political spending keep the market tight despite decreased domestic automotive and fast-food spending.

Detroit: Newspaper advertisers keep flocking to local TV. Target Stores' entry has forced K mart Corp. to expand advertising.

Minneapolis: Automotive spending is up; the Minnesota State Lottery is advertising heavily in the second quarter. Sponsors for the July 1990 Olympic Festival have started campaigns.

New York: June movie releases will keep the market healthy; baseball has helped tighten inventory on WWOR and WPIX. Automotive, transportation and communications spending is heavy.

Philadelphia: Automotive and financial services spending will keep inventory selling at a premium through May. Airlines are fighting Midway Airlines' entrance. Movie spending is high.

Seattle: Nissan Motor Corp. USA's heavy spending has car marketers rushing for good positions. Nordstrom has boosted retail spending. Fast-food spending remains high.

Tampa, Fla.: Inventory is tight in early and late news, with stations already meeting budgets for second quarter. Spots for Lexus and Infiniti have helped push automotive spending.

Washington: Automotive and retail spending are very heavy. Also tightening the market are political spending and AT&T Co. and Bell Atlantic's ad war.

(3) Negotiable—Time available at negotiable rates.

Boston: Automotive and fast-food spending are flat, but some banks are expected to spend more in May and June to regain customer confidence after major financial setbacks.

Chicago: Tourism and fast-food spending are up, but corporate, local and automotive spending are down. Early political spending for fall races could tighten the market.

Houston: Financial and automotive spending are healthy, but retail is down, and the November gubernatorial race has yet to affect the market.

Miami: Movie, automotive and political spending are up marginally. Most demand is for selected prime-time programs, early and late news, and access time periods.

Phoenix, Ariz.: Foreign car spending is up, but financial and retail spending are flat, leaving a volatile marketplace.

Pittsburgh: Financial spending is rising. Automotive spending is healthy. Demand could be eased after this month's primary.

St. Louis: Automotive and retail spending are tightening the market, but pressure for time is expected to ease this month. □

McD grills chicken

OAK BROOK, Ill.—McDonald's Chairman Michael Quinlan told shareholders Friday that domestic sales are running "essentially flat" compared with 1989 as a result of softer consumer spending and aggressive discounting by Burger King. McDonald's also is testing a grilled chicken sandwich that would compete with Burger King's BK Broiler (see earlier story on Page 4).

United unions court exec

ELK GROVE VILLAGE, Ill.—United Airlines' three unions are courting Chrysler Corp. Vice Chairman Gerald Greenwald to run the carrier if an employee buyout succeeds, Crain's Chicago Business reported. If the unions convince Mr. Greenwald, 54, to succeed current Chairman-CEO Stephen M. Wolf, it would be a big breakthrough in their efforts to buy UAL. Sources described negotiations as "progressing well but not yet done," adding that if a deal with Mr. Greenwald is sealed, it probably would occur this week.

Parker, Reebok team

BEVERLY, Mass.—Parker Bros. will announce a tie-in with Reebok for a videogame at the June 2 Consumer Electronics Show. Parker said this is the first commercial tie-in with a Nintendo Entertainment System videogame. The game, called "Drac's Night Out," features a character who wears the Pump athletic shoe. Reebok will co-promote the game. Grey Advertising, New York, handles Parker; Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, is Reebok's agency.

Cable tests revamp

Restructuring plans could turn off advertisers

By John McManus

ESPN, Cable News Network, MTV and other cable channels may soon see some of their hard-won favor among advertisers evaporate.

Cable systems, with re-regulation hanging over their heads, are recasting their program offerings so viewers pay only for the channels they want.

Cable networks fear that a new payment structure will cut into their coverage, diminish cable ratings and stall the medium's progress as a legitimate competitor for advertisers' mass media budgets.

Instead of grouping ad-supported channels into a single "basic" package, the leading cable systems are starting to restructure their offerings into optional clusters, known as tiering. Cable subscribers then pay separately for services that match their interests—sports, entertainment, information, comedy and adventure.

The restructuring—now being tested by industry leader Tele-Communications Inc., Time Warner's No. 2-ranked American Television & Communications and Cablevision Systems Corp.—is being strongly resisted by the cable networks.

"Tiering cuts down . . . the potential dollars the cable networks can get from advertisers."

"When you talk about diminishing the reach of cable networks, suddenly some of those networks become less viable options to broadcast television advertising," said Joseph Ostrow, New York-based exec VP-worldwide media director at Foote, Cone & Belding. "This may signal the end of that opportunity."

But viewer "choice is going to be where we go with this industry," said TCI President John Malone.

At last week' National Cable Television Association conference in Atlanta, Mr. Malone and other cable leaders said tiering is the only way a system can balance rising program costs with regulatory and consumer group demands to rein in rates.

"We can't continue to add expensive services to basic and increase the price of basic without encountering consumer problems," said Charles Dolan, chairman of Cablevision, the No. 8 U.S. cable company. "Nor do we want to paralyze basic services or remove services. What that says is, you need to let the consumer have access to cable, picking up the services that he really wants."

Coming attractions: Movie tie-ins galore

By Marcy Magiera

LOS ANGELES—It's going to be a long, hot movie-marketing summer.

Such movies as "Days of Thunder" starring Tom Cruise, "Total Recall" with Arnold Schwarzenegger, "Jetsons: The Movie" and "Dick Tracy" are expected to produce the largest number of promotional tie-ins ever with major advertisers in a summer.

Last year, "Batman," "Ghostbusters II" and "Indiana Jones & the Last Crusade" spurred a large number of tie-ins, but as movie marketers strive to push ticket sales past last summer's $2 billion record the race for cross-promotions is heating up.

The three-month period between Memorial Day and Labor Day is the most competitive season at the box office. Close to 50 films will be released, representing about 40% of the year's ticket sales.

That competition and the escalating cost of movie marketing are making tie-in partners a necessity for studios with potential blockbusters to promote.

A program of marketing tie-ins, like that for "Days of Thunder" or last year's "Ghostbusters II," can add $20 million to $30 million to a studio's $8 million to $10 million marketing budget.

Walt Disney Co.'s "Dick Tracy" and McDonald's Corp. will team for what will probably be the summer's largest single cross-promotion (AA, Feb. 5). But the largest numbers of marketing tie-ins belong to "Days of Thunder" and "Jetsons: The Movie."

Here are some coming attractions:

■ In the "Dick Tracy" deal, McDonald's will spend $10 million to $12 million on advertising in support of an estimated $40 million game-and-premiums promotion. The McDonald's promotion starts June 15, the

Saatchi puts heat on breakaway shop

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising's laid-back attitude toward eight staffers who broke away from the agency changed last week when Saatchi launched a flurry of legal action, apparently aimed at harassing the new agency and recovering property.

Writs were served May 23 on seven of the eight individuals who left Saatchi to form Cowan Kemsley Taylor (AA, May 21).

Managing Director Paul Cowan said the writs allege breach of conduct and theft of confidential information. He said unspecified damages were sought and Saatchi demanded all materials in their possession be returned by noon May 24.

"All the material we had has been returned, including personal televisions and stereos that were perks of our jobs," Mr. Cowan said.

"We returned show reels, press cuttings, used Magic Markers, three layout pads and a photograph of the Berlin Wall," he said. "We offered [Saatchi] the opportunity to come 'round and look at our office or our own personal homes."

Mr. Cowan added, "We are required to swear affidavits and submit them to the high court next Tuesday [May 29] regarding certain allegations about property removed" from Saatchi premises.

Saatchi declined to comment.

Since the new agency has taken no clients, Saatchi is expected to drop the legal action following compliance with the writs' request for return of property.

Saatchi has emphasized the eight weren't part of the agency's top management, and Charles Saatchi reportedly remarked he had never heard of any of them.

Sources speculate the new shop's first account could be Reckitt & Colman's $1.5 million Lemsip cold remedy. Reckitt & Colman is moving Lemsip and Disprin aspirin because of a conflict with Procter & Gamble Co., a Saatchi client. Disprin went to Leagas Shafron Delaney Chick last week.

Two other Saatchi executives quit last week to set up a business-to-business direct marketing and sales promotion company for Foote, Cone & Belding. Stephen Fox, managing director of Saatchi & Saatchi Business Communications, and Andy Blackford, creative director at Equator, a Saatchi sales promotion company, said they also aren't taking any accounts with them. □

Coke retools MagiCan

By Patricia Winters and Laurie Freeman

Coca-Cola USA last week told the Food & Drug Administration it's switching to paraffin in its promotional MagiCans to eliminate the possibility of consumers ingesting the chlorinated water originally used.

An FDA official said Coca-Cola contacted the federal agency after discovering some MagiCans had malfunctioned and that one Massachusetts youth drank the liquid (AA, May 21).

"From our point of view, we have no public health concerns with MagiCans," said Chris Lecos, an FDA spokesman.

Coca-Cola is "continuing to monitor and evaluate the situation. At this point, the promotion is proceeding," said Bob Bertini, manager of public relations, North American soft-drink business sector, at the company.

Mr. Bertini said Coca-Cola has found a way to correct the MagiCans that haven't yet been distributed to bottlers, though he declined to elaborate.

An estimated 120,000 of 750,000 MagiCans have already been distributed to bottlers, industry sources say. So far, Coca-Cola has had "fewer than 50" complaints about malfunctioning cans, Mr. Bertini said, compared with 15 complaints two weeks ago.

Robin Gendron, the mother of the youth who drank the liquid inside a MagiCan, declined to comment on whether she's considering legal action.

The MagiCans are specially designed so cash pops out when they're opened. The problem, as explained in TV and print ads the company broke May 23 in 50 newspapers, is that the prize mechanism in some cans is faulty and the money doesn't pop out.

The ads from McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, warn consumers not to drink the liquid inside the MagiCan because it's not meant for consumption.

Marketing analysts say that though the botched MagiCans probably won't hurt Coca-Cola's sales or long-term image, it's an embarrassment.

"I disagree that there's no such thing as bad publicity," said Tom Pirko, president of Bevmark beverage consultants. "There's a huge amount of negative attention. . . . It's embarrassing to Coke."

Still, Mr. Pirko and most other experts believe Coca-Cola can't cancel the promotion.

"To cancel would be an admission that something dreadful happened, and it didn't," Mr. Pirko said. "You have to remember that this is a company with a wound, and that is new Coke. They don't make an admission."

Coca-Cola launched the $100 million "Magic Summer '90" promotion for Coca-Cola Classic to top Pepsi in the annual summer marketing battle. Pepsi-Cola Co. has launched "Cool Cans"—with mod graphics and numbers printed inside—that can be redeemed for cash.

Leigh Curtin, manager of public relations for Pepsi, called Cool Cans "fun and non-threatening." She said in the Pacific Northwest, where the promotion was first launched and has just ended, "double-digit incremental growth" was generated. □

ABC wants auto ads early

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—ABC-TV is asking automakers to submit prime-time budgets by the week of June 4, an attempt to create the same two-tier marketplace that last year drove upfront network sales to a record $4.2 billion.

"A two-tier marketplace is developing, and it's unfair," said Paul Isacsson, exec VP-director of broadcast programming and purchasing for Young & Rubicam. "The package-goods companies get screwed."

The intense competition among automakers for TV time early on creates a higher tier that helps inflate prices and squeezes available time for non-automotive marketers, which wind up as second-tier players because they get to the market later.

Last year, automakers spent $700 million in the upfront market, which led to overall price increases of between 10% and 17% on a cost-per-thousand basis.

■ Special Report on the Upfront TV Season starts on Page 33.

By treating the automakers separately, ABC is hoping to again secure double-digit increases. CBS and NBC are expected to follow suit, industry sources say.

"Here we go again," said an agency executive who asked not to be identified. "So many automotives are out there. They are locked out of some good shows on NBC because of the General Motors deal, so ABC is trying to stampede the market."

General Motors Corp. earlier this month combined ad time on NBC's sports and prime-time programming with time on NBC's cable services in an estimated $500 million to $750 million three-year deal.

The pre-upfront pact has yet to beget more multiyear agreements or start a rush on advanced network sales, but industry sources say the Big 3 networks have quietly made some smaller prime-time deals with select advertisers, including Helene Curtis Industries.

None of the agreements have been near the magnitude of the GM buy, and neither the networks nor any advertiser and agency executives would discuss details.

But now that ABC and NBC

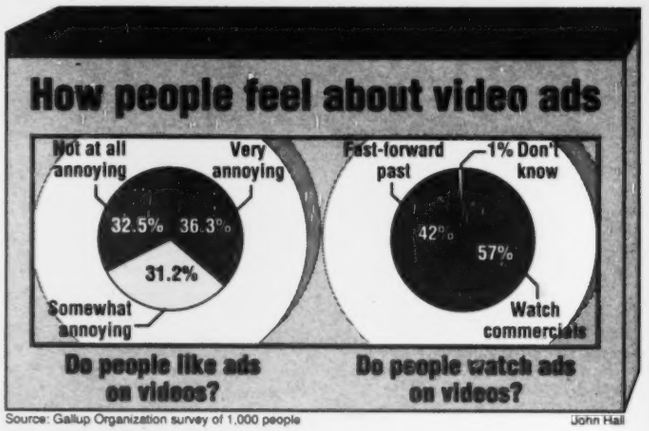
Consumers pan ads on video movies



Source: Gallup Organization survey of 1,000 people — John Hall

By Scott Hume

GALLUP SURVEY

Most consumers who buy or rent movies on video don't want to watch commercials.

That doesn't necessarily mean they don't watch the commercials that increasingly precede films on video. But a survey conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization shows that most consumers are at least a little annoyed by that extra 30- or 60-second wait for the feature presentation to begin.

Placing a commercial message on a videocassette seems like a good way to reach consumers: 78% of the 1,000 adults surveyed by phone said they own or at least occasionally rent a VCR.

More than a quarter of the sample (28%) said they had bought or rented a videocassette with a commercial message included on it during the previous three months.

Of those who watched such a video, 57% said they watched the commercial, while another 42% said they fumbled for the fast-forward button to speed through the ad. The remaining 1% weren't sure how they had handled the situation.

But while most may have watched the commercial, they likely weren't pleased about it. More than one-third (36.3%) of the respondents who watch prerecorded tapes described the inclusion of advertising on the tape as "very annoying."

A slightly smaller group held the other opinion: 32.5% judged ads on movie tapes to be "not at all annoying." In between were 31.2% of the sample, who think commercials on tapes are "somewhat annoying."

That's a slightly less forgiving reaction to the marriage of advertising and feature films than was given in a previous Gallup survey. For that poll (AA, April 23), consumers were asked their opinion of commercials airing in movie theaters, and 44% said the practice should be banned, while 35% opposed a ban and 21% were unsure.

Advertisers had the best chance of getting persons ages 18 to 34 to watch their videocassette commercials: 60% of survey respondents in this age group left the fast-forward button alone. Among those ages 35 to 54, 54% watched the commercial, while 59% of those 55 and older kept their seats during the ad.

That middle age group also proved highly critical of video ads as well as impatient with them. Nearly three-quarters of those ages 35 to 54 who rent or buy videos labeled commercials on videos as either "somewhat annoying" (32%) or "very annoying" (41%).

Only 57% of those ages 18 to 34 said they found commercials on videos either "somewhat (29%) or "very annoying" (28%).

Among those ages 55 or older, only 22% said video ads are "not at all annoying." More than three-quarters were either "somewhat" (34%) or "very annoyed" (44%) by them.

The Gallup survey was conducted by phone, using a randomly selected but nationally projectable sample. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%. □

Mercury thinks young

By Raymond Serafin

TEMPE, Ariz.—Lincoln-Mercury is counting on its sporty new Mercury Capri to fashion a more youthful image for the upscale division of Ford Motor Co.

But whether the same dealers who sell large luxury vehicles like the Lincoln Town Car to buyers in their mid-50s can also sell small cars to young buyers is a key marketing question. Ford executives acknowledged that during a press preview here for the Capri and a second small car, the new subcompact Mercury Tracer.

"A lot of our dealers don't like our advertising" for the Capri launch, said Ross Roberts, Lincoln-Mercury VP-general manager.

Some dealers have criticized the absence of a hard sell in the positioning of the Capri as "absolutely . . . a fun car," Mr. Roberts said.

Dissatisfaction with the advertising to selling big-profit automobiles, will be motivated enough to sell the lower-profit cars to prospects who may be the children of their usual customers. The Capri's base price is $12,588, compared with a $27,986 base price for the Lincoln Town Car.

Mr. Roberts and other divisional officials say attracting younger buyers now is the only way to ensure a continued flow of customers in the future.

Lincoln-Mercury will concentrate Capri marketing efforts in 19 cities, most of them on the coasts and in the Sun Belt. These are areas where small convertibles have been most popular. In addition, the automaker believes it can devote more attention to training dealers by limiting the number of markets where the car is available.

"It's the first time we've ever been able to say with the launch of a car that we're going to go regional with it," Mr. Roberts said.

Chiat widens focus to int'l presence

Swedish agency in, S.F. office out

By Alice Z. Cuneo and Cleveland Horton

Chiat/Day/Mojo is turning its corporate eye to Europe while refocusing its U.S. operations.

The Venice, Calif.-based agency last week said it's entering into a joint venture with Hans Brindfors Advertising, a Stockholm-based agency with about $100 million in billings. The Swedish agency's clients include SAS Scandinavian Airlines, Ikea, Absolut, Volkswagen, Audi and Orrefors.

The so-called Pan European Agency Network will start by establishing as yet unnamed agencies in Italy, France and Spain. The joint venture will examine possible acquisitions as well as start-ups in those countries, said Peter de Vaux, Chiat exec VP-chief financial officer.

"Our intention is to develop the association [with Brindfors] further," Mr. de Vaux said, "perhaps leading to a full merger."

The two agencies have swapped "a modest amount of equity," as well as exchanging board memberships, he said.

At the same time, Chiat has agreed to sell its $100 million San Francisco office to local management. Chiat Vice Chairman Fred S. Goldberg, also president of the San Francisco office, is leading the negotiations.

Initially, Chiat will keep a minority interest in the office, though it expects the new managers ultimately to fully own the new agency.

Chiat officials said the agency's new international focus doesn't lend itself to maintaining two offices only 400 miles apart. The San Francisco office was "born out of a regional agency concept," said Bob Wolf, chairman of Chiat/Day/Mojo North America. "It's hard to see how it fits in now in an international network."

Sources suggest the decision to sell the San Francisco office grew out of increasing conflicts between Messrs. Wolf and Goldberg. Mr. Wolf acknowledged that Mr. Goldberg's entrepreneurial approach to running the office prompted the two men to end up "on different ends of an argument."

One of the issues said to precipitate the split was Chiat's decision to drop out of the view of its $20 million account, citing the brewery's shaky financial condition (AA, May 7). Mr. Goldberg apparently fought that decision and, last week, the San Francisco office re-entered the review.

Other observers say Mr. Goldberg lost an internal corporate struggle with Mr. Wolf, who was named Chiat North America chairman late last year. "They have been duking it out for control of the company," said one former Chiat executive.

"Wolf didn't want Goldberg to succeed," said one agency head. "Jay [Chiat] didn't want to cut and run, so he gave Fred a chance to do something with the office."

The San Francisco office has 100 employees and its client roster includes Golden Grain Marcaroni Co., Celestial Seasonings, Dell Computer Corp., Oracle Corp. and Atari Corp.

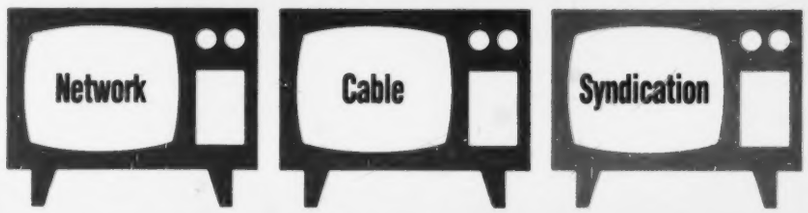
Chiat officials said the agency's new international focus doesn't lend itself to maintaining two offices only 400 miles apart.

Still in question is the future of three accounts Chiat/Day acquired in the merger with Australian agency Mojo MDA last year: Qantas Airways, the Australian Tourist Commission and Koala Springs Australia, each billing about $3 million. Chiat said it hopes to transfer those accounts to Venice; Mr. Goldberg said the disposition of the accounts is unclear.

The regional account group serving Chiat's large Nissan Motor Corp. USA business will remain housed within the new agency's office but will continue to report to Chiat's Venice headquarters.

This marks the second time Chiat has left San Francisco. An office that was opened in 1979 closed one year later. In 1980, Chiat reopened and grew through the acquisitions of Hoefer, Dieterich & Brown and Regis McKenna Advertising (which brought the Apple Computer account). With the Mojo merger, Chiat gained what had once been

Unusually big early deals will have a telling effect; here's a daypart-by-daypart look at how the market falls together



THE UPFRONT TV SEASON

Ante up for the big poker game

By Wayne Walley

The annual $4 billion poker game known as the network TV upfront selling season is beginning.

In June, at least two months of posturing by buyers and sellers come down to four frenzied weeks of serious negotiating and executing deals in network dayparts.

During the upfront selling season, advertisers buy time as much as a year in advance to lock in prices, programs and cost-per-thousand guarantees.

When it is over—probably no later than July 4—the Big Three networks and Fox Broadcasting Co. likely will have sold 85% to 90% of available inventory.

"Our first check of the marketplace shows advertiser budgets to be about the same as last year," a network executive says. "And spending levels in the upfront are almost always higher than our first check."

Movie studios, automobiles and package goods again are viewed as the big upfront players. But few believe these main categories will turn the market into another frenzy.

The automakers, by spending an unprecedented $700 million in upfront last year, caused a panic allowing the Big Three networks to reap cost-per-thousand increases of between 10% and 17%.

But General Motors Corp. already is locked into a three-year deal with NBC worth an estimated $500 million to $750 million for time in sports, prime time and its CNBC and SportsChannel America cable services. Many buyers are hoping that deal is a sign the automotive category will not drive upfront to record high CPM levels again.

"The deal means GM won't be screwing up the upfront market this year," says Paul Isacsson, exec VP-director of broadcast programming and purchasing for Young & Rubicam.

The pact heartened the selling community, however. "[GM] increased spending dramatically last year," a network executive says. "People said it couldn't continue. Then they canceled second-quarter options. This deal shows they're ready to spend at least as much as last year."

An agency executive says the impact of the GM/NBC deal is

Guarascio explains how NBC deal fit GM

Still plans to be busy in upfront, though

General Motors Corp. is earning a special place for itself in the annals of upfront TV sales, having signed an unprecedented three-year, $750 million package with NBC-TV just before the start of the upfront selling season.

Advertising Age dispatched Detroit Bureau Chief Raymond Serafin to talk with Philip Guarascio, GM's executive director of advertising and strategic merchandising, about the NBC deal and other areas affecting the 1990 upfront selling season.

Advertising Age: Are you still going to be involved in the upfront market with the other networks?

Mr. Guarascio: We expect to. We're going into it now with a big piece in place, and I think, frankly, that gives us a little more flexibility on how to deal with the balance of our needs.

AA: Isn't [the GM-NBC package] a big endorsement of network TV?

Mr. Guarascio: I think it's an endorsement of the fact that the way advertising is going to be conducted is continually to [seek] a mix. And it's an endorsement of network TV from the standpoint where it's hard for us to see a time when we're not going to require a base of targeted mass media.

But it's not an endorsement of network television to the detriment of any other media type. We have multiyear deals in other media, too.

The program also includes participation looking for indications of where there's a vote of confidence, we looked at those things fairly closely. Within the grand scheme of what's the right media mix, we felt confident about those things.

AA: What was it about last year's upfront that spurred you on? Were you shut out of some properties you wanted?

Mr. Guarascio: No, we got [what GM wanted], and we got it the year before, but it was tougher last year.

Last year we were cited as breaking the upfront market. We went earlier than anyone; we basically decided to make a very aggressive move and we made some major commitments.

The reason it made sense to make the deal this year, frankly, was that our mix with NBC is to a large degree predicated on the mix we have right now. Our base buy is very rich from the program standpoint.

AA: You have said that having access to NBC's "selective, highly targeted" programming, which you feel does well against prospective new-car buyers, was a main reason for the deal with NBC. Was that the most important aspect?

Mr. Guarascio: Intense competitive pressure within the automotive category for key shows triggered the aggressive exploration of ways to satisfy the needs of GM's divisions.

We started thinking about the issue after last year's upfront. We did a tremendous amount of modeling and analysis, really looking at the long-term nature of the business, where it was going and what we had to do.

We knew that over the course of the next several years there may be some changes in pricing in the upfront market, and we had a very good indication it was going to happen to General Motors.

As a matter of fact, in the prime-time area, you can argue it could get more intense as we see automotives do more targeting even within their mass-media buys.

The big issue was we had to do all this in a way that enabled us to retain the flexibility our divisions needed in the event of strategic or budget changes. It was important [regarding] inventory, pricing, protection of the marketplace to make sure we had sufficient flexibility to meet whatever needs we couldn't foresee. □

Daytime looks to car makers

By Eliot Tiegel

The networks are angling for fresh approaches to selling daytime.

So far, automotive marketers are daytime TV's brightest prospects for building a strong upfront launching pad.

The networks feel they need new product categories to join the backbone of package-goods companies that zero in on daytime's principal demographics: women ages 18 to 49 and 25 to 54.

"We expect to see more autos and some other product categories like sneakers and shoes—the nontraditional categories—coming into daytime," says Jerry Dominus, senior VP-entertainment marketing and sales for CBS-TV, which was No. 1 in daytime television last season, according to Nielsen Media Research.

Nike Inc. and agency Wieden & Kennedy admit to having discussed buying network daytime.

"Most of our business goes to sports programming, late night and some prime time," says a Nike spokeswoman, adding that a move to daytime to grab women viewers is not a foregone conclusion.

While automotives have been slow to enter daytime, things appear to be picking up. Most recently, Subaru of America and American Isuzu Motors have joined the daypart.

"Daytime is the last audience specialty the autos haven't staked out," says Mr. Dominus. "And [an increase in auto advertising] is inevitable when you look at [car] sales and registrations to women."

Isuzu recently became CBS' first automotive advertiser during daytime with spots on "The Young and the Restless," last season's top-rated daytime show.

Although soap ratings are down, Larry Hoffner, exec VP-network sales, NBC-TV, believes they are still an attractive buy.

"They skew into the two age groups food and drug people are looking to reach in daytime," he says. "And we do see some minimal interest by the automotives in this daypart."

agency Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, uses daytime because it reaches females "who now equally help decide which car the family buys; because it costs less than a prime or news unit; because daytime is one of the few areas for autos where you can get an uncluttered environment; and to reach first-time buyers on college campuses."

With automotive advertising appearing to have limited potential, Mr. Hoffner says, NBC also is talking to beer, sporting goods and athletic shoe companies, which normally don't advertise in daytime.

Beer companies are a poor target for networks that are looking to expand their daytime ad base, says a media director on a large beer account.

Guarantees, pricing drive prime time

By Wayne Walley

Network ratings are down and the Big 3's share of audience continues to slide, but early evening programming on ABC, CBS and NBC is earning its moniker of prime time.

The cost of a 30-second spot averaged about $135,000 in prime time last year, according to industry sources, eclipsing the average price of a 30-second spot in other dayparts by as much as $120,000.

"Network prime time has the kind of audience that is not available in any other daypart," says Arnold Chase, director of network operations for Bozell, New York. "With prime time, you can reach every segment of the audience. No other medium compares."

While agency prognosticators say upfront spending in prime time will remain flat or drop this year, network surveys of the marketplace indicate upfront spending on ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox Broadcasting Co. will at least equal last year's record $4.2 billion for prime time.

The networks hope to get cost-per-thousand increases of between 8% and 12% unless the market is again pushed into panic buying.

Last year, when General Motors Corp. and other automakers nearly doubled upfront spending to an aggregate $700 million, other buyers rushed in and paid 10% to 17% increases to make sure their clients were in the prime-time programs they wanted.

"The only thing worse than paying too much is being shut out," says one chagrined buyer.

This year, however, buyers are buoyed by GM's decision to strike an estimated $750 million, three-year deal with NBC at least a month before the prime-time upfront selling season starts.

"I like the idea that this happened before the upfront," says Allen Banks, exec VP-media director, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. "Maybe now we can get beyond the feeding frenzy mentality and deals can be thought out."

NBC, however, could now push for higher prices. With a base laid in, some expect the top-rated network to be bullish in pricing.

It "could be beneficial to the entire upfront market," says Alan Gottesman, an advertising industry analyst with PaineWebber. The GM/NBC deal "accounts for a certain amount of the cream, which means there will be a scarcity of the cream of the crop in programming. It may not help

NBC as much as ABC and CBS, but it will help the networks."

While some have suggested other advertisers will pay higher prices than GM for the remaining NBC inventory, Arthur Kesteloot, manager of advertising & media relations for Chrysler Corp., says, "The network people have to be judicious."

GM competitors could show extra interest in top ABC and CBS programming, but the NBC deal means GM also can be tougher with those two networks.

"If prices from ABC and CBS don't suit GM's fancy, GM can go in the scatter market. There isn't as much pressure now to make a fast upfront deal," an agency source says.

Nevertheless, ABC, as the only network to maintain its average rating in prime time last year, could command increases of 12% or more on a CPM basis this year, sources say.

NBC, hurt the worst by a first-quarter ratings shortfall, might be able to get double-digit increases, but most buyers predict the network will get CPMs about 8% higher than last year.

Agency executives are unsure about CBS' future, waiting to see the first fall schedule from new CBS Entertainment President Jeff Sagansky. The lineup will be unveiled later this week.

Fox, by adding a weekly Wednesday night movie and a Friday prime-time schedule, will have a five-night lineup this year.

While pricing is always a concern in upfront negotiations, buyers and sellers of prime time predict ratings guarantees will be a key issue this year.

The networks, saddled with giving away about $150 million in make-goods because of a first-quarter ratings shortfall, want to still undetermined, but warns, "If panic sets in, we'll have the same frenzy. But if people look at it as easing the pressure, buyers could be more cautious and keep the market in check."

The networks expect movie companies to step up spending to support an expanded slate of new releases.

The movie category usually receives special treatment from networks because companies are willing to pay a premium and forgo guarantees in exchange for particular dayparts and shows that reach target audiences.

Sources say package-goods companies are likely to shift more money into network TV this year as part of a continued trend to cut promotional spending in favor of brand-building advertising.

While networks are optimistic that overall demand will outpace last year's record, advertiser and agency executives are predictably pessimistic, suggesting upfront spending will drop.

"There is significant potential for the upfront market to be less this year," says Arnold Chase, director of network operations for Bozell, New York. "One thing people want to do this year is try to avoid the burn from last year's unanticipated [CPM] increases."

Because most automotives consider TV the most effective medium for new-product introductions, anything is possible this year. Industry sources say a large portion of the GM/NBC deal is likely to encompass the Saturn introduction, and other automotive marketers may feel obliged to step up their pace.

Arthur Kesteloot, manager of advertising & media relations for Chrysler Corp., says the No. 3 automaker would likely spend "about the same as last year" in the upfront marketplace.

Ratings guarantees are a hot topic this season, after an unprecedented drop in TV usage and ensuing first-quarter ratings shortfalls forced networks to give advertisers extensive make-goods.

At the same time buyers are seeking reassurance that networks will deliver ratings during the upcoming season, networks are taking a hard line and contending that if buyers want network time, guarantees may have to be restricted.

"The case of disappearing viewers will haunt this year's upfront," warns one veteran marketer. "It's such a pervasive topic right now and everyone believes the networks will use this as leverage to change guarantees."

Initial network plans might include the resurrection of a controversial "share the risk" formula—in which advertisers assume part of the liability for a ratings shortfall due to changes in technology—used in upfront selling three years ago when Nielsen Media Research switched to people meters.

Networks also could respond by offering flexible pricing if buyers are willing to bend on guarantees.

" 'No guarantees' takes away the uniqueness of upfront buying," says Allen Banks, exec VP-media director, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. "It would give us a reason to reconsider [spending upfront]."

"Guarantees come up every year," another marketing executive says. "You can get a cost break for lower guarantees. It's a poker game and it's merely a question of which side blinks first." □ protect themselves against what they believe is a problem with Nielsen Media Research's ratings.

But the issue of reported TV usage overshadowed the fact network prime-time ratings for the Big 3 this past TV season were the worst in history.

The three-network rating, the percentage of the nation's 92.1 million TV households watching network TV during the 1989-90 prime-time season, dropped to a low of 39.7. The three-network audience share, the percentage of TV sets in use tuned to network prime time, also dipped to 65%.

The drop, however, was not as severe as in previous years and the Big 3 could argue that with Fox added in, the four-network audience share has stabilized at 70%. □

Cable costs hit resistance

The dance of the tail feathers has begun" is how one major cable network's top ad sales executive puts it.

While cable networks are pleased they are increasingly on advertisers' minds during the upfront season, they're also learning advertisers won't hesitate to back off if costs are too high.

Many advertisers continue to think of cable as a low-cost alternative to over-the-air TV, and early indications show they will resist network attempts to significantly hike costs-per-thousand.

"You've got to remember that although cable's increasing its total viewership numbers and penetration, most of the best-rated shows on cable [earn] only 1 and 2 [ratings]," says one media director. "There's no way cable channels can charge advertisers at a parity level with the broadcast networks."

The cable networks "have come to us looking for aggressive commercial cost increases, and I don't blame them for it," says Bart McHugh, senior VP-director of national radio and television programming at DDB Needham Worldwide, New York.

"Still, it's our job to get the best deal we can for our clients, and we're going to hold the line as well as we can."

Most of the top-ranked cable networks are expecting advertisers to pay double-digit rate increases on a CPM basis.

"When you compare our double-digit CPM increase to a broadcast network's 9% or 10% increase, the actual out-of-pocket dollar increase is lower for cable," says Lou LaTorre, senior VP, Turner Broadcasting Sales.

Advertisers are expressing long-term interest, perhaps best exemplified by the five-year, $120 million renewal of Anheuser-Busch's ESPN deal.

If the A-B deal is a barometer for advertisers' ever-increasing enthusiasm for cable, estimates that advertisers will increase their upfront cable commitments to $700 million this year from $450 million in 1989 seem conservative.

What's more, advertisers seem anxious to get cable spending plans set early, striking "pre-upfront" and multiyear deals.

Two traditionally big cable spenders recently did just that: Procter & Gamble Co. has committed to spend $50 million with MTV over the next six years; General Mills will spend between $30 million and $50 million on 10 different cable networks over the next two to three years. There are also inklings that McDonald's Corp. is structuring a significant deal.

"If advertiser-supported cable networks represent a 36% share in 70% of the households, that equates to 25% of total viewing," says Steve Kubinsky, director of advertising services for Nestle Foods Corp. Mr. Kubinsky has charged Nestle's agencies to direct 25% of the company's TV budget to cable.

In addition to P&G and General Mills, network ad sales executives believe cable's other big spenders—Time Warner, A-B and Kraft General Foods—again will be active players in cable's upfront, with some hefty increases coming from companies such as Sears, Roebuck & Co.

Sears executives, having indicated a desire to focus on quality program selection, are expected to make upfront buys to get in on the limited desirable inventory.

"We're directing more of our media budget into cable so our marketing is more targeted," says Scott Harding, Sears' national retail advertising manager. "We want to reach more people and different audiences. Cable is perfect for that." □ according to Jake Keever, exec VP-sales.

Mr. Silberberg believes double-digit cost-per-thousand increases are likely. But because CBS "is not the demographic leader," he says, "we're not in the position to determine how high is up."

"News has been steady and stable and we expect it to be solid again," says Larry Hoffner, NBC-TV's exec VP-sales.

Bill Hadlock, exec VP-director of media for Leo Burnett USA, says clients will balk at any double-digit increases.

Price and value will have to be in line to keep advertisers from turning to other media.

"We've been making network buys for a number of years based on price-value relationships," states David Braun, VP-media services. Kraft General Foods, whose parent Philip Morris Cos. ranked third in news-time advertising in 1989 by spending $25.9 million.

"If the price-value equation is out of line, it represents an option to change," he says.

Nevertheless, Mr. Hadlock says, "I wouldn't be surprised if there's an increased demand for news above and beyond other dayparts."

Mr. Hadlock doesn't think news programming will draw new advertiser categories. Last year's big spenders are likely to return as major players, he says.

The segment's top advertisers in 1989 were Kellogg Co. with $44.3 million and American Home Products at $35.4 million.

Network sources agree that food products and pharmaceuticals are expected to remain leading advertisers in evening news programming. Mr. Keever believes automotives and household products will spend extensively.

Executives at the Big 3 are concerned with what they see as an aberration in the first-quarter Nielsen numbers, showing decreases in news viewership across the board.

In early evening news during the 1989-90 season, CBS' ratings were down 9% to 10 and NBC's were down 4% to 9.9. ABC showed the only ratings increase, with a 1% rise bringing them a 10.9 rating, according to Nielsen Media Research.

Combined with other changes, a new method of determining or the elimination of guarantees could scare off news advertisers.

"If advertisers get a unit-cost increase on top of a non-guarantee, you're talking about a humongous increase [in CPMs]," Mr. Hadlock says. "Gobs of dollars are going to flow out of news." □

Late night feeling the pinch

By Steve Viuker

CBS is trying to rebound from Sajak; NBC is confident with Carson, Letterman and Costas; ABC is upbeat with Rick Dees; advertisers are high on Arsenio and cable is looming as a major late-night player.

But the picture advertisers paint isn't all rosy.

"Late night is facing the same problem prime time is," says Tony Ponturo, director of media services at Anheuser-Busch Cos., which last year spent $22 million in late night as the daypart's biggest spender. "Alternative viewing habits are taking away from the four networks, Fox included.

"In the last year or two, advertisers [have concentrated on] making sure they cover all their bases," he says.

Non-network competition isn't likely to increase costs-per-thousand, Mr. Ponturo says.

"The main factor for advertisers shifting to late night is the high CPM for prime time. Late night is a cheaper buy than prime."

A-B's track record indicates it may look again to cable during late night.

"We are unique due to our all-inclusive deal with ESPN. Our brands are advertised on most of the key ESPN programming," says Mr. Ponturo.

With the drop in overall network TV viewership, advertisers are looking for low CPM increases.

"We are not going to expect [the networks'] prices to increase any unless the numbers Nielsen reported for the first quarter are not indicative [of true viewer levels]," says Charles Fruit, A-B's VP-corporate media and sports marketing.

Mr. Fruit suggests some advertisers may wait for new data and attempt to get lower prices in the scatter market.

As for new advertisers expected to join the beer and automotive companies that traditionally dominate late-night advertising, sources look to movie companies.

"It runs in 2-to-3-year cycles," says Helen Tocheff, senior VP and associate buying director at Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. "The next two years will see many new releases, especially in the summers. These films must be heavily promoted to rise above the din. Shows like 'Arsenio Hall' have an attractive audience, but the movie companies will have to move quickly to get a low CPM for 'Arsenio.' "

The movie industry spends $1 billion a year in advertising, says Dick Macedo, president of Wells, Rich, Greene, which handles the MGM/UA account. "Approximately 40% is earmarked for television," he says.

"We go where the bodies are. If Rick Dees is delivering our audience, then we'll go to him. We're looking for avid moviegoers who range in age from 18 to 34."

Mr. Ponturo believes the networks will be aggressive during upfront.

"In late night, you have many advertisers attempting to reach the same target, and the avails are limited. Late night will remain competitive due to the high-demand/limited-supply factor."

Commenting on the late-night viewer drop-off, Mr. Ponturo says, "We have not noticed a drop in late night, but we haven't noticed an increase, either. That may in itself say something." □

Sports' love affair with the car

By John McManus

Many a network sports sales executive has a similar wish list for the upfront season, starting with General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, Toyota, Honda, Mazda, Nissan and Mitsubishi.

The biggest sports advertisers—automobiles and breweries—customarily make multiyear commitments for sports packages. Consequently, there isn't the same rush for limited weekly series commercial inventory that there is in prime time.

Sports anthology shows, such as "Wide World of Sports," typically aren't programs in which advertisers feel a need to lock in positions; they generally are bought in the scatter market.

That limitation hasn't prevented broadcast and cable networks from mounting an all-out blitz on the auto industry. The goal, in part, is to channel ad dollars into sports rather than other media, including those for upfront dayparts.

Networks hope to strike the ultimate upfront deals: four-year commitments that run the length of the newly signed sports TV rights contracts.

Automotive advertisers poured $362.3 million into ABC, CBS and NBC sports in 1989—that's 21% of last year's $1.7 billion network sports ad revenue.

The auto-contributed largesse represents the difference between profitability and calamitous losses for network sports divisions in the first part of the new decade. The Big 3 networks, ESPN and Turner Broadcasting System have to recover the roughly $1 billion they will spend annually over the next several years for broadcast rights.

Advertisers already are grousing the networks should not attempt to pass on those high costs. If advertisers don't bite at high price increases, it's possible a lot of inventory will remain unsold.

The multiyear commitment craze started last year when CBS signed GM and Toyota to a combined $275 million deal for Major League Baseball telecasts through 1993. Others followed.

But while networks expect 20% to 25% of inventory this year to be bought by automotives, there is still uncertainty about which companies will buy the other 75% of sports commercial time.

For this year's fourth quarter, broadcast and cable networks now are selling commercial time for more NFL and college football games than ever before available. In addition, there's the usual complement of baseball playoffs, World Series games, pro and college hoops, the U.S. Tennis Open and the anthology shows.

"The networks need us right now," says Steve Leff, vice-chairman, director-media and administration services at Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York. "And with more channels showing more sports, we don't need the networks. I think there's going to be a lot of unhappy people at the networks. They overpaid.

"Sports is a way of reaching a target, and we may be there," Mr. Leff adds. "The point is, there is a finite price advertisers can pay to reach that target."

One category that has paid the price in the past is beer companies. Anheuser-Busch Cos., Miller Brewing Co. and Adolph Coors Co. last year accounted for $208.4 million of the ad revenues put into network sports.

A-B already has committed $100 million to $120 million to ESPN over the next five years. Historically, Miller has been the first to lock in a position on major sports packages with multiyear commitments, followed by A-B.

But sources indicate Miller may hold back on long-term commitments as it has done on CBS baseball, waiting for prices to come down. If so, A-B will have little reason to make large-scale commitments at premium prices.

For other sports advertisers, "the inventory is going to be out there," says William Sherman, McCann-Erickson's VP-network supervisor. Sports media buyers are talking about "opportunities" as there haven't been in sports since 1985. To the networks, that word translates into "recession."

"I'd make a deal right now at a 0% increase," he says. □

Anheuser-Busch's 1989 network sports spending: $103 million, down 28.4% from 1988.

On networks passing on rights fees to advertisers:

"I don't think [CBS] entered into the [Major League Baseball] contract thinking the preponderance of costs could be passed on to advertisers in unit pricing increases." To help make up cash shortfalls from skyrocketing rights fees, Mr. Fruit suggests the networks may be better off creating additional units.

Children's daypart puts on the heat

By Therese Kauchak

The children's upfront market often sets the pace for the wheeling and dealing that follows in other dayparts.

Judging by this year's activity, the pace will be blistering.

Media buyers are trying to put the high cost-per-thousand increases seen in children's upfront —some of which reached 28% on the Big 3 networks—behind them.

"It's a lot more fun when you can decide who you want to do business with and grind out a price," says one agency media buyer. "[Children's] is behind us now. I want to concentrate on the potentially positive situations in the future."

On Saturday morning television, fourth-quarter CPMs to reach kids ages 2 to 11 will be about $10; a 30-second unit will cost an average of $25,000. Last year, the top-rated Saturday morning program, ABC's "Bugs Bunny & Tweety," commanded an estimated $32,000 in the fourth quarter.

"It was a brutal marketplace," says one media buyer. "There was a lot of money and it was expensive. The networks seem to have new categories and a lot of demand on a finite amount of inventory."

The syndication market was kinder, he says.

"It was aggressive, but you have so many alternatives within it that you could pick the best deal on the best show that you wanted. You have far fewer selections to make on networks."

New advertisers include Burger King Corp., which has been absent from the daypart for two years, ConAgra Frozen Foods, Tyson Foods and Nike Inc.

McDonald's Corp., which spent $20.7 million in children's programming during 1989, is believed to have increased spendings, along with veteran kid's advertisers Kellogg Co., Tonka Corp., Quaker Oats Co. and Mattel Inc.

Total expenditures in children's upfront—including network, cable and syndication—reached about $390 million; a 30% increase over last year's total spending. Much of that growth came from syndicated television and Fox Broadcasting Co.'s upfront debut.

The $390 million was split roughly between the Big 3 networks plus Fox on one hand, and syndication on the other.

Of the Big 3, ABC came out on top with about $65 million, while CBS had $55 million and NBC $40 million to $45 million. Fox, with lower ratings for its new shows, rang up $30 million.

Industry sources say syndication accounted for about $190 million, up about 58% from last year.

"That may be off by as much as $10 million on either side, but it means we have had a big jump," says Tim Duncan, president of Advertiser Syndicated Television Association. "We're talking about a 30% to 50% increase in the [children's] syndication upfront market."

The most surprising thing about this year's upfront children's market, he says, "is that we caught up with the networks so quickly." □

Michael Evans, media relations representative, Burger King Corp.

On re-entering the children's daypart:

Burger King reportedly spent a multimillion-dollar sum during the upfront sales of children's programming, where the Big 3 networks' CPMs jumped as much as 28%.

Executives didn't cringe at the high network prices, says Mr. Evans. "There weren't any surprises, nothing we hadn't expected," he says. "[Burger King focused] on a mix of [network] Saturday morning, syndicated and cable programming. We'll go with a balance."

Syndicators see 'torrent'

By Eliot Tiegel

Syndicators are being upfront about the broadcast networks' troubles, happily envisioning a robust upfront selling season for their products as network numbers falter.

"It's the marketplace," says Karl Kuechenmeister, senior VP-media sales for Warner Bros. domestic TV distribution. "Advertisers realize it makes good sense to put their money into syndication, which is where network viewers are going."

Last year's run to syndication fare could turn into a torrent, some believe.

"Syndication has arrived as the direct alternative to the networks in terms of clearances, ratings and daypart viewing," says Tim Duncan, executive director of the Advertiser Syndicated Television Association.

"Last year we had $1 billion in advertising revenue, which was a 20% increase, and we'll get a higher share of the dollars this year. We're close to having 30% of the viewers," he says.

Mr. Duncan feels upfront cash is moving to syndication because of networks' precipitous drop in overall viewership.

"We are one of the leading causes for the decline," he says.

The movement of viewers to syndicated fare has led to syndicator optimism about price increases. Mr. Kuechenmeister expects a 5% to 10% increase in syndication costs-per-thousand.

Kraft General Foods "is not taking CPM increases lightly," says VP-Media Services David Braun. Parent Philip Morris Cos. was syndication's top spender in 1989, dishing out $106.8 million, according to Arbitron's Broadcast Advertisers Report.

"We can look for opportunities where there are less increases, like in spot, print and radio," he says.

Mr. Duncan says network TV lineups before 1 p.m—consisting mostly of game shows and reruns—are weaker than syndicated fare.

"A lot of affiliates opt for syndicated shows, and the talk programs have good advertiser acceptance," he says. "Daytime has been a strong growth area for our members."

Advertisers are aware of syndication's draw.

"We see budgets moving from network to syndication, but there's always been a certain amount of that," says Dan Riordan, broadcast manager for L&L Media, the in-house buying agency for Lever Bros. and Thomas J. Lipton Inc.

Parent company Unilever U.S. was one of the top spenders in 1989's syndication market. Agencies are "examining alternatives from painted rocks to local radio and cable," he adds.

Erosion of network shares has gone on for years, agrees Terry Loftus, a Procter & Gamble Co. public affairs rep who nevertheless points to the dropping figures as a reason P&G buys syndication, spot and cable.

Mr. Loftus is unsure whether P&G will spend more this year than the $87 million spent in syndication during 1989.

"We'll continue to be a major player and buy programs that follow our audience," he says.

Mr. Duncan says package goods continue to be the primary syndication advertising category but adds that automotive is starting to make its mark.

"Detroit never bought syndication until recently," says Mr. Duncan, citing General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. as examples. "Detroit is still a big underspender."

"It's evident that automotive spending in syndication is on the rise," says Randall Schroeder, exec VP-media management director at Campbell-Mithun-Esty, which has the Jeep/Eagle account. □

APRIL AD RESULTS

Magazines find sales still cool through April

By Scott Donaton

The second quarter has begun just a little bit better than the first quarter ended.

Magazine ad pages were flat for April and down 2.2% for the year to date, the Publishers Information Bureau reports. April ad pages for magazines tracked by PIB were up 0.4% to 16,786.22.

Overall, 65 of the top 100 magazines in ad volume posted declines for the first four months; 35 registered gains.

April ad revenues rose 7.2% to $653.5 million. Year-to-date revenues were up 3.3% to $2.1 billion, PIB reports.

Weeklies are among those worst hit by the ad page slowdown. McGraw-Hill's Business Week carried 1,182.28 ad pages through April, down 10.6%. News America Publishing's TV Guide was off 14.4% to 1,033.64 ad pages.

Time Warner's People was down 4.9% with 1,061.64 pages. Sports Illustrated had 815.19 ad pages, down 16.4%, and Time carried 801.41 pages, a 3.6% decline.

Other newsweeklies didn't fare much better. Newsweek was down 6.6% with 689.67 ad pages; U.S. News & World Report saw pages dip 2.5% to 581.66 pages.

The New Yorker, with a modest first half last year, remained one of the few weeklies on the plus side through April, up 12.8% with 741.96 ad pages.

Among business titles, every-other-weekly Forbes bucked the industry trend and stayed tight on Business Week's heels, jumping 33.3% with 1,157.91 ad pages. Fortune was down 3.6% with 952.8 pages.

Most business monthlies continued to perform well. Entrepreneur was up 7.5% with 677.11 pages. Financial World carried 356.02 pages, a 38.8% increase, and Business Month was up 8.1% with 137.43 pages.

Personal-finance title Money was flat with 401.02 pages, a 0.9% decline; Changing Times was down 4.6% with 217.84 pages.

Every-other-monthly Bride's led the field with 1,294.98 ad pages, up 5.5%. Rival Modern Bride ranked No. 6 with 1,025.24 pages, also a 5.5% increase.

Among fashion magazines, Vogue carried 1,000.01 ad pages, down 9.5%, and Elle declined 5.7% with 685.55 pages. Harper's Bazaar was up 2.2% with 477.8 ad pages; young Mirabella had 369.72 ad pages, a 1,000% increase.

Women's service magazines posted mixed results. Family Circle led the category with 537.8 ad pages, down 17.7% from last year. Good Housekeeping ranked second with 524.47 pages, a 10.5% jump. Ladies' Home Journal was also up 1.9% with 498.05 pages.

Rounding out the category were: Woman's Day, 450.7 pages, down 20.1%; Better Homes & Gardens, 379.2 pages, down 16.9%; Redbook, 359.04 pages, up 2.4%; and McCall's, 305.64 pages, down 11.5%.

Woman's Day was put on the block by owner Diamandis Communications Inc. earlier this month, partially as a result of the soft advertising environment (AA, May 21).

Ebony led all black-oriented magazines with 370.02 ad pages, down 2.8%. Jet had 338.79 pages, down 7.5%, and Essence was off 10.3% with 272.72 pages. Black Enterprise posted a 5.3% increase with 280.91 ad pages.

Straight Arrow Publishers' Rolling Stone carried 552.37 ad pages, down 5.9%. Its US, with 225.32 ad pages, was up 8.6%.

Among magazines posting gains through April:

Architectural Digest carried 580.05 ad pages, up 5.5%; Town & Country had 492.45 ad pages, up 1.6%; Vanity Fair, with 446.09 pages, was up 8.2%; Metropolitan Home was up 8.3% with 419.65 pages; Gourmet was up 6.3% with 396.83 pages; Conde Nast Traveler had 367.77 ad pages, up 17.4%; and Reader's Digest rose 2.9% with 350.43 pages. □

Of the top 100 magazines in ad volume, 35 showed increases in April . . .

. . . while 65 showed declines, according to Publisher's Information Bureau.

Nintendo zaps McCann

By Cleveland Horton and Kate Fitzgerald

Nintendo of America, facing stepped-up competition, this week will name Leo Burnett USA or Foote, Cone & Belding to replace McCann-Erickson Worldwide on the videogame giant's $35 million ad account.

The announcement on the winning agency—in what might be called an agency-generated pitch—could come today.

"We've been driven crazy with agencies large and small coming to us literally on a weekly basis over the last two years," Peter Main, Nintendo senior VP-marketing, said from Chicago, where the Consumer Electronics Show opened June 2.

Nintendo, fighting off the aggressive Sega of America and NEC Technologies in the steadily maturing videogame industry, will unveil multiple new game titles at the summer show, along with enhancements to its basic Nintendo Entertainment System and hand-held Game Boy unit.

"The videogame market as a whole is maturing, and Nintendo's new agency will give it a new focus."

Conspicuously absent, however, is a Nintendo version of the upgraded "16-bit" systems that have become the most important weapon in major new offensives by Sega and NEC.

Nintendo is expected to unveil its enhanced new system, offering more sophisticated graphic and audio capabilities than its existing "8-bit" system, in Japan later this year and in the U.S. next year.

The task of creating advertising for that system will fall to the new agency, but its most important job will be preserving Nintendo's edge.

"Nobody's saying what went wrong between McCann and Nintendo, because the results of their partnership have been very successful," said David Leibowitz, a toy industry analyst with American Securities Corp. "But the videogame market as a whole is maturing, and Nintendo's new agency will give it a new focus."

Nintendo is still the far-and-away leader of the $3.4 billion market, owning 80% of the industry along with its 70 software licensees. Sega's share is estimated at 10% with NEC's share believed to be even smaller.

But the competition is coming on stronger than ever.

At the show, Sega announced a major tie-

Ads put Soviet leader's image to work

By Gary Levin

Glasnost is proving a godsend for marketers looking to latch onto Mikhail Gorbachev's latest U.S. visit.

The Washington summit last week between the Soviet leader and President Bush prompted a round of print ads celebrating warmer relations between the two superpowers.

Hawking everything from vodka to carpeting, marketers aimed for opportunistic publicity ploys, while Minneapolitans and San Franciscans rolled out the red carpet for President Gorbachev's first visits there.

IBM taps Lintas for new account

PARIS—IBM Corp. has selected Lintas:Worldwide for a new pan-European assignment, expected to be the launch of a personal computer. A Lintas source said that though no one knows budgets yet, the account may start out at about $30 million and is expected to grow. Others said the assignment could be worth up to $60 million.

An IBM spokesman confirmed the selection but wouldn't give details. Lintas' Paris office, the lead agency on the pitch, wasn't allowed to comment.

In the U.S., Lintas:New York shares IBM's estimated $125 million account with Wells, Rich, Greene, New York. Lintas handles IBM's PC products.

Also pitching for the new assignment were GGK International and Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide.

Lintas' victory is a major blow for Swiss-based GGK, IBM's main European agency. Although IBM said in a statement that adding Lintas to the roster in Europe wouldn't affect GGK's status, there's been speculation the agency's IBM business could come under review.

GGK has been rumored to be for sale, though the company has repeatedly denied owner Paul Gredinger, 65, intends to dispose of the agency net-

ABC ratings plan risks advertiser exit

Rival TV networks could reap ad windfall

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—ABC fired the first volley in the network TV upfront sales season but may have shot itself in the foot.

Late last week, ABC issued a precedent-setting proposal to change the way the network guarantees ratings for its shows. The new system would soften ABC's liability for ratings shortfalls.

Media buyers generally denounced the plan, while advertisers and agencies scrambled to avoid doing business with ABC for the coming fall prime-time season.

If any such action materializes, it could mean a windfall for rival networks NBC and CBS.

"There's a groundswell in the industry," a top-level agency source said. "Everyone is off the wall ready to hold back spending on ABC. If enough buyers hold out, ABC will have to cave in."

The uproar could also give ABC's rivals cause to rethink any ideas of establishing similar guidelines. If CBS and NBC smell an opportunity to make sales instead of new policies, it could leave ABC out on a limb.

"There is a real opportunity for CBS and NBC to stand by Nielsen numbers and gain from it," said Alison Danzberger, senior VP-director of national broadcast for Foote, Cone & Belding. "They can retain good will and maybe steer some money in their direction, since advertisers aren't forced to buy all three networks."

"Everyone is off the wall ready to hold back spending on ABC. If enough buyers hold out, ABC will have to cave in."

First-quarter figures from Nielsen Media Research showed a severe and unexplained 4% drop in the percentage of households using TV and a corresponding drop in ratings at the Big 3 networks.

The drop forced the nets to provide advertisers with as much as $150 million in free "make-good" ad units to make up for shortfalls of guaranteed ratings.

The networks blame the reported drop in TV use on Nielsen's measurement system. But several investigations by the ratings company uncovered no system flaws, and separate studies by various agencies and organizations said first-quarter results appear accurate.

The networks have been frantically seeking new ways to alter the ratings guarantee system.

Under the ABC plan, audience ratings will be adjusted upward or downward according to "persons-using-TV" figures for the 1990-91 season by comparing monthly PUT data with a base three-year PUT average.

The plan provides ratings guarantees for demographic groups but incorporates PUT levels so adjustments are made if the PUT level in a given month differs from the average PUT level from the previous three years.

Most media buyers predict PUT levels during the 1990-91 TV season will be lower than the three-year average, which means ABC would automatically adjust audience delivery figures above reported Nielsen levels.

ABC described the new formula as a safeguard against instability and uncertainty in TV usage. If the three-year average PUT level is lower it would benefit advertisers because it makes it likely the network would owe more make-goods, ABC said.

Past attempts to change the ratings guarantee system have been thwarted by buyers flocking to other networks willing to give guarantees. So far, only Fox Broadcasting Co. has vowed to give advertisers "hard number" guarantees in upfront negotiations this year.

NBC sales executives couldn't be reached for comment last week, but the network issued the following statement on Friday: "The recently announced ABC sales guarantee plan seems, at first look, to be both actionable and equitable."

CBS officials simply said they're not happy with the existing ratings system but haven't determined a course of action.

"The key to this issue is what NBC does. If they come in with hard numbers, then ABC is hard-pressed to push this policy," said an agency executive who asked to remain anonymous. "In the meantime, thank God Fox will guarantee ratings this year."

"If ABC is the only network to have this, then it gives the others a tremendous sales advantage," said Paul Schulman, president of Paul Schulman Co., a subsidiary of Advanswers. "It's a tough policy. I'm sure there are other wrinkles subject to negotiation as to where the money falls and the shows involved. But the first network that needs money will break the rules."

Philip Guarascio, executive director of advertising and strategic merchandising for General Motors Corp., called the ABC proposal a "takeaway" from advertisers and said the network's attempts to put it into effect open up other areas for negotiation.

"If ABC wants to put more risk

A-B, Miller balk at ABC price hike for Mon. football

By John McManus

Anheuser-Busch and Miller Brewing Co. rejected ABC's terms for "Monday Night Football"—four-year commitments for nearly $100 million each—industry sources said.

The brewers' rejection of ABC's terms is a new sign they might trim their network sports ad buys, a move that would leave ABC, CBS and NBC scrambling.

The rebuff resulted from an impasse over commercial-unit pricing, the length of the commitments and the number of beer units in each telecast.

ABC and Miller declined comment; A-B said it was still negotiating with the network. Executives close to both brewers said the companies would wait as long as it takes for ABC to come up with more favorable terms.

Other sports advertisers are closely watching developments between ABC and the nation's No. 1 and No. 2 brewers to see whether their stance leads to hard bargaining on all National Football League telecasts.

"Why the brewers haven't moved on 'Monday Night Football' is the question of the hour," said an executive close to one of the breweries. "Is ABC being overly bullish? Have they miscalculated the market? And where are the other advertisers going to be if the brewers won't pay the kind of money ABC wants? [Other advertisers are] going to sit back and wait."

ABC wants to renew A-B and Miller on "MNF" with the same alternating-game exclusivity, 10 commercial-unit basis as under the previous three-year contract priced at $41.8 million for each brewer. That contract expired at the end of last season.

ABC sought a first-year rate of $260,000 per 30-second spot and a 4% increase each year.

At that rate, starting at about 20% higher than last year's average regular season commercial unit, A-B and Miller would each pay $96.7 million for the four-year period.

Neither the previous nor the proposed commitments included preseason games, and the new plan doesn't include two playoff games set for "Monday Night Football." It's estimated preseason and post-season buys would put the brewers' tab at more than $100 million.

Brewery executives said they believe ABC will meet their demands and change the beer category exclusivity requirement to eight units and come down to well below $260,000 per unit.

A-B and Miller also are said to be concerned about the length of the commitments. □

Ringing up recall

Heavy advertising puts AT&T in top 10

By Kate Fitzgerald

AT&T Co. was the "right choice" among consumers polled last month, returning the telecommunications company to the ranks of the top 10 best-recalled ads.

In its first appearance on the list since last July, AT&T tied with Toyota Motor Sales USA for eighth in Advertising Age's monthly ad-Watch survey of top-of-mind ad awareness for April.

GALLUP SURVEY

The AT&T awareness surge likely was due to a heavy TV and print campaign launched in late March for its new Universal credit card.

Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, New York, created the campaign in partnership with Young & Rubicam, one of AT&T's key agencies.

Other campaigns contributing to AT&T's awareness last month included TV spots from N W Ayer, agency for the company's service and equipment advertising, and Ogilvy & Mather's TV spots for the Reach Out America long-distance discount plan.

For the third straight month, Pepsi, Coca-Cola and Ford were the three top advertisers in unaided awareness, with Pepsi holding the No. 1 spot and Coca-Cola and Ford tied for second.

Chevrolet moved up to fourth from ninth in March, bumping Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Bud Light down a notch to fifth.

Nike, which made its first-ever appearance on the top 10 list at No. 9 in March, moved up to No. 6, tying McDonald's Corp.

Chrysler fell to a 10th-place tie with Nissan Motor Corp. USA's Infiniti. Chrysler's No. 8 finish in March, fueled by Chairman Lee Iacocca's Japan-bashing TV campaign, marked the first time the company had appeared in the top 10 in a year.

In aided awareness, the status quo reigned in most categories. An exception was Black Velvet's return to the top three among liquor advertisers for the first time in a year.

Brown-Forman Corp.'s Jack Daniel's led with a 6.6% share of first mentions, followed by the Seagram brand with 3.5% and Heublein's Black Velvet with 2.6%.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Spam tries out breakfast item

AUSTIN, Minn.—Spam for breakfast?

Geo. A. Hormel & Co. thinks it will work. The meat marketer this month starts testing Spam breakfast strips, promoted as a bacon substitute with 50% less fat.

The product, which can be fried or microwaved, will be tested in Detroit; Houston; Memphis, Tenn.; and Minneapolis. Although ad support hasn't been finalized, Hormel likely will test print ads, radio spots and in-store demonstrations in various combinations.

BBDO Worldwide, Minneapolis, is the agency.

As it continues to make convenient forms of familiar meats a corporate priority, Hormel is also introducing Jennie-O Turkey Express.

War rages over ratings

Advertisers resist ABC; wait for CBS, NBC

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—An all-out war over the explosive issue of ratings guarantees is breaking out between advertisers and the Big 3 TV networks, bringing the upfront sales season to a grinding halt.

At least one advertiser is threatening to shift its network TV budget into alternative media, while other leading advertisers are refusing to comment while mulling their options.

Determined to stand its ground, ABC last week adopted a tough policy by withholding prime-time pricing proposals from advertisers that refuse to accept the network's controversial new formula for ratings guarantees, which was revealed in late May (AA, June 4).

"Are we at war? The feeling here is that if we let [the networks] do this, we're going to regret it for a long time," said a major network advertiser who asked to not be identified. "They're going to have demonstrated more power than even they knew they had."

"As a client, I'm confused. I can only interpret that there's another underlying motivator behind ABC's actions," said Ron Cox, group VP-marketing for Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co., which last year spent about half its measured media dollars, or $54 million, on Capital Cities/ABC President-CEO Daniel Burke approved the controversial ratings guarantee policy.

Third-rated CBS, led by President-CEO Laurence Tisch, will likely follow ABC's or NBC's lead.

Robert Wright, NBC's president-ceo, said NBC will have to do something because "Nielsen has let us down."

Diaper image damaged: poll

By Laurie Freeman

The nation's two major disposable diaper marketers—Procter & Gamble Co. and Kimberly-Clark Corp.—have their work cut out for them in fighting the perception that their diapers are causing big landfill problems.

In a national survey conducted last week for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization, a surprising number of consumers say they favor taxing or even banning disposable diapers to protect the environment.

Many environmentalists allege disposable diapers are a major landfill problem and that reusable cloth diapers are better. Disposable diaper marketers say their products represent a minuscule portion of landfills.

At least 20 states are considering taxes or bans on disposable diapers, a $3.5 billion market in the U.S.

GALLUP SURVEY

The sample of 1,029 adults, contacted by phone June 6, found 38% "strongly favor" or "favor" a tax on disposable diapers. But more than half (52%) oppose the concept.

The respondents were asked: "Some states are concerned with the environmental impact of disposable diapers and have suggested

P&G seeks to defend its diapers

By Laurie Freeman

Procter & Gamble Co., whose Pampers and Luvs disposable diapers are a prime target of environmentalists, this month is starting a publicity drive to accentuate the positive aspects of disposable diapers.

The campaign, by Burson-Marsteller, Chicago, is intended to counter environmental claims by cloth-diaper services, and convince state legislatures that bans or special taxes on the sale of disposable diapers won't solve the problem of overloaded landfills.

P&G is sending to legislators, media and other groups nationally the results of an Arthur D. Little Inc. study that was completed March 6. The study, commissioned by P&G, found "in terms of environmental considerations, neither disposable nor reusable diapers are clearly superior."

Disposable diapers do, however, provide fewer opportunities for the spread of infection and are generally less costly than their reusable counterparts, the study found.

While the manufacture and use of disposable diapers consume about seven times the raw materials of cloth diapers, reusable diapers use more than three times more non-renewable

Tobacco bill set to surface

WASHINGTON—U.S. Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) this week is expected to introduce his omnibus tobacco bill that includes severe restrictions on advertising and promotion (AA, May 21). Even before the bill's official introduction, the American Advertising Federation, at its national conference this week, called on members to start lobbying against the measure.

Sorrell's salary tops $1M

LONDON—WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell's salary last year was more than $1 million, up 24.5% from 1988, according to the WPP 1989 annual report distributed last week. In addition, WPP for the first time valued Ogilvy & Mather as a brand at $294 million and added the brand valuation to the company balance sheet as an intangible asset. Valuing a company's brands improves its consolidated balance sheet but doesn't affect profits and losses. WPP added a $294 million brand valuation for J. Walter Thompson Co. and Hill & Knowlton to its balance sheet at the end of 1988.

Ivana scent deal ahead?

NEW YORK—Ivana Trump may be thinking of getting into the fragrance business. "She's had many offers to license her name [including for fragrance], and it's likely in the future she will do something of that nature," said a spokesman for Ms. Trump, "but, at this point there are no plans." Her appearance at this year's Fragrance Foundation awards plus a complaint against cosmetics marketer Pavillon for the unauthorized use of her name on a cosmetics shade set the rumor mill in motion.

Maybelline buyer has global vision

By Pat Sloan

Maybelline Co. is expected to take another run at fragrance and skincare, and embark on a global expansion under new owner Maybelline Holdings.

The unit of merchant banker Wasserstein Perella Partners last week agreed to a $300 million buy of the cosmetics company from Schering-Plough Corp., after an earlier deal led by Playtex Family Products CEO Joel Smilow fell through.

Wasserstein Perella has an equity fund with more than $1 billion in capital and last week also completed an acquisition of Yardley/Lentheric toiletries from SmithKline Beecham.

"Maybelline, together with our acquisition of Yardley/Lentheric, creates a strong strategic platform in the U.S. and European toiletries and cosmetics industry," said Robert McKeon, co-president of Wasserstein Perella Management Partners, the general partner of Wasserstein Perella Partners.

He said Maybelline has excellent distribution in the U.S. but a minuscule presence outside the country. It's just the opposite for Yardley, which is stronger internationally but weak in U.S. distribution.

"We could use the Maybelline sales force to sell Yardley in the U.S., and we could use the Yardley system to sell Maybelline products overseas," Mr. McKeon said. Maybelline has been "in the U.K.," he said, "so we could start there and then move to Europe. We also see potential in Japan."

Maybelline ranked No. 2 last year in the $3 billion-plus U.S. mass cosmetics market, following Cover Girl from Procter & Gamble Co.'s Noxell Corp. Maybelline's sales were $285 million; it had a 17.3% dollar share and an 18% unit share, according to an April report from First Boston Corp.

"There has been no discussion about [an agency change] and we wouldn't impose anything."

Current Maybelline management, including President Gary Mulloy, will hold an equity stake in the company.

DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, is the principal agency on Maybelline, which spent more than $50 million in advertising in 1989. The Bloom Agency, Dallas, has some Maybelline assignments, and no changes are expected.

"There has been no discussion about [an agency change] and we wouldn't impose anything," Mr. McKeon said.

He said potential new products could include skincare and fragrance items.

"It's the group's view they're worth another try," Mr. McKeon said. Maybelline once unsuccessfully launched a fragrance called Daydreams and more recently has tested various skincare concepts.

More acquisitions may be in the offing, too. "There are some other things around we think might be interesting," Mr. McKeon said.

The executive acknowledged that his group was one of the contenders for Maybelline earlier this year when Mr. Smilow's group "came in right behind us" (AA, April 9).

"We were in negotiations to acquire Yardley from SmithKline Beecham" at the time of the first Maybelline deal, Mr. McKeon said. "We were anticipating buying Maybelline [then], so we were disappointed."

The Playtex contingent, known as MBP Acquisition Corp., was supposed to close its $300 million deal last week, but sources said bank financing didn't come through and the agreement was terminated. □

Eastern chief's debut

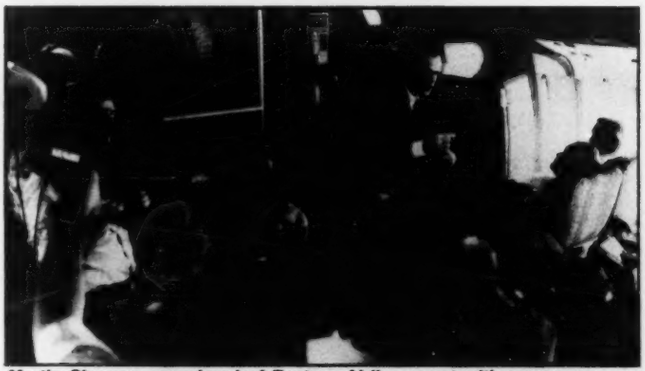
Shugrue, employees, travelers star in new ads

By Jennifer Lawrence

Eastern Airlines on June 17 launches its marketing turnaround with a $10 million to $15 million ad campaign that depends on the communication skills of Martin Shugrue.

Mr. Shugrue, a veteran airline executive appointed in April by a federal bankruptcy judge to run troubled Eastern, spent several days last week answering tough questions from employees and former passengers and a group of business travelers on board an Eastern flight.

From that unscripted footage, four to six commercials will be edited this week to kick off the campaign, internally dubbed "100 Days."



Martin Shugrue, new head of Eastern Airlines, met with passengers on board a flight to Atlanta while a film crew captured the unrehearsed exchange that will be used in the carrier's upcoming campaign.

The TV commercials, scheduled for at least 33 spot markets, are meant to authentically illustrate how Eastern's new head will lead the No. 9 carrier back to prosperity.

The participants were told they were being filmed for market research so the spots could portray unbiased and unrehearsed dialogue.

The campaign is the first major creative work from new agency Ogilvy & Mather, New York, which grabbed the $45 million account from Lintas:New York (AA, May 14).

Sources say O&M won the account by presenting Mr. Shugrue and Eastern's marketing staff with a believable and doable repositioning strategy.

"Our marketing strategy is to reposition Eastern as a dependable airline," said George Brennan, VP-marketing at Eastern. "It was very important to demonstrate [in the ads] through reality and authenticity that a flight on Eastern was a good one. . . .

"We knew it was a mistake to script Marty Shugrue. He's not a spokesman per se. His experience and [the] confidence that he shows in spontaneous situations help to communicate the direction he brings to Eastern."

Mr. Brennan believes the strategy goes beyond the Lee Iacocca formula, which centered on Mr. Iacocca's corporate spokesman role to help turn around Chrysler Corp.

As the Shugrue campaign proceeds, employees and passengers will assume the limelight, also in unscripted situations.

Although TV will dominate the media buy, a print ad is scheduled to run later this week to introduce the campaign.

Eastern has been under federal bankruptcy protection since March 1989 when a machinists strike crippled the unit of Texas Air Corp. Mr. Shugrue's appointment as trustee meant that Texas Air Chairman Frank Lorenzo would no longer run the Eastern unit.

Separately, Texas Air today changes its corporate name to Continental Airlines Holdings, to reflect that the company's principal business is Continental Airlines, Mr. Lorenzo told shareholders at last week's annual meeting. □

Dentsu dominates Asia/Pacific

Publicis FCB leads in Europe, McCann first in Latin America

By Nancy Giges

Dentsu, Publicis FCB and McCann-Erickson Worldwide emerged as the leading networks in Advertising Age's ranking of three international geographical regions.

As the world's largest agency and with most of its income derived from its home market, Tokyo-based Dentsu dominated the Asia/Pacific region with 1989 gross income of $1.3 billion on billings of $10.1 billion.

Publicis FCB, Paris, the alliance between Publicis Communications and Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, was the leading network in Europe, with $354.8 million in gross income on billings of $2.4 billion.

In Latin America, New York-based McCann-Erickson Worldwide held the No. 1 position with $73.5 million in gross income on billings of $490 million.

Rankings are based on gross income in dollar amounts that a network derives from the region. The figures reflect the percentage of equity the network owns. Several large Japanese and Brazilian agencies didn't qualify for the rankings because they don't have offices outside their home countries.

The Japanese agencies continued to dominate the 12-country Asia/Pacific region because of their strengths in their homeland and the power of the yen against the dollar.

However, a slight decline in the yen against the dollar over 1988 opened the door for more Western-based agencies to qualify for the top 15.

Among Western-based agencies doing business in the Asia/Pacific region, Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide edged past McCann to rank No. 7, while HDM strengthened its position in the region with the acquisition of Mattingly in Australia.

This year, a South Korean agency, Cheil Communications, Seoul, also qualified for the chart, ranking No. 11.

In Europe, Young & Rubicam edged out Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising as the No. 2 network during an all-around tough year for Saatchi. HDM, experiencing a strong year, also moved up a slot to No. 8, pushing J. Walter Thompson Co. down to No. 9.

The year 1989 was another period of economic instability in Latin America. Because of the volatility of Latin American currencies, percentages of change from 1988 to 1989 weren't calculated.

Five networks—McCann, JWT, Ogilvy & Mather, Leo Burnett Co. and Saatchi—made the listing in all three regions. Only one of those—McCann—captured a No. 1 slot, and one, JWT, held a No. 2 position. Two, O&M and Saatchi, held No. 3 positions.

As a group, the top 20 agency networks in Europe accounted for gross income of $4 billion on billings of $27.4 billion. The top 15 in Asia had gross income of $3.1 billion on billings of $22.5 billion, and the top 15 in Latin America had gross income of $370 million on billings of $2.3 billion. □

RESEARCH BUSINESS REPORT

Numbers don't lie: Research woes grow

Revenues flat; companies cut costs, fight for share in the decade of data overload

By Joseph M. Winski

These aren't good times for the market research business.

The heady days of the 1980s, when double-digit industry growth generated higher sales for most companies, are over.

Research revenues of the research companies in Advertising Age's 16th annual industry review rose just 7.1% last year, down from gains of 13.9% in 1988 and more than 16% in both 1986 and 1987.

Expectations for this year are modest indeed. Companies participating in the survey say they expect revenues to grow this year by an average of 5%. Adjusting for inflation, that amounts to virtually no growth at all.

As a result, the early years of the 1990s will be marked by a new era of unusually intense competition for business.

Issues for the '90s

"Communicating that research is a wise investment, not an overhead expense."

—Elliott Young, president Perception Research Services

"We can no longer expect to grow just through industry growth," says Verne Churchill, chairman-ceo of Market Facts. "Companies are going to be out there fighting for market share."

His perspective is that of the custom research business, but it's pretty much the same story in syndicated research, particularly the scanner-based segment, where Information Resources and Dun & Bradstreet Corp.'s A.C. Nielsen Co. have been slashing costs to win business from each other (See story on Page S-10).

Issues for the '90s

"Price wars."

—Marjorie Michitti, VP-general manager, Chilton Research Services, New York

Much of the industry malaise can be traced to the mergers, acquisitions and leveraged buyouts that occurred in the 1980s in the package-goods industry, the biggest buyer of market research.

This restructuring has imposed new debt and a new cost-cutting mentality on package-goods companies, resulting in a reduction of both the size and influence of corporate research departments.

"Corporate downsizing" of research departments was one of the most frequently mentioned industry issues cited by survey respondents. Without a strong internal voice for research, companies are less likely to seek independent research from outside vendors, research industry executives say.

"The financial men have moved in to control our industry," says Sol Dutka, ceo of Audits & Surveys.

"Communicating that research is a wise investment, not an overhead expense," is a key challenge

Nielsen, Arbitron lead the pack

But robust growth of previous years evaporates

By Kenneth Wylie

Last year held the worst news yet in the research industry's recent history.

Revenue increases were off to a point where inflation virtually negated growth, according to Advertising Age's survey of the industry.

The downturn also does not discriminate, often striking the companies at the top of the heap as hard as those on the lower end of the revenue scale.

No. 1 A.C. Nielsen Co. almost doubled the industry growth average with a 10.1% jump in U.S. research revenue to an estimated $426 million in 1989. But the company fell off the 20.5% revenue growth pace established in 1988.

No. 2 Arbitron Co. took the biggest hit, dropping 9.4% to $290 million. It cites the sale of Burke Marketing Research as the reason.

Research revenues at pharmaceutical/healthcare information provider No. 3 IMS International rose 10% to an estimated $181 million in 1989, far short of the 22% growth it experienced in 1988.

Total 1989 U.S. research revenues of the 50 leading companies rose only 5.6% to $1.8 billion. (See chart on P. S-2.) U.S. research revenues of the top 50 companies grew 13.9% in 1988 and 16.8% in 1987.

Respondents to the Ad Age survey think the industry will grow only about 5% before inflation in 1990, illustrating the industry's sluggishness is not a brief phenomenon.

U.S. research revenues for the 55 research companies in this expanded 1990 survey realized marginally better percentage-gains, rising 5.7% in 1989 to $1.791 billion.

Revenue jumps, dips and doldrums in today's research field reflect the kinetic state of U.S. business generally and how it uses research specifically, according to senior research executives.

"There was no particular reason for our bigger revenue," says Catherine Paura, president of No. 20 National Research Group, which experienced the biggest U.S. research revenue gain among the top 20 with a 26.4% jump to $15.3 million in 1989.

"We focus on the entertainment industry where there was a general increase in client activity," she says. "Of course, the motion picture industry's record-breaking $5 billion box office year for '89 helped."

The 21% gain by No. 8 MRB Group resulted from a "dramatic increase in business for our Winona MRB ad hoc research company," says Joel Cantos, chief financial officer. The acquisition of Field Facts helped push No. 11 Elrick & Lavidge's 1989 revenues up 20.6% to $38 million.

The leading gainer among the top 50, No. 26 Millward Brown, ascribes its 30.4% jump to revenues generated by its Advance Tracking system that correlates advertising/promotions expenditures to awareness and sales. Millward Brown's U.S. research revenues rose to more than $11.7 million in 1989.

Arbitron, which experienced the biggest percentage decline of the top 20, saw its revenues fall 9.4% to $290 million in 1989.

"Our lower revenue was caused by the sale of Burke in 1989," says Thom Mocarsky, VP-communications. Arbitron's parent, Control Data Corp., sold off Burke to its employees in July 1989. The company now operates as No. 13, Burke Marketing Research.

The second biggest drop was experienced by Research International, which saw U.S. research revenues decline 7.1% to $19.8 million.

Marketing Director Jon Wilkinson attributes the decline to a company reorganization and "the sticky market in the U.S. that was a familiar part of business in 1989." □

How section data were compiled

Data used in preparing Advertising Age's 1990 Research Business Report came from multiple sources, including interviews and a survey distributed to research companies.

The resulting statistical and descriptive information was used in preparing the accompanying charts and background and is incorporated in the feature coverage throughout this section on the research industry.

The results of this process provided Ad Age with a wealth of data on the responding companies —and the research industry. Of all the organizations surveyed, results from 55 included the financial data that made possible their inclusion in the final tabulation, the most extensive yet published by Advertising Age.

Some of the revenue totals shown are Advertising Age estimates based on previous reports and on financial data published in public documents by the companies concerned.

Where totals showed significant increases or decreases for the year, Ad Age interviewed senior officers of the companies concerned for supporting information.

Documentation of the results is included with the chart listing the Top 55 U.S. research companies on Page S-2 □

Pollsters jockey for position in hot races

By Adam Lashinsky

A number of hotly contested U.S. Senate and gubernatorial campaigns is shaping 1990 into a banner year for political research companies.

Signing up pollsters started early for this year's elections "and every other barometer for campaign spending is up," says John Phillips, publisher of Campaign Industry News, a monthly that covers the industry.

The magazine estimates political research revenues for the 1990 election cycle (1989 and 1990) will total $42 million. Mr. Phillips believes that is higher than the revenues for the most recent comparable cycle (1985 and 1986), though those figures aren't available.

"There's plenty of business out there," he says. But an increasing number of companies are vying for that business, he adds, resulting in "some bare-knuckled competition" to win clients.

According to CIN, there are no fewer than 376 companies vying for at least some political research business in the 1990 election cycle (1989 and 1990). About 75 of them are "full-service" political consultants/researchers.

While their corporate counterparts often win gratitude—and new business—by helping a client attain a reasonable market share, for political research companies, one thing matters: winning.

Mellman & Lazarus, a Washington-based Democratic polling company, is having a busy year, says Chairman Edward Lazarus because M&L helped clients in three "landslide upsets" in 1986 U.S. Senate races—the victories of Thomas Daschle of South Dakota, Harry Reid of Nevada and Timothy Wirth of Colorado, all first-time Senate candidates.

Mellman & Lazarus is handling eight statewide races this year, including Michigan Democratic Sen. Carl Levin's defense against GOP Rep. Bill Schuette.

Individual reputations matter much more in political research than in corporate research, political researchers say.

"Each of us is known as a person" rather than a company, says Jan Van Lohuizen, Washington-based group VP of Market Opinion Research, a Republican pollster.

MOR says its clients this year include Sen. Mitch McConnell, running for re-election in Kentucky; Barbara Hafer, Pennsylvania auditor running for governor; and Arne Carlson, Minnesota comptroller and one of four candidates for the Republican nomination for governor.

"Very few of the firms have the institutional body weight to attract clients because of their [company] names," agrees Alexander Gage, a partner at Market Strategies, a Republican pollster.

Market Strategies is working on nine statewide campaigns this year, including the Schuette campaign in Michigan. Mr. Gage's other clients, all Republican, include Illinois Secretary of State Jim Edgar, who is running for governor, and freshman U.S. Sen. Dan Coats of Indiana, who is serving the remainder of Vice President Dan Quayle's term.

One of the newer operations this year is Washington-based American Viewpoint.

The Republican pollster is involved in seven statewide campaigns this year, including Republican Rep. Thomas Tauke's Senate race against incumbent Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin, Illinois Rep. Lynn Martin's bid to unseat Democratic Sen. Paul Simon and Rhode Island Rep. Claudine Schneider's attempt to gain Democratic Sen. Claiborne Pell's seat.

American Viewpoint's rise illustrates the importance of personal contacts in the business. In MEASUREMENT ELIMINATES THE GUESSWORK.

Just as measurement is critical when exploring the frontiers of space, Maritz believes it is also critical in your service quality process.

Measurement identifies specific factors that determine satisfaction, then ranks them in terms of importance to consumers. It also pinpoints your customers' expectations and determines your performance over time. Measurement produces hard numbers that eliminate guesswork from crucial marketing decisions.

Although the need for measurement is clear, the implementation process is challenging. Maritz has a long-standing reputation as a premier partner in customer satisfaction measurement. We work with you to formulate a plan tailored to your specific needs.

In an increasingly competitive marketplace, the decision to conduct customer satisfaction research is a sound one. So is your decision to contact Maritz.

Teeter pulls the strings

But Wirthlin, Harrison, Marttila & Kiley have busy slates

By Adam Lashinsky

Political researchers eyeing the Big One—the 1992 presidential campaign—know this above all:

In the "what-have-you-done-for-me-lately?" world of political consulting, research companies that help win presidential campaigns stay on top.

The undisputed current king of the polling mountain is Robert Teeter, longtime pollster to George Bush and obvious choice to direct the president's research in 1992.

Mr. Teeter is president of Coldwater Corp., an Ann Arbor, Mich.-based research and consulting company. Beyond his own involvement in a number of 1990 races, Mr. Teeter is said to wield considerable influence over which Republican-oriented researchers get which clients.

He is also on retainer to the Republican National Committee in Washington and the Ohio Republican Party.

Where Mr. Teeter waxes, Richard Wirthlin, head of McLean, Va.-based Wirthlin Group, wanes, at least in the presidential arena.

Mr. Wirthlin, Advertising Age's 1980 Adman of the Year for his efforts for President Reagan, worked for the failed presidential campaign of Kansas Sen. Bob Dole in 1988.

Mr. Wirthlin "took it on the chin," one Republican pollster says, for Mr. Dole's crucial drubbing in the New Hampshire primary by then-Vice President Bush.

Wirthlin Group is nonetheless thriving, says Neil Newhouse, a Wirthlin Group senior VP. It is working on more than eight statewide races this year, he says, including gubernatorial campaigns in Maine and Connecticut.

On the Democratic side, pollsters who worked on Gov. Michael Dukakis' dismal campaign probably aren't on anyone's short lists among potential contenders in 1992.

They are managing to keep busy this year, however. Irwin "Tubby" Harrison, president of Harrison & Goldberg, Cambridge, Mass., Gov. Dukakis' principal pollster in 1988, is working on a number of races, including the re-election bids of Michigan Gov. James. J. Blanchard and Rhode Island Sen. Claiborne Pell.

Marttila & Kiley, a Boston research firm that also polled for Gov. Dukakis, is involved in four statewide and five congressional campaigns. Prominent clients include Sen. John Kerry and Reps. Barney Frank, Joseph P. Kennedy II and Chester Atkins, all Massachusetts Democrats.

If the "I'll-dance-with-who-brought-me" axiom holds, as it has in the past in presidential politics, Sen. Bill Bradley (D, N.J.) probably will turn to Wilton, Conn.-based pollster Joe Peritz for help should the senator enter the 1992 race.

Mr. Peritz, who owns the market research firm of the same name, worked for Sen. Bradley in his successful 1984 campaign.

That was the first political effort for Mr. Peritz, but he recorded another success last year as pollster for James Florio's successful run for New Jersey governor.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo used in-house pollsters in 1986 and plans to do so in his re-election bid, a spokesman says.

"We have people who do it well. And we have great confidence in them," says Bill Mulrow, consultant to Friends of Mario Cuomo Committee.

Mr. Mulrow says he assumes the governor would use the same in-house approach should he run for president in 1992, but Mr. Mulrow, like his boss, refused to speculate on the likelihood of such a bid. □

Issues for the '90s

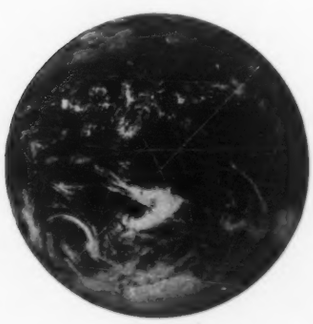
"Dropping respondent cooperation rates, unlisted telephone numbers, call-intercept technologies."

—Jim Granger, president, Wirthlin Group, McLean, Va.

Working together, we can do a world of good.

There are cynics among us who say that green is merely the latest color of the marketing bandwagon, who charge that businesses are only environmentally concerned because it helps bring in more sales.

And, to a degree, they are right.



"SAVE" has long been an effective sales promotion message.

But the truth is, Green Marketing is good for the bottom line and good for the environment.

As responsible manufacturers, retailers and agencies, we owe it to ourselves and our world to support environmental causes with all the resources at our disposal.

The right promotional environment

Before you choose an agency to promote your environmental efforts, ask these questions:

Does it have experience with cause-related issues?

Does it make sure the brand image, advertising and promotion all "fit"?

Does it screen tie-in partners to determine how easy they are to work with, and how responsible they are?

Does it produce promotions which produce sales results?

Does it win the industry's highest awards?

When it works, we all win

With the right product, the right agency and the right promotion, promoting the environment makes everyone a winner.

Consider the two highly coveted American Marketing Association SPIRE awards that QLM has won this year for consumer promotions that produced outstanding sales results and helped the environment.

One promotion brought Johnson & Johnson significant sales for a free-with-proofs Smokey The Bear plush animal, and thousands of dollars in contributions for the National Forest Service.

The other delivered a 50% sales increase to Calistoga, and a large donation to American Rivers, an organization dedicated to preserving America's free-flowing rivers.

With the right effort, we all win...including the environment.

Promotions such as these have not only done wonders for the organizations involved; they've helped future generations.

Better business for a better world

Something else wonderful often occurs as a result of Green Marketing: The businesses involved become more environmentally aware.

QLM, for instance, now uses personalized, reusable coffee mugs instead of styrofoam cups.

This simple act keeps at least 60,000 non-degradable cups from reaching landfills each year.

Giving the environment a coffee cup break.

Also, recycling bins now stand strategically located for copier paper and soda cans. And QLM is committed to using recycled paper wherever possible.

Let's work together

To discover how environmental promotions and QLM can help your business, contact Lew Ross at (609) 683-1177. (That's his mug up there.)

He will explain the many ways QLM can help your company join the Green Marketing movement, as we've helped such diverse companies as Johnson & Johnson, Perrier, Range Rover, Pillsbury and Colgate-Palmolive.

Call Lew today. Because working together, we can do a world of good.

Scanner research snared in discounting web

By Scott Hume

Electronic scanner research is becoming just the kind of product it was designed to study.

Its category is dominated by a small number of diversified companies; the product has pretty thoroughly identified and captured its core audience, changing it from a growth market to a marketshare battleground; and it is fighting product parity with discounting.

Its "new product" days over, scanner-based research finds itself looking for ways to keep its consumers interested and happy with brand extensions and "new and improved" labels.

Despite the scanner marketplace's maturation, respondents to Advertising Age's research survey suggest it has not peaked. More than 65% of them identified sales and post-sales tracking as a growth category.

"We're going to be seeing a lot of activity, a lot of action in the market this year and next," predicts Bob Warrens, senior VP-research at J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

That activity will take the form of new services and refinements in basic services. And as with grocery or household products, the increasing sophistication of scanner-based research's customers is driving the activity.

The product has been on "shelves" long enough for its customers to spot shortcomings.

The industry was born from the marriage of lasers that could scan the Universal Product Code on a product being purchased at a checkout with the computer, which remembers and collects the sales information.

The next step was the development of "single-source" data, created by coupling scanner-generated buying information with information about the purchaser, including the in-store promotions and TV advertising to which those people had been exposed.

The result has been the creation of the scanner-based research industry, whose product is a previously unimaginable amount of detailed information about purchases, purchasing habits and advertising/marketing effectiveness.

Two companies—Information Resources Inc. and A.C. Nielsen—dominate the scanner and "single-source" research market. Each has roughly half the market and is battling to boost its share at the other's expense.

The depth of those two companies' dominance, as well as the depth of the competition between them, was made clear in 1987 when A.C. Nielsen parent Dun & Bradstreet Corp. announced a deal to acquire IRI for stock valued at $572 million—a shocking 60 times IRI's annual earnings. But the Federal Trade Commission, apparently worried about the elimination of competition, votedunanimously to seek a court order blocking the merger and the deal was called off.

Less than a week after the FTC's vote, the spirit of competition was rekindled, as IRI ran newspaper ads claiming "Dun & Bradstreet blinked."

Nielsen and IRI have been battling for supremacy since. A third competitor, Arbitron, lags behind but says this is the year it will mount a serious national challenge. (See story on Page S-12.)

But while there are dozens of potential markets into which all three companies can expand, there is a smaller number of remaining manufacturers large enough to need and afford the data.

Thus, rather than bringing new clients into the scanner-research marketplace, the three are wooing each other's clients.

As with most share battles, this one has led to price cutting.

Dun & Bradstreet, in its 1989 annual report, forecasts increased revenues but flat profits from the

FOCUSVISION NETWORK™

VIDEO TRANSMISSION OF LIVE NATIONWIDE FOCUS GROUPS TO YOUR OFFICE.

Here at last! Now you can view and interact with your focus groups as they happen... in the comfort and convenience of your own conference room.

More Productive Focus research.
More of your key personnel at all levels can experience firsthand the fresh consumer insight provided by focus group research. Without travel. Without business disruption of being away from the office.

Top Management Interest.
The FocusVision concept has captured top management interest because of the implications for staff time conservation, reduction in travel expense, and research productivity.

How It Works.
A network of existing high quality focus facilities is equipped for FocusVision video transmission. You view on the large screen monitor of your in-office reception console, control two zoom lens cameras, maintain audio contact with your moderator, video tape, and hold a two-way postgroup debriefing conference.

The Bottom Line.
FocusVision Network puts the consumer right into the center of your new product development, strategic planning, and creative development process.

It's affordable. It's here now.

Futuristic weaponry

Combatants trot out flurry of scanner tools

By Scott Hume

When it comes to fighting each other for scanner-based research business, A.C. Nielsen and Information Resources Inc. are wielding increasingly formidable weapons.

The skirmish will take on an added dimension this year as Arbitron Co. increases the capacity of its electronic sales tracking system.

Having successfully convinced many grocery stores to utilize their scanner technology, research companies find the primary scanner marketplace edging toward saturation.

As a result they are focusing on expanding their service beyond grocery stores into convenience and mass-merchandise stores; improving the speed with which they can deliver data; creating proprietary software packages that can organize the reams of data produced into more accessible form; and enhancing their buying and media measurement systems.

IRI's primary entry in the syndicated scanner research market is InfoScan, which tracks buying patterns at 2,700 grocery stores in 66 markets. It also draws data from a panel of 60,000 households in which all purchases are scanned by consumers.

IRI's BehaviorScan service tracks both purchases and TV viewing at 3,000 households in each of six cities. TV viewing is monitored electronically (a device records when the TV is on and to which channels).

Nielsen's ScanTrack measures purchases at 3,000 scanner-equipped stores in 50 markets. Augmenting it is the ScanTrack National Electronic Household Panel, which tracks purchases, through hand-held scanners, by 15,000 households. In 4,200 of those households, TV viewing also is monitored.

The Nielsen Local Electronic Household Panels track purchases by 27,500 households in a total of 10 markets (through I.D. cards presented at checkouts).

Nielsen expects to be monitoring TV viewing by panel households in 25 markets by yearend.

Arbitron calls its system ScanAmerica. Since 1987, it has been solely in Denver, where it monitors 600 households. By the end of this year, Arbitron says it will expand the program to another 1,000 households in Atlanta, Chicago, Dallas, Los Angeles and New York.

ScanAmerica households also scan purchases at home with hand-held scanners. However, its data differ from IRI's and Nielsen's in that Arbitron is using people meters to monitor TV viewing. When a member of a panel household turns on the TV they first see a screen asking them to identify the family members who are watching.

"I suppose you could say we're behind [IRI and Nielsen] in terms of time, but we think we're passing them on quality," says Ken Wollenberg, Arbitron VP-sales and marketing.

ScanAmerica's use of people meters and in-home scanning of all purchases gives a more reliable data base, he claims.

Arbitron's new wrinkle, announced at this year's Food Marketing Institute convention, is CensuScan. Rather than scanning purchases at a sampling of stores within a market, the new syndicated program promises to monitor all purchases at scanner-equipped stores within a market.

The first market will be announced later this year and it will be operational in "selected markets" in 1991, Arbitron says. □

Newest IRI partnership triggers objection

Information Resources Inc. is again hearing objections concerning its plans to take on a partner.

Three years ago, the Federal Trade Commission blocked the research company's plan to sell out to Dun & Bradstreet Corp. and become a partner with rival A.C. Nielsen, a D&B subsidiary.

Now M/A/R/C says it is concerned about a "strategic alliance" announced in late May between IRI and BASES Burke Institute.

Among other things, the alliance will give BBI access to data from IRI's InfoScan, which electronically tracks grocery-store purchases.

BBI will use the data to augment its proprietary techniques for predicting the sales potential of new products.

IRI will enhance its BehaviorScan electronic test-marketing system by using BBI's Projector, a test-market forecasting system, and Sorcerer, which predicts the degree to which a new product will cannibalize existing products.

M/A/R/C has asked its lawyers to investigate the proposed alliance.

Last year, when it acquired IRI's ASSESSOR, a new-product modeling system, M/A/R/C says IRI agreed not to operate a survey-based new product test-marketing business for three years.

Bob Bregenzer, senior VP at IRI, says that the company has given M/A/R/C a copy of its contract with BBI and is confident M/A/R/C's concerns will be allayed.

Nielsen Marketing Research unit because of "sharp price competition."

"There's no question that we're seeing severe price competition in the field right now," says IRI Senior VP Bob Bregenzer. "It's a buyer's market and it's to their advantage to play [the research companies] off against each other. That's why we're hoping to add differences, other than price, that can separate us."

Says Arbitron's Ken Wollenberg, VP-sales and marketing, "[Manufacturers] are driving down rates by playing us against each other."

But all three are looking at similar value-added extensions.

One is expansion of purchase scanning out of groceries and into convenience stores, drugstores and mass merchandisers. IRI President Gian Fulgoni puts the market for data on products moving through non-grocery outlets at more than $100 million annually.

IRI is scanning in 60 convenience stores and vows to add more stores and markets this year. Nielsen started in 30 Dallas convenience stores and added 30 in Los Angeles last year.

Scanner-equipping drug chains and mass merchandisers such as K mart and Wal-Mart is at the top of IRI's agenda this year.

"Nobody is scanning purchases at the drugstores," Mr. Bregenzer says. Nielsen is unlikely to do it, he says, "because they have a very profitable business based on auditing [i.e., tracking warehouse movement of products] and I don't think they'd want to jeopardize that by doing scanning, which could present different share numbers." Nielsen doesn't see a problem.

"I think we're all moving into scanning and we think we can have the best of both [scanning and auditing] worlds," says Toni Minarich, VP-beverage marketing at Nielsen. "We won't stop auditing, because there are too many 'Mom and Pop' stores that can't afford computers and scanners. But we want to stay on the cutting edge and we feel scanning provides that to clients."

A second major value-added area of emphasis is in speeding the delivery of data.

Nielsen says it is working on lowering the lag between the end of a reporting period and the delivery of sales data from three

Powerhouses tear down Europe borders

Multinational marketers prod researchers for assimilated data

By Elena Bowes

The race to plumb the behavior and values of the new Europe is on.

Dun & Bradstreet Corp.'s A.C. Nielsen Co., AGB Research and GfK Group, Nurenberg, are among the major companies scrambling to offer usable cross-border insights for multinational marketers, who increasingly want to reach European consumers, rather than just the consumers of a given country.

"It's important that these companies produce standardized [multicountry] reports," says Tom Neumann, manager of media and programming development for Procter & Gamble Europe. "Up to now these companies were producing reports for the U.K., for France, for Germany, but not for Europe as a whole."

Advertising Age asked research company execs to pinpoint the international markets where they did the most business in 1989. West Germany and U.K. headed the list, followed by other European countries. The logistics of doing business in Australia also apparently don't scare away researchers.

Source: Advertising Age — Advertising Age graph: John Hall/Holly Seguine

At stake is a piece of one of the hottest growth markets, as demand for pan-European research soars, reflecting in part the scheduled elimination of Europe's remaining trade barriers in 1992.

Respondents to Advertising Age's Research Business Report estimated an average 11.1% of their company's 1990 growth would come from international activities. Because the survey universe included a number of small companies without the capital to consider major overseas expansion, the estimated contribution of international activities to larger companies' revenue was noticeably higher.

While there are no overall figures for spending on multicountry research vs. single-country research in Europe, demand for multicountry research is believed to be growing much faster.

For example, '89 spending on multicountry research by British-based marketers—including the many U.S. companies that have their European headquarters in England—jumped 32% to $57.4 million, more than twice the 14% increase in spending (to $324.3 million) for U.K.-only research, according to Association of Market Survey Organisations.

Nielsen recently opened an office in Lucerne, Switzerland, just to handle multicountry research; similar offices are planned in Paris and London.

Nielsen has started a twice-monthly international data base service that produces customized information on about 50 (and eventually 300) different product categories. Ten companies, including Gillette Co., Coca-Cola and Cadbury-Schweppes have bought the data base service so far, Nielsen says.

This month Nielsen, the largest market researcher in Europe, also is publishing "European Passport," a report on trends in Europe's huge grocery business that it plans to sell to companies wanting to expand their markets beyond one European country.

As recently as two years ago, European research companies had secure niches, notes Philip Barnard, former chairman of Research International, a prominent London research company owned by WPP Group.

"Nielsen had the retail audit side sewn up," while AGB and other companies like GfK and Paris-based Secodip "had the consumer panel side sewn up," says Mr. Barnard, now chairman of New York-based Decisions Center/Research International, the company resulting from Re-

Choosing A Test Market Shouldn't Be A Game Of Chance.

Of course, if you're lucky, it doesn't matter. You'll always choose the right market. But with today's megamillion dollar national rollouts, it's risky business leaving the projectability and reliability of your test marketing results up to chance.

That's why it's important that you know as much as possible about Syracuse, New York and The Syracuse Newspapers. Syracuse—one of the nation's top test markets—offers you a true slice of America. And, The Syracuse Newspapers offer you the means to precisely target your market in Central New York.

Researchers look eastward

GfK, Nielsen begin to track buying tendencies

By Elena Bowes

Major research companies see potentially fertile markets in the uncharted consumers of Eastern Europe.

GfK Group, Germany's largest research company, last month started monitoring the buying patterns of 2,000 East German households.

It also has opened offices in Hungary and Poland to do ad hoc research for international clients. GfK is also considering setting up shop in Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union.

For the moment, rival A.C. Nielsen Co., a unit of Dun & Bradstreet Corp., is concentrating its efforts on East Germany.

"As Germany unifies, at least in an economic sense, [East Germany] is not so much a geographic extension as a national completion," says Hans Guldenberg, Nielsen's regional director of Central Europe.

In a sense, East Germany presents a more promising marketing opportunity than the rest of Eastern Europe. East Germans could watch West German TV long before the Wall tumbled. They are familiar with brands like Procter & Gamble Co.'s Ariel Ultra or Jacob Suchard's Milka chocolate bars.

In some cases, East Germans have a higher brand awareness for products advertised on TV than West Germans, Mr. Guldenberg says, claiming the latter are bombarded with ads in newspapers, outdoor boards and other media, thus diluting the message.

Nielsen says it will soon open an office in Leipzig. The U.S. researcher plans to track food, drugs and durable goods in up to 100 large retail stores in East Germany's major cities. Nielsen then plans to merge this data with information gathered from diaries of TV viewing habits in about 1,000 households that shop in these stores.

Hinrich Krone, who heads Jacob Suchard's market research effort in Germany, is anxious for Nielsen or GfK to produce useful data on East German consumers.

"There is a need for all kinds of information," he says. "It is not too early to enter the GDR."

But while Nielsen and GfK are moving swiftly, other researchers are content to watch from the sidelines.

"Everyone has been caught up in the hoo-hah of political Eastern Europe," says Andy Maslen, marketing development director of Euromonitor, a British research company. "But once the political hubbub dies down, people will start weighing the costs, and they'll realize Western Europe is much less expensive and easier to market." □ search International's 1987 purchase of Decisions Center.

Now Nielsen readily admits it's moving into ad hoc research and consumer panels.

"When sales were booming, retail audits were a sufficient tool to understand where [products] were going," says Emanuele De Natale, exec VP of A.C. Nielsen-Europe. "Now that the markets have slowed down, we need to understand the consumer much better than before."

In the past year, Nielsen has bought ad hoc researchers Centrum for Marketing Analyses, Amsterdam; AIM Research, Copenhagen; and Milan-based C.R.A. With the acquisitions, Nielsen says it now tracks 25,000 European households on an ongoing basis throughout Europe.

Nielsen last year introduced its first pan-European product, Quartz, which provides simulated market tests for marketers preparing to launch a product. Rather than test the virgin product on store shelves, Quartz evaluates consumer reactions to the product concept in Europe's five major countries.

More than 25 multinationals, including Nestle, Procter & Gamble Co. and Paris-based BSN, France's largest food and beverage company, already have signed up for the service, which can cost as much as $60,000, Nielsen says.

Nielsen's rivals are by no means asleep. AGB, Europe's third largest market researcher after Nielsen and pharmaceutical market researcher IMS International, has invested $13 million over the last several years, nearly a third of its

Pollsters jockey for position

1979, Linda DiVall, American Viewpoint—president, became director of research for National Republican Congressional Committee, a party organization that aids congressional campaigns.

Five years later she set up American Viewpoint after cultivating relationships with congressional members, some of whom "obviously had statewide potential." Among them were Ms. Schneider and Ms. Martin, Ms. DiVall says.

Still, winning is the name of the game, and Ms. DiVall knows her future success will depend on her clients' performance in 1990. "This is a critical year for us," she admits with a nervous laugh.

On the opposite side of the Iowa race, working for Sen. Harkin, is Garin-Hart Strategic Research, Washington. President Geoffrey Garin sees important differences between political and corporate research.

"Politics is a lot more free-form," Mr. Garin says. Like other pollsters, he takes issue with the notion that it's mostly counting and reporting numbers. "We really get involved," he says, "not just as pollsters, but as part of the [campaign] family."

"I'm part of the strategy committee," says Mr. Garin's rival Ms. DiVall. "Sometimes in the heat of battle you tend to react to what happened yesterday. I can remind the team what the issues and agenda are."

Political ideology is another distinguishing characteristic of the political research business. Most pollsters are Republicans or Democrats, period.

"There's still a lot to be said for party loyalty in this industry," says Chris Meyer, editor of Campaigns & Elections, a trade magazine for political consultants.

"To do things well, you have to care a lot about what you're doing," says Mr. Garin. "This is not just about individuals, but also about who controls Congress."

"Life is way too short" to work for somebody you wouldn't vote for, "and this work is way too hard," says Mr. Lazarus.

While pollsters once popped up only around major elections, more and more of them are trying to ply their trade year-in and year-out.

To do so, they are getting more involved in mayoral contests and "minor" state elections, as well as in early polling for would-be candidates for major posts.

Corporate public affairs work and polling for grass-roots referendums are also growing as off-year revenue boosters.

"If you think there's tough competition for Senate races in the even-numbered years, you should see these guys scramble in the off years," says Mr. Phillips. □ weeks down to less than one. IRI is trimming delivery times down to two weeks from 24 days and is promoting a FlashScan service that provides data from 500 InfoScan stores one week after the end of a sales week.

The most profitable area of difference is computer software that can analyze and sort the scanner data and assemble it into more accessible presentations.

IRI in March introduced CoverStory, which processes InfoScan data into concise reports on the sales performances and marketing effectiveness of individual brands and their competitors.

Nielsen offers ScanFact and, in partnership with Metaphor Computer Systems, the Nielsen/Metaphor DataBank services. Both Nielsen and IRI software are compatible with each other's data-gathering systems.

Arbitron calls its 2-year-old data-sorting program Decision-Master.

"The real opportunities in the market right now are in software," IRI's Mr. Bregenzer says.

But while improvements are made in data creation for product movement, critics say the researchers should be paying more attention to the media-monitoring process that creates single-source programs.

"As soon as you say 'single source' it sounds like you're measuring everything, but you're really not," says Mr. Warrens.

"The absence of magazine monitoring, for example, is a major omission. Print measurement is a must if you're going to be making the assumption that you're checking [media] stimulus and [buying] response," he says.

Mr. Warrens says refinements in media measurement are coming and that additional refinements in product scanning are needed.

"There are questions about the accuracy of the scanning," he says. "UPCs don't always identify unique products because some manufacturers are using the same code on different sizes and varieties to get around paying the high slotting allowances."

All the questions set the stage for a pressure-filled environment for research companies.

"The power has shifted to retailers, and I think they'll get stronger. Advertisers will be stronger, too," says Mr. Wollenberg.

"That means the research companies have to look for ways to differentiate themselves and show they serve a purpose," he says. □ annual revenue, upgrading its electronic data bases.

AGB has created a new unit, AGB Insight, to come up with specialized applications of data. For example, AGB says it can fuse sales figures with TV audience measurement figures and consumer panels to tell what a particular ad campaign did for a product's sales.

Europanel, a consortium of Europe's leading consumer panel companies, including AGB, GfK and Secodip, last year began work on its first pan-European product, the European Market Measurement Database. It tracks the movement of consumer goods throughout Western Europe, gleaning information from 55,000 households. When completed by the end of this year, the data base will cover 50 categories of package goods.

Europanel also has devised what it says is a fresh way to look at Europeans, spending a year interviewing 20,000 people to come up with new categories based on behavior, attitudes and values rather than social class.

"There has always been a problem analyzing consumers across Europe," says John Whitaker, group managing director of AGB. "What sort of job you do is less important than what sort of life you lead."

Europanel questions identify specific "socio-styles." People with similar interests and beliefs form "Euro-districts" offering advertisers niche marketing opportunities, AGB contends.

For example, yuppies, which are termed "Euro-Business" by Europanel, constitute 5% of the European population, "a sizable chunk," Mr. Whitaker notes.

GfK, meanwhile, is determined to loosen Nielsen's grip on the retail audit sector. GfK already competes head to head with Nielsen in Germany's food retail audit industry, but now the German company plans to try its hand in other countries.

GfK employs a technology called Euroscan, licensed from Information Resources Inc., that allows it to merge consumer panel data with retail audit figures into one instrument to learn more about consumer behavior.

GfK now tracks 10,000 German households and sales at 200 stores. It is developing Euroscan in France and England and has plans to export it to Italy, Spain and the Netherlands.

Such single-source studies are hailed by Klaus Hehl, GfK's ceo, as "the wave of the future." □

'Sugging' threat worsens

Wolf in 'market researcher' clothing killing the field

By Joseph M. Winski

Market research really is good for consumers, the market research industry insists.

It helps manufacturers decide what products to sell. It reduces the cost—and therefore the price—of getting new products to market. And so on.

Trouble is, consumers don't know all that. All they know is that a stranger called during the dinner hour for the fourth night this week, and enough is enough.

Hence the sound being heard by more and more market researchers these days: click.

It's not a pleasant sound. It means growing numbers of consumers are refusing to cooperate with researchers, raising a major obstacle to the industry's ability to scrounge up the nationally projectible samples on which scientific market research is based.

"It's becoming a more serious problem every day," says Roger Ehle, president of Conway/Milliken & Associates.

The culprit, as Mr. Ehle and just about any other market researcher is quick to relate, is the telemarketing industry.

From market researchers' perspective, it's bad enough that all those people are selling things by telephone. What makes it worse is that too many pretend to be conducting market research.

The phenomenon is so widespread it has given rise to a research industry acronym, now several years old, describing it. It's referred to as sugging (pronounced with an "sh" sound), or "selling under the guise" of research.

"Sugging" is largely blamed for record-high respondent refusal rates. It varies by particular survey, but industry executives say refusal rates of 40% of the people approached aren't uncommon. Two decades ago, a typical refusal rate was about 15%.

Perhaps the most definitive research on the subject, the every-other-yearly "Walker Industry Image Study" by Walker Research, found in 1988 that 34% of all consumers questioned had refused to participate in at least one survey in the preceding year.

Issues for the '90s

"Shotgun legislation attempting to control telemarketing activities [and] affecting research."

—Beryl L. Levitt, president, AHF Marketing Research, New York

That was up from 24% in 1986 and the highest since the study began in 1974, says Steve Walker, a Walker Research VP who directs the image study.

Technology, which on one hand has simplified research through such things as computer-assisted telephone interviews, is also working against the research companies.

More people are screening calls with answering machines, for example. In 1988, about half of the respondents in the Walker study with answering machines who used them to screen calls said they wouldn't return calls from market researchers.

Now looming on the horizon are such additional technological "advances" as caller identification services and devices that allow people to program the numbers from which they will accept calls.

Valid research on the impact of such technologies hasn't been completed, but they "should be of concern to the industry," Mr. Walker says.

More threatening than technology may be some of the bills that legislators are throwing into the hopper to combat rampant telemarketing, often without making allowances for legitimate research.

Mr. Ehle says he has heard of proposed legislation in some states that would allow consumers to designate in their telephone directory that they don't want unsolicited commercial calls.

If proposals like that gain widespread acceptance, he says, "telephone interviewing as we know it in this country is long gone." □ for the industry, says Elliott Young, president of Perception Research Services, in his response to the Ad Age survey.

Decade of data overload

Under pressure to win business with low bids—or simply to squeeze out a profit—some research companies are cutting corners, peddling research of dubious quality.

Issues for the '90s

"Marketing research being purchased as undifferentiated 'commodity.' This has led to compromising on research quality by some firms."

—Roger E. Ehle, president, Conway/Milliken & Associates, Chicago

This further tarnishes the industry. A number of respondents to the Ad Age survey mentioned "quality" as an issue facing market researchers.

"Junk research" is "soiling the business," wrote survey respondent Norman Hecht, president of Norman Hecht Research.

At the same time, research companies are spewing out so much data that potential users are overwhelmed. They don't know what's meaningful to them, or how to use it.

A recent Advertising Research Foundation survey of 68 companies, mostly research companies and marketers, found that "data overload" is the "most characteristic" attribute applicable to the research industry.

All this has led to the most painful development of all for research companies: a sense of being out of the loop, of feeling that top management no longer views research and research people as essential to the decision-making process.

There is "a perception that market research has been oversold," says Jerry Rosenkranz, chairman of Data Development, in his survey response. A vital issue for the industry, he says, is whether research "can regain acceptability at the top management level of corporations."

Researchers' own research is underscoring the bad news.

The ARF survey found "marked declines for research reputation, quality improvement and top management support for both respondents' companies and the industry as a whole" between 1988 and 1990.

For good or for ill, technology has cut a broad swath through the industry in the last few years. Electronic scanning has been particularly significant, in effect wiping out big chunks of ad hoc, or custom, research business conducted through more traditional avenues such as by telephone or mail surveys.

"Scanning has directly hurt our company," concedes Market Facts' Mr. Churchill.

In addition, when cost-cutting corporations decide what research they must have, Mr. Churchill notes, "Right at the top they say, 'Let's monitor our share—let's buy the Nielsen data or the IRI data.'"

Custom research companies like Market Facts must scramble for what's left of the research budget, he says.

That doesn't mean IRI and Nielsen face smooth sailing. The two have divvied up about as much of the grocery-market business as they are likely to get.

IRI now is extending its scanners into drugstores—where Nielsen dominates with its manual auditing service—setting up yet another battle between the two companies for existing business.

Gian Fulgoni, IRI's ceo, admits that buyers of scanning data have a problem.

"They say to us, 'You've got data and Nielsen's got data. Now, what do I do with it?' "

Thus, the next phase—and battleground—for the scanner companies will be in applications software, he says.

"You won't be hearing about 'data overload' so much," Mr. Fulgoni promises.

Traditional research companies have hardly conceded the business to the new technology. Audits & Survey's Mr. Dutka says there remains a sizable "non-scanning universe" that will continue to buy "quality" research from his company.

In addition, for all its sophistication, scanner technology can't answer why people buy the products they do.

That's the reason researchers like Judith Langer, president of Langer Associates, and others say qualitative research will continue to flourish in the 1990s.

M/A/R/C, which claims to be the country's largest custom-research company, is betting on market-simulation models and data base marketing for much of its growth, says Sharon Munger, president and chief operating officer.

Ms. Munger says M/A/R/C also will look increasingly to the service sector for business and will rely less on package-goods companies.

She cites as fertile growth opportunities such service segments as financial, foodservice, pharmaceutical and travel and leisure companies.

Similarly, Market Facts' Mr. Churchill says his company sees growth in financial services and healthcare "picking up some of the slack" from slower sales to package-goods companies.

He also says he sees signs that "the pendulum is swinging" back to custom research from syndicated research.

"The notion that custom research is doomed is crazy," Mr. Churchill says. "As long as it can reduce risk there will be a need for it." □

Lipstein negotiates with Japanese

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Owen Lipstein is discussing a partial sale of his troubled magazine empire to a Japanese media company, a deal that would mark one of the first substantial Japanese investments in a U.S.-based publishing company.

At the same time, sources say Terry McDonell, the founder and editor of Smart—in which Mr. Lipstein holds a majority stake—is separately discussing the sale of that magazine to an unidentified U.S. media company.

"I can acknowledge that there is a discussion with a Japanese company" about New American Magazine Co., said Mr. Lipstein, who declined to identify the company. "There is a discussion that has been going on and is going on, and if something happens it would be exciting."

Sources close to New American Magazine Co. indicate the matter will be resolved—one way or the other—within the next few weeks.

One source said the Japanese company would likely back out of a deal with Mr. Lipstein if Smart were sold separately, since much of the new investor's interest is said to be in the fledgling men's title.

Mr. Lipstein said any deal involving his company would include Smart, but sources say he and Mr. McDonell disagree over whether Smart is part of New American Magazine Co.

O. Lipstein

Mr. McDonell is said to view the men's magazine as a separate property from Mr. Lipstein's other titles. Although Mr. Lipstein is the largest investor in Smart, the magazine is published by Smart American, of which Mr. McDonell is president and Mr. Lipstein is chairman.

Mr. McDonell couldn't be reached for comment last week.

New American Magazine Co., formed earlier this year after Mr. Lipstein sold his flagship American Health to Reader's Digest Association, includes Mother Earth News and Psychology Today. Publication of the latter title was suspended earlier this year, but Mr. Lipstein has said it will be refocused and relaunched in September.

Mr. Lipstein said the Japanese company would be a minority investor in his company, but sources familiar with the talks say the Japanese company wants to acquire a 50% interest and possibly a majority stake.

The price is said to be about $8 million, though what size stake that would buy is unclear. Mr. Lipstein wouldn't comment on details of the discussions.

The acquisition is said to be contingent on Mr. Lipstein reducing his company's debt, but Mr. Lipstein has said the sale of American Health left his company virtually debt-free, a claim disputed by some industry observers.

If Mr. Lipstein reaches an agreement with the Japanese company, it would represent that country's first high-profile move into U.S. publishing.

After making investments in real estate, automotive, entertainment and other U.S. industries in recent years, Japanese companies are said to be turning their attention to the publishing world.

At least three Tokyo-based publishers—Dentsu, Nikkei Business Publications and Magazine House—gained membership in Magazine Publishers of America within the past year. Dentsu is also the world's largest ad agency.

"The Japanese are interested" in U.S. publishing companies, said John Veronis, chairman of investment banker Veronis, Suhler & Associates. "They always respect brand names, they respect franchises. . . . and the Japanese are very methodical, thorough and cautious in their approach to things."

Publishing consultants note that Smart, launched in 1988, has won much praise for its editorial product but hasn't yet reached its full circulation and advertising potential.

It increased frequency to 10-times-yearly from every-other-monthly with its March issue, and claims a rate base of 250,000. □ energy resources and slightly more than four times the renewable energy resources, the study found.

Further, reusable diaper manufacture and use generate 50% more processed solid waste that must be treated, as disposable diapers often aren't rinsed after use. And the reusable diapers use more than six times more water and release nearly 10 times higher levels of total water pollutants, the study found.

"The issue has generated a lot of questions and accusations about the impact of disposable diapers on the environment," said Elaine Plummer, a P&G spokeswoman. "We did the study to confirm our belief that the environmental impact [of disposable diapers and cloth diapers] is about the same."

A spokeswoman for the National Association of Diaper Services said the group has major problems with the study and is planning to respond.

Arthur D. Little analyzed government reports and statistical surveys, including a study the association released last year that was favorable to reusable diapers.

Both P&G and Kimberly-Clark Corp., marketer of Huggies, are using lobbyists, independent research studies, direct mail appeals and information campaigns to fight anti-disposable diaper legislation. Kimberly-Clark handles its effort in-house.

The diaper marketers also are working through the American Paper Institute and the new Diaper Manufacturers Group.

"The issue is how to best manage our trash, not to apply legislation to a single product [diapers] that accounts for only 1% to 2% of the space in landfills," said Tina Barry, Kimberly-Clark VP-public relations.

At least 20 states are considering bans or special taxes on disposable diapers.

California, Hawaii, Minnesota, Michigan, Vermont, Arkansas, Arizona, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee and Washington are considering bans on non-degradable disposable diapers; a measure in Florida would prohibit the sale of any disposable diaper after Oct. 1, 1993. Special taxes on disposable diapers are pending in Iowa, Illinois, New Jersey, New Hampshire and Texas; a special tax was defeated in Wisconsin but is expected to be reintroduced.

Nebraska is the only state so far that has approved a ban on non-biodegradable disposable diapers. The ban will take effect in 1993.

"This is the fad fringe issue of the year," said Jerry Taylor, legislative director for the American Legislative Exchange Council, a non-partisan group that tracks initiatives for state legislatures. "Legislators want to make it look like they are doing something for the environment, to solve the solid waste crisis, and diapers are an easy target."

Cloth-diaper services in the past 18 months have shown a tremendous boost in households served by promoting the environment friendly aspects of cloth diapers.

According to the National Association of Diaper Services, the number of households using diaper services nationally totaled 750,000 last October, up 38.5% from a year earlier.

"We represent a reusable, viable alternative to disposable diapers, and we have tried to educate the public about that," said John Shiffert, executive director of the group.

In promotional literature, cloth-diaper services in general describe their product as better for the environment since cloth diapers don't eat up landfill space.

"The ecological impact of disposable diapers is bringing people back," said Jack Mogavero, president-chief operating officer of General Health Care Corp., whose 13 divisions include DyDee Service, one of the nation's largest diaper services.

Mr. Mogavero said company sales grew 11% in the first quarter, and he projects a 43% increase for the year.

But both P&G and Kimberly-Clark said disposable diaper sales this year remain very strong. Disposable diapers accounted for about 17% of P&G's 1989 sales of $21.3 billion. Kimberly-Clark diapers accounted for 25% of the company's $5.7 billion in sales.

Huggies is the leader, with a 32.5% share of the $3.5 billion disposable diaper market; Pampers is second with a 25.5% share, followed by Luvs' 24.5%. □ several ways of controlling this problem. Do you favor or oppose placing a tax on disposable diapers?"

Of people with annual household incomes of $75,000 or more, 50% favor a special tax while 43% do not. Only 39% of those earning less than $20,000 annually back a tax, while 50% do not.

Of those respondents ages 18 to 34, 50% oppose a tax and 42% support the idea. Those ages 35 to 54 represented the biggest opposition group in terms of age, with 57% against a tax and 38% in favor.

More men than women favor the tax concept, 45% to 34%.

Respondents also were asked if they favor or oppose "banning disposable diapers."

Forty-three percent say they support a ban while 47% are against the idea.

Of those with incomes of $75,000 and more, 60% are against a ban, while 46% of those earning less than $20,000 a year oppose it.

Among respondents ages 18 to 34, 58% oppose a ban; 34% of those 55 and older are against the idea.

The survey, with a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%, found that in the Northeast, where landfill space is at a premium, 41% of the respondents favor a ban while 48% oppose the idea.

On the West Coast, where environmental awareness is high, respondents were split evenly—44% each for and against—on the question of banning.

In the Northeast, 55% of respondents oppose a tax, but West Coast respondents were again almost equally divided. Forty-six percent say they oppose a tax, while 45% favor the idea.

Those who said they either favor or strongly favor a special tax were asked if they would still support the concept if shown that a tax would have the greatest negative impact on lower-income households. Eighty-one percent say they would.

Among those who either favor or strongly favor a ban, 86% say they still support a ban even if lower-income households would be disproportionately hurt.

Kimberly-Clark said it isn't surprised by the findings.

The company noted a national Wall Street Journal/NBC News telephone poll of 1,001 registered voters in April showed respondents favor a ban on disposable diapers by a 3-to-1 margin.

"It's easy to favor a tax or ban if it doesn't affect you, and that's partly what you'll see in surveys like this," said Tina Barry, Kimberly-Clark's VP-public relations. "The problem is that parents with children of diapering age are being made to feel the entire burden of the nation's garbage woes. For this reason, we oppose a tax that would apply only to disposable diapers and not the thousands of other products that account for 98% of the garbage in landfills."

The company said 9% of U.S. households have one or more children in diapers.

At press time, P&G couldn't be reached for comment. The company this month is launching a publicity drive, via Burson-Marsteller, Chicago, to fight efforts to ban or tax disposable diapers (see story on Page 1). □

Tim Hovland, the top money winner in men's pro beach volleyball.

"What has happened with volleyball is that through the [1984 and 1988] Olympics, it's become an extremely popular spectator sport," said Miller spokesman Dave Fogelson. "That we've been able to take the sport to non-traditional markets is evidence of its growing popularity."

Miller, which sponsors 20 of the tour's 24 events as the Miller Lite Pro Beach Volleyball Tour, is looking at extending and expanding ties with the association when its contract is up this year.

Support primarily consists of point of purchase and radio in event markets. TV is a possibility in the future, said Janey Marks, the tour's general manager and a former manager of amateur sports for Anheuser-Busch. Miller Lite's sales promotion agency is Gary M. Reynolds & Associates, Brookfield, Wis.

Heublein's Jose Cuervo tequila sponsors the remaining three events, called the Cuervo Gold Crown.

There are eight other full-tour sponsors. The first-timers are L.A. Gear, the presenting sponsor on the Miller Lite tour; Evian Waters, Fila and Kinney Shoe Corp.'s Foot Locker and Champs stores as major sponsors; and Frito-Lay, Free Style watches and Bausch & Lomb's Killer Loop sunglasses as official product sponsors. Hertz Corp. is an existing official product sponsor.

Typically, a presenting sponsor would spend in the low six figures, Ms. Marks said. She said a major sponsorship would cost in the high five figures; an official product sponsor would cost less.

The tour estimates 250,000 spectators will turn out this summer to see the two-man teams go at it. In places where there's no beach, the tour will truck in sand to build courts.

Those attending the matches are split evenly between men and women, most ages 18 to 39 with household incomes of $40,000, Ms. Marks said.

The players are sought after by advertisers as well. The most high-profile players on the circuit are "King of the Beach" Sinjin Smith and Olympic gold medalist Karch Kiraly.

Mr. Smith has deals with Bolle America sunglasses, Mikasa volleyballs and Sideout Sport, an apparel company of which he's part owner. Mr. Kiraly endorses Bausch's Ray-Ban sunglasses, Mizuno Sports footwear, Scott Hawaii sandals and Quicksilver apparel.

The tour will get its first network TV coverage in September on NBC. The network will air the Miller Lite USA national championship, played Aug. 25 and 26 in Hermosa Beach, Calif., as a 90-minute special.

The Miller Lite tour is telecast by cable's Prime Network, which claims 21 million households on 16 regional sports cable networks. The Cuervo series is telecast by ESPN. □

Hearst-'Newsweek' ad deal

NEW YORK—Washington Post Co. and Hearst Magazines are considering joint advertising buys between Newsweek and Hearst's women's titles, including Cosmopolitan and Redbook. "We are sitting down and seeing, between our magazines, if there are any accounts where we could work together," said Mark Goldschmidt, VP-director of marketing and planning, Hearst Magazines. He said the companies should start approaching advertisers with proposals within the next month. The categories that might make sense, he said, include beer and "anything with a promotional kick to it."

Chrysler, Fiat steer toward major linkup

By Raymond Serafin

Chrysler Corp. and Italy's Fiat are in intense negotiations that could result in major new links between the No. 3 U.S. automaker and Europe's No. 2, say sources close to Chrysler.

One source said the deal, if completed, could go as far as Fiat buying a significant —but likely minority—equity stake in Chrysler.

That would give Chrysler a needed cash infusion for capital projects and new-product research & development.

A close working relationship between the two companies would open up a slew of development, distribution and marketing opportunities in both the U.S. and Europe.

The possible linkup could "give Chrysler the best position it could possibly have in Europe," said Thomas O'Grady, president of Integrated Automotive Resources, a marketing consultancy.

Though it has a weak U.S image, Fiat is a major player in Europe, encompassing the Fiat, Alfa Romeo, Lancia and Ferrari brands.

The deal could give Chrysler access to the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries, since Fiat has already forged partnerships with auto companies in those emerging consumer markets.

A spokesman for Chrysler characterized as "rumor and speculation" the possibility of a new Chrysler/Fiat venture. He said Chrysler has frequent discussions with a number of auto companies about possible areas of cooperation.

Chrysler and Fiat already are linked via a

Int'l split on fighting ad rules

IAA, Geier differ on who should handle lobbying effort

By Nancy Giges

HAMBURG—International advertisers, agencies and media are waging a furious debate over how to fight strict ad regulations being proposed in Europe in advance of becoming a single market in 1992.

The debate erupted at the International Advertising Association's 32nd World Advertising Congress here last week, where more than 1,000 participants heard speakers sound the alarm.

"Ever more repressive government regulations coupled . . . with punitive taxation are fearful threats," said Philip A. Geier Jr., chairman-ceo of Interpublic Group of Cos., New York.

The European Community is considering regulating ads for everything from cigarettes to corn oil.

In fighting the proposals, IAA leaders favor having the lobbying effort handled by a strengthened European Advertising Tripartite. The organization is affiliated with the European Association of Advertising Agencies now but is expected to become independent later this year.

But Mr. Geier argued that the tripartite isn't strong enough and urged establishment of an Advertising Council of Europe, similar to the U.S.' Leadership Council.

"I fully endorse formation [of a council] and will direct Interpublic's resources to that end," said Mr. Geier, who added that his agency holding company would pay half of a council director's salary.

Roger Neill, newly elected IAA president and London-based ceo of Bozell Europe, said the IAA would put funding into an effort by the European Advertising Tripartite.

Norman Vale, the IAA's director general, described the lobbying discussions as Big 3 unite behind NBC ratings policy

By Wayne Walley

The Big 3 networks ended the upfront stalemate last week by adopting a uniform viewer-counting plan, devised by NBC, that would reduce their liability for advertiser make-goods.

The explosive issue could still turn the projected $4.4 billion advance selling season into a giant free-for-all at the bargaining table.

Media buyers said they would grudgingly accept the network terms if that's what it takes to get in the door, but they stressed guarantees remain negotiable.

"If the network wants you to agree to the guarantee policy before you get a plan and you are in a very competitive category, you sign and then negotiate from there," said Chuck Bachrach, senior VP-director of network and programming for Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles.

"Let's be realistic," said Arnold Chase, VP-director of network operations for Bozell, New York. "If the networks hold firm, people will accede to it and then go into negotiations."

"Everything is negotiable," said Larry Hoffner, exec VP-network sales for NBC. "But this is our basis of sale this year. It is not in our best interest to go through what we've gone through and then throw [the new guarantee policy] out. . . .

"But this is not a long-term solution—it's stopgap. There is no higher priority than to develop a new system" of audience measurement.

NBC delivered a 20-page packet to agencies last week explaining the new policy, which uses eight-year viewing trends for all network TV, as well as cable, syndication and independent stations, to project usage levels for the 1990-91 TV season.

If TV usage levels reported by Nielsen Media Research inexplicably drop below those projections, the network will adjust audience delivery to ease responsibility for make-goods—ad units given free to advertisers to make up for shortfalls of guaranteed ratings.

"Let's be realistic. If the networks hold firm, people will accede to it and then go into negotiations."

Mr. Hoffner said the plan recognizes decreases in the number of people using TV in recent years, and the network will cover what it considers to be a "normal" drop in TV usage.

"We will be responsible for the performance of our programs," Mr. Hoffner said. "For example, if we expect a [persons-using-TV] level of 40 and Nielsen reports a PUT level of 40, and we deliver a million less viewers [than guaranteed], we will pay off with make-goods."

ABC, which had introduced a similar policy using a formula comparing TV usage to three-year averages (AA, June 11), adopted the NBC approach last week "in the best interest of the entire advertising and television network communities."

CBS, despite intense pressure from advertisers and agencies to offer ratings guarantees without modifications, said the NBC plan is "in principle acceptable to us" after considering several options.

Agency sources said CBS doesn't necessarily agree with the NBC projections but will use them rather than confuse the market by creating another policy.

Lawrence Cole, exec VP-U.S. media director at Ogilvy & Mather, maintained the networks have yet to produce any hard evidence there was any problem with Nielsen's numbers.

All three networks have been eager to change the system after an unexplained plunge in TV viewership and an ensuing ratings shortfall earlier this year forced them to give advertisers an estimated $200 million in make-goods.

With the new policy in effect, some agency executives expect upfront sales for the new fall season to start moving with the auto companies and movie studios first in line.

The movie studios, however, might surprise the networks by pushing for some form of ratings guarantees this year.

"I know my client is" asking for ratings guarantees, said Dick Ma-

Green Seal unveils plan

Colgate, Kimberly-Clark, P&G not interested

An Advertising Age roundup

Green Seal Inc. last week unveiled the first five product categories for its environmental Green Seal seal of approval program.

Those categories are light bulbs, laundry cleaners, house paints, toilet paper and facial tissue.

Many marketers including Colgate-Palmolive Co., Kimberly-Clark Corp. and Procter & Gamble Co. said they're wary of the non-profit organization's program and will wait to see whether government guidelines for green claims are established.

Green Seal will try to determine which products are most environmentally friendly based on their entire life cycle, said Norman Dean, the program's executive director.

The first seal will be awarded early next year. Approved products can use the seal in advertising and labeling for three years. Category criteria and participation costs haven't been determined.

So far, major marketers don't appear excited about Green Seal.

"We are not a supporter of this type of [private third-party endorsement] program," said Bob Murray, Colgate-Palmolive's director of corporate communications.

The company markets concentrated Fresh Start detergent and is testing another detergent, Fab Ultra. Both could be considered environmentally preferable.

Kimberly-Clark, marketer of Kleenex facial tissues, also has no plans to seek the seal, said Tina Barry, VP-public relations.

P&G is unlikely to participate, said Deborah Anderson, director of environmental coordination. The company last week expanded a test of super-concentrated detergents and the concentrate Downy Refill carton.

"We are wary of environmental decisions being made by a third party," she said. "We want to see . . . definitions of what is considered environmentally friendly . . . from the government.

"Right now, there's no consensus on what the criteria should be. . . . for environmentally friendly products, even among environmentalists," Ms. Anderson said.

Scott Paper Co., a major bathroom and facial tissue marketer, is undecided about participation.

"We've heard a lot of terms bandied about, but what does 'environmentally friendly' mean?" asked MaryAnn Hagerty, manager of editorial services.

"At some point down the road, I could see a program like Green Seal being helpful," said Andrew Doyle, executive director of the National Paint & Coatings Association. "But until the government gets involved, it looks like there won't be any agreement on criteria and definitions, such as what 'environmentally correct' means."

Glidden Co., a major paint marketer, hasn't decided whether to participate, said Charles A. Carpenter, VP-marketing services.

"Each state, city and municipality seems to be developing environmental guidelines about paint and everything else, and it's going to be impossible to create packaging to satisfy each one," he said.

General Electric Co., the largest producer of household incandescent light bulbs, said it's too early to consider participation.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Attorneys General has been working with the Federal Trade Commission on establishing environmental guidelines.

And U.S. Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D., N.J.) plans to introduce legislation requiring the Environmental Protection Agency to set

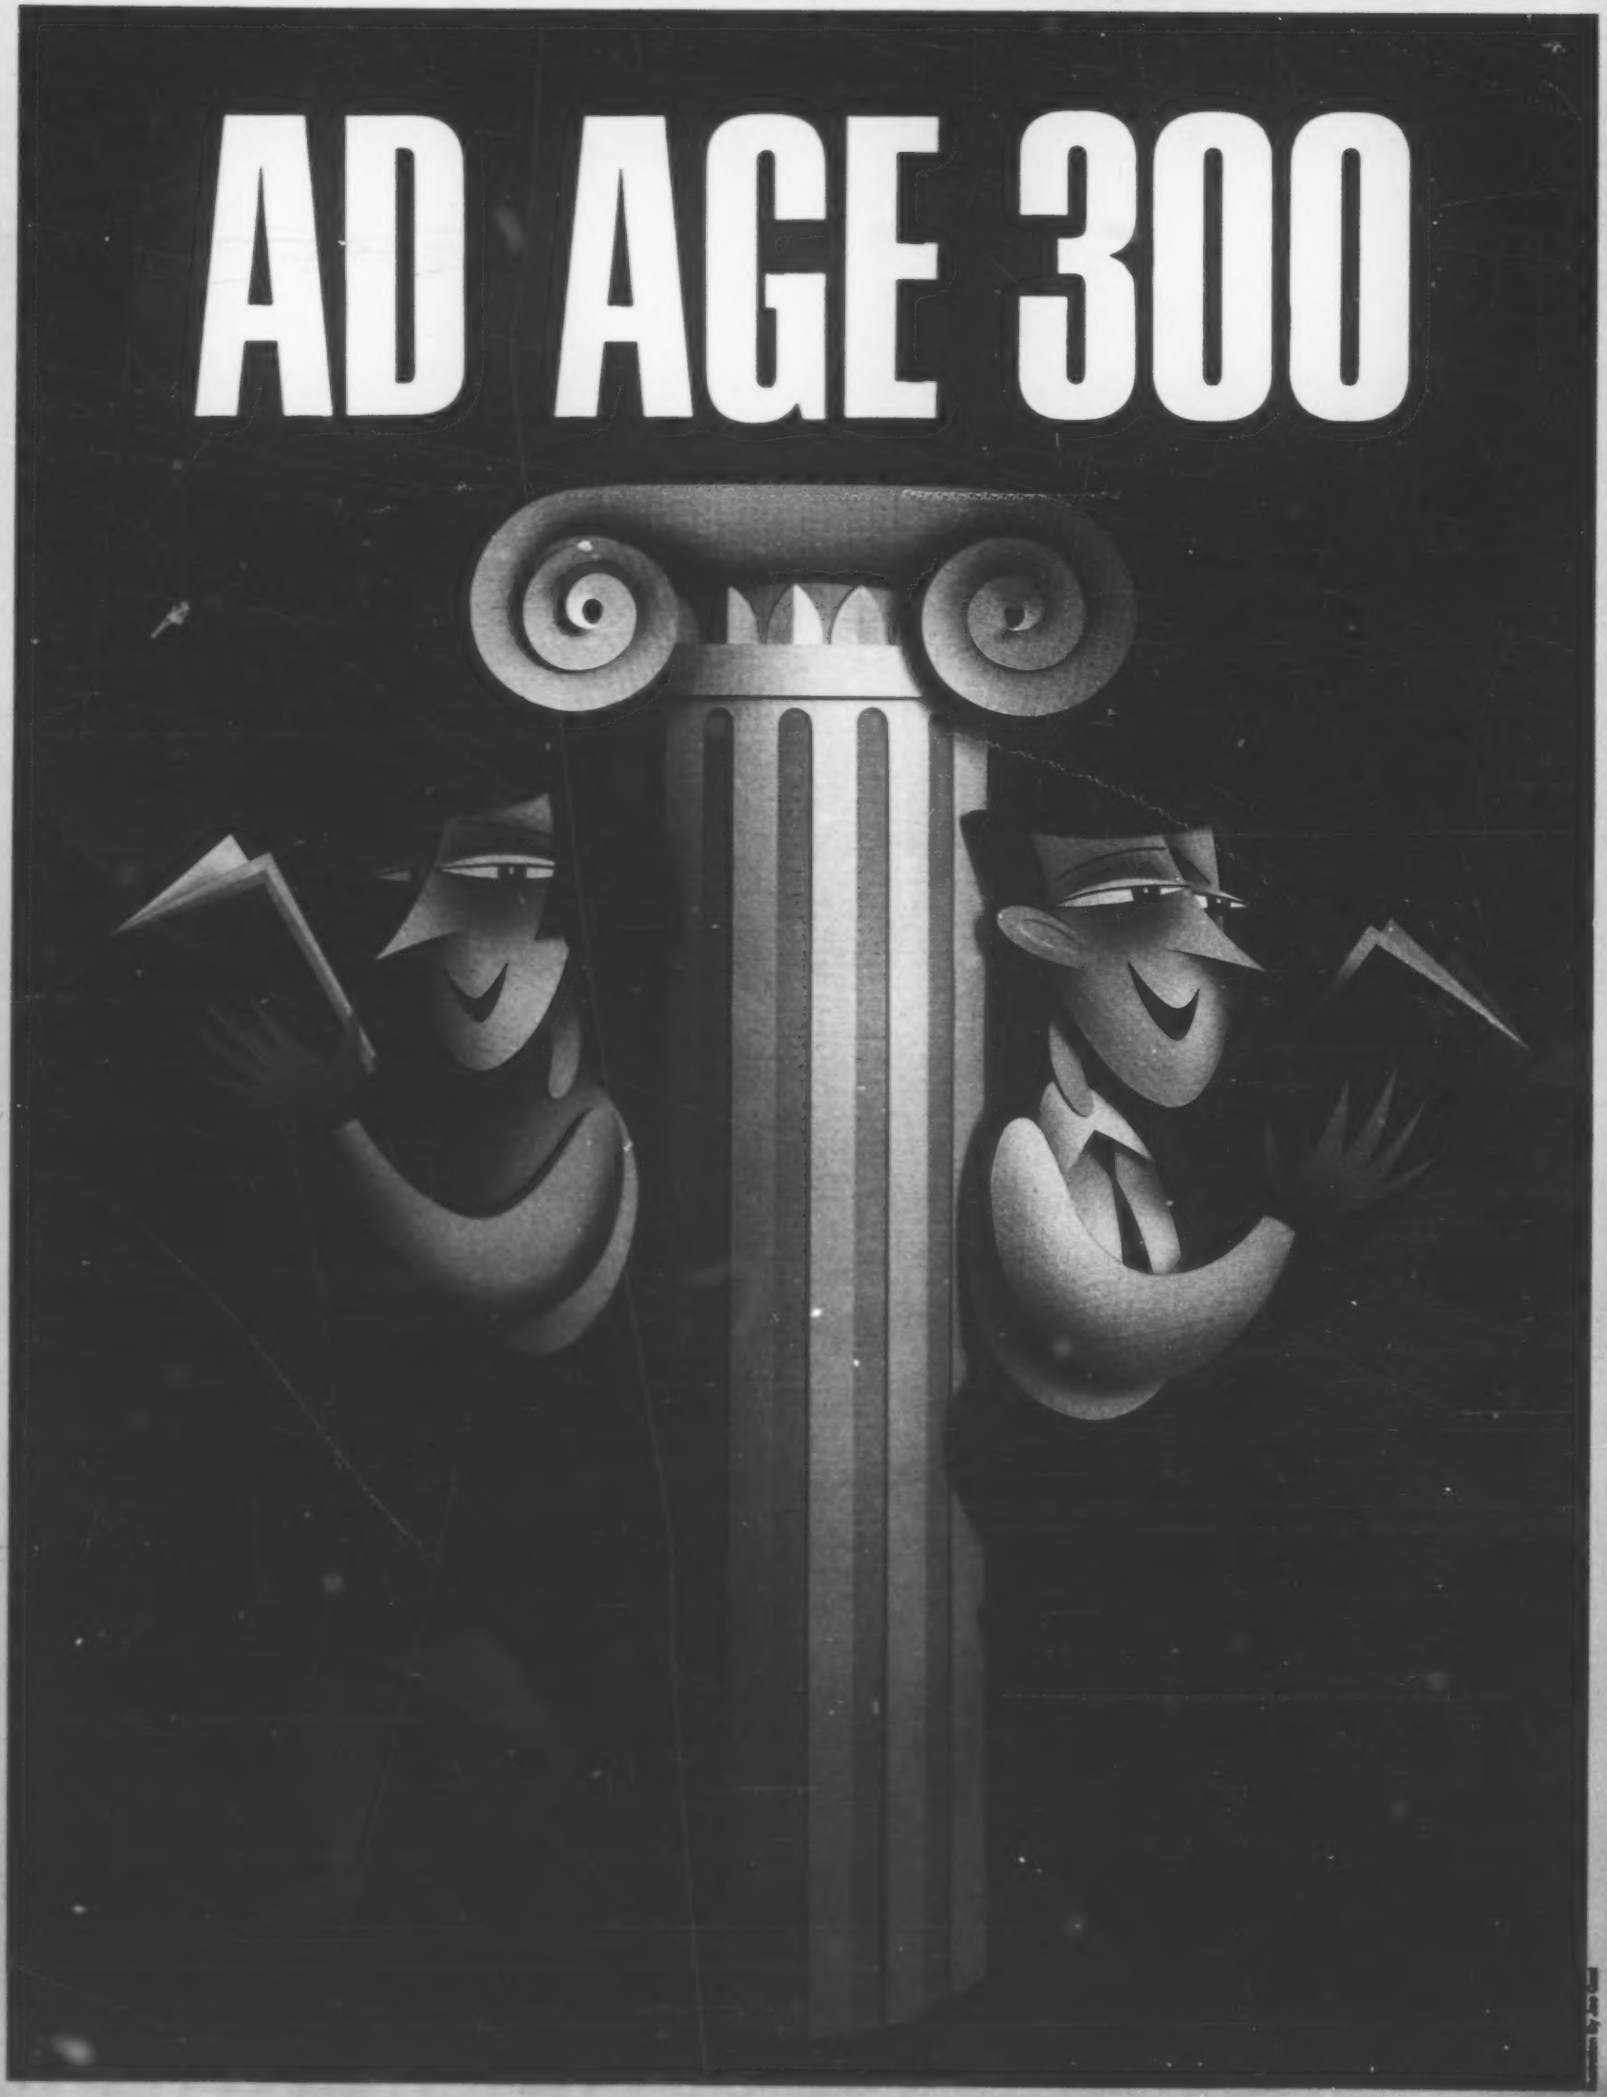
AD AGE 300



Top 300 push total revenues over $16 billion

Newsstand sales sag; ad revenue strong; 'TV Guide' leads Time trio

By R. Craig Endicott

A hefty boost in advertising rates coupled with a modest improvement in ad pages brought double-digit growth in advertising to the nation's leading magazines in 1989, according to this first-time report of the Ad Age 300.

That growth of 11.5% pushed gross ad revenues of the nation's top 300 magazines to $9.64 billion. Circulation added $7.03 billion in revenue, up 3.7%, to propel total revenues to $16.67 billion, up 7.9%.

The one fly in the ointment was the performance at the newsstand. There, sheer volume may encourage more browsing than buying.

Single copy sales actually declined 5.5% for the AA 300 as a whole. A price-per-issue increase of 3% helped newsstand revenues stay unchanged from the prior year at $2.25 billion.

Hands-down leader in total gross revenues at $928.3 million was TV Guide, which belied the AA 300's advertising performance while contributing to the doldrums at the newsstand.

The News Corp. publication slipped 3% in ad revenues to $323 million and fell another 3% in newsstand revenues to $281.9 million. TV Guide's numbers carry so much weight within the 300 that if its newsstand totals were excluded from the aggregate, newsstand gross revenues would have grown 3.6% for the 300.

Time Warner claimed the next three positions with Time, People and Sports Illustrated, respectively, all of which had greater ad revenues than TV Guide, bettered only by Time in 1988. Time Warner surged far ahead of the pack in 1989 gross revenues as its 11 publications among the AA 300 accounted for $2.5 billion, up 5.2%. Some $1.47 billion of that was advertising, up 7.3%.

Three other group publishers joined this billion-dollar club based on total revenues from their magazines in the AA 300—News Corp. got $1.25 billion from nine publications; Advance Publications received $1.14 billion from 13 publications; and Hearst Corp. pulled $1.02 billion from 15 publications. Time Warner's gross ad revenues far outdistanced Advance Publications' $877.8 million, a sizable 16.3% increase from the prior year.

A magazine's entry to the AA 300 required gross revenues of $11.6 million (see Page S-18 for definition of gross revenues). American Heritage, a Forbes Inc. publication, pulled down the No. 300 spot with that total, representing a 23% growth from the previous year.

The top 10 remained stable from 1988 levels, with only Better Homes & Gardens declining in rank.

A narrow 2.4% year-to-year growth dropped BH&G from No. 7 in 1988 to No. 9, clearing the way for Parade and Business Week to climb one notch each to No. 7 and No. 8 in 1989 based on total revenue growth of 18% and 12.8%, respectively.

the chart's top 100, rising to No. 67 in 1989 from No. 94 in the prior year.

There were no frequency jumps or repositionings for the Advance publication, just more crowd-pleasing editorial that prompted advertisers to pay 20% more for a full page and boosting total ad pages by 24.6%. Advertising gross revenues rose 51% to $41.6 million.

For the Ad Age 300 as a whole, their increase in ad revenues was keyed to a collective growth in ad rates of 10.8%, because ad pages increased only 4%.

This pattern is being played out again in the first five months of this year by consumer magazines, albeit at far reduced growth levels, according to Publishers Information Bureau. PIB reports total ad revenues up 1.2% on a 4.3% decline in pages.

Ad rates for monthlies in the AA 300 increased 18.1%. Ad pages also advanced 9.1% helping to boost the group's total advertising to $3.77 billion, up 12.6%.

Magazines with a weekly frequency added $2.99 billion in gross ad revenues, up 8.3%, the result of a mix of 9.9% growth in ad rates and 0.4% in ad pages.

Among magazine classifications, "news, weeklies," consisting of only eight publications, pulled the largest ad dollar volume of any category, although the class's results were fairly flat across the board.

This group, which accounts for nearly one-fifth of all advertising among the Ad Age 300, advanced 4.6% to $1.83 billion in advertising and only 0.5% to $1.66 billion in circulation.

The "general interest" class, represented by 27 publications, accounted for 11% of the 300's total advertising.

This class—led by No. 5 Reader's Digest, No. 7 Parade, No. 13 National Geographic, No. 14 National Enquirer, No. 21 Star Magazine and No. 33 USA Weekend—is heavily circulation-driven. It pulled $1.38 billion in circulation revenues, up 3%, and $1.06 billion in advertising, up 13.3%.

The class's strong circulation volume pushed it past the "women's" class in total volume with $2.43 billion compared with $2.3 billion for "women's" magazines.

However, the "women's" group was particularly strong in ad revenues with $1.21 billion of the total coming from advertising, up

Carl and Norma McLeod
Home: Riverdale, California
Occupation: Own two Ford dealerships
Activities: Golf, fishing, and breeding racing quarter horses and thoroughbreds. They keep a 40' Teton 5th wheel trailer in Palm Springs and travel in a 33' Apollo motorhome.

1½ Million Active Seniors Travel With Us

To be recreational-vehicle enthusiasts like Carl and Norma McLeod requires an enviable combination of qualities. They are young at heart. They are active. They are affluent and have the time to enjoy themselves.

Trailer Life and Motorhome have 1.5 million readers like the McLeods. Our average reader is over 50 years old and 55% are retired. They have worked hard to accumulate an average net worth of $222,000, and with the kids grown and the house paid for, their income is highly disposable. They have spent $7.9 billion on their RV's and lavish $195 million a year on their traveling homes. Their lifestyle makes them excellent prospects for sports, health and fitness equipment, automotive accessories and a range of consumer goods from pain relievers to gourmet food. They are at a time in their lives when they are most concerned with life insurance and how their money is invested.

They are unique in the seniors market. They have the time and the means to get the most out of life. For more information call Janet VanBibber in Elkhart, IN., (219) 295-7820 or K. D. Mattox in Irvine, CA., (714) 955-0150.

18.5%. Thirty-three magazines—led by No. 10 Family Circle, No. 11 Good Housekeeping, No. 15 Woman's Day, No. 16 Ladies' Home Journal and No. 17 Cosmopolitan—fell into this classification, by far the largest class membership among the 300.

The "automatic data systems" class dominated trade publication revenue totals while finishing fifth among all classes. The class is comprised of 19 computer magazines, eight of which claimed positions within the top 100 consumer and trade publications.

Total revenues of the class grew 31.3% to $821.5 million. That breaks down to $526.3 million in advertising, up 32.5%; and $123.8 million in circulation, up 24.5%.

PC Magazine, ranked No. 20 overall, characterized growth in this field as its total revenues rose 36% to $182.8 million, $147.3 million of which was advertising, up 38.8%.

Class member No. 124—PC Computing—outraced all publications in advertising and circulation revenue growth. It was a lesson of getting the most with the most. The Ziff Communications publication drew $17.8 million in gross advertising, up 337.2%, and $12.5 million in gross circulation revenues, up 311.6%. The magazine went from five issues in 1988 to 12 in 1989, more than doubled its rates and doubled its ad pages. The subscription price shot up 25%, which hardly scared away the faithful. Paid subscriptions soared by 65%.

PC Computing also carries the fifth lowest CPM among the trades at $21.50, a substantial boost of 60.4% from CPM levels in 1988 when ad rates were considerably lower. The New England Journal of Medicine remained the best buy at a cost of $17.46 per thousand subscribers.

Strutting with the heaviest CPM of all was No. 202 Daily News Record, with a CPM of $386.88 that rivals the prices of the Giorgio Armani suits it coined as the Ivy League sack suits last year.

Advertisers certainly didn't balk at the price last year either, as ad pages took off 17.7% despite a 9.5% boost in ad rates to $8,540 for a one-time b&w ad. Circulation slipped 3.2% but the daily still put the advertiser in the hands of 22,074 paid subcribers and a pass-along crowd of 89,658 who make buying decisions in the highly competitive men's garment

How magazine data and ranking criteria were assembled

What is a magazine?

The question arose in the early stages of the Ad Age 300 as data came in on publications that carried no advertising, on regional business newspapers and on Sunday rotogravure magazines of leading metropolitan newspapers.

As a list of more than 1,500 magazines was compiled, the diversity of these publications spoke of a richness in the industry. Rather than exclude properties that might seem marginal to traditionalists, the editors opted for inclusiveness.

Virtually all publications in the Ad Age 300 were listed in the consumer and business magazine editions of Standard Rate & Data Service, a compendium of rates and data used by buyers of magazine space.

Data for non-advertising-carrying publications, like "Consumer Reports," "Consumers Digest" and "Highlights for Children," were gleaned from other sources. Data on Sunday magazines distributed by metropolitan newspapers were obtained from SRDS' newspaper directories.

Ranking criteria

A magazine's ranking was determined by total gross revenues from advertising and circulation.

Most advertising revenue data were obtained initially from advertising monitoring services.

For the non-monitored publications, ad revenues were estimated by multiplying the one-time b&w rate times total ad pages. The use of the one-time b&w rate is an industry standard and allows for multiple, discount and color buys. The greater a magazine's four-color advertising, the less of a barometer it becomes. AA seldom applied this formula, however, because advertising pages and revenue totals were available for most of the publications.

Gross circulation revenues were the sum of subscription and newsstand revenues. Subscription revenues were determined by multiplying the paid subscriptions by the subscription price for the respective year. Newsstand revenues were found by multiplying single copy sales by the price per issue by frequency.

Circulation revenues for association magazines were determined by multiplying total subscriptions by the amount of the annual membership fee accorded the magazine. Sunday magazines appearing in newspapers were not credited with circulation revenues. Only the North American circulation and advertising pages and rates were included for multinational publications.

Each publisher was contacted to verify the data. Publishers often revised the numbers. For example, several publishers added advertorial pages to their Publisher's Information Bureau page totals because PIB no longer counts advertorials. Others added additional revenues for classified advertising.

Monitoring sources

Advertising was pulled from the following sources:

Publisher's Information Bureau monitors 172 of the largest consumer publications on a monthly basis, breaking them out by total ad pages and ad revenues. PIB uses gross one-time rates, including premium charges, but excludes commissions and frequency or volume discounts.

MMS-Rome Reports was the primary initial source for advertising pages and revenues for 640 business-to-business publications. Rome applies rate card rates, including color and cover premiums, for each ad but does not factor in frequency discounts.

AdScope Inc. covers 175 publications in computer, electronics and telecommunications sectors. It applies a one-time rate to its page counts and does not allow for frequency discounts. It was the major source for computer publications in the Ad Age 300.

Patterson Advertising Reports tracks 166 magazines in 22 categories, both trade and consumer. Patterson uses six-times b&w rate rather than the one-time rate in determining dollar amounts for total pages.

PERQ Research Corp. monitors healthcare publications and products. It provided data on American Journal of Nursing, Nursing and RN. PERQ applies a gross rate card average, factoring in frequency discounts based on monthly studies of ad placement. It monitors more than 400 publications.

Space Analysis Systems surveys 500 trade and consumer magazines in 58 markets and applies a one-time b&w rate to the page count.

FRESH AIR FOR STALE MEDIA PLANS!

Introducing Air Group One: Now reaching nearly 7,000,000 affluent passengers monthly via Delta SKY and TWA Ambassador inflight magazines.

Individually, they're formidable fits for any upscale-directed media plan: Award-winning Delta SKY reaches some 5.4 million passengers monthly; its readers have a hefty median household income of nearly $103,000.

TWA Ambassador's high-level editorial reaches over 2 million professional/managerial types each month; with median household income approaching $100,000.

Bought singly, or together, under the wing of Air Group One as a combination buy, Delta SKY and TWA Ambassador make a direct hit on the professional/managerial target market. At a four-color bleed CPM significantly lower than any monthly or weekly general business or news magazine.

As if that weren't enough, the 1989 Spring MRI showed Air Group One's audience indexing well above the norms of average magazine readers and television viewers. But then, as we've seen, our readers are anything but average.

Carve out a higher share of market with Space Analysis.

The indispensable sales management tool!

Successful publishing companies – large and small – stay on top of their respective markets and ahead of the competition with up-to-the-minute competitive ad tracking provided by Space Analysis Systems.

What kind of information? Virtually any marketing intelligence you need, from custom share-of-market data to sales-call and product trend reports. Produced in a clear, concise format. And with such a high degree of accuracy that many Space Analysis clients use them to compute performance compensation for their salespeople.

Your data can be reported by territory, product classification, size, rank, or just about any criteria of interest. Use them to establish key and target account "hit lists" and as a diagnostic resource for tracking lost advertisers and sales territories in need of attention.

The best news is that you don't have to be a publishing giant to afford Space Analysis services. Even publishers with small sales forces and only a few competitors find the cost of our reports surprisingly low, even compared to the in-house alternative.

Stay sharp . . . and informed . . . with Space Analysis Systems. Call Lee Fredericks at (215) 784-0404 for sample reports and details on how you, too, can have the "Competitive Edge."

published by MIN Publishing, tracks monthly ad page volumes for various consumer publication classes. It was particularly helpful with regional city magazines.

Ad Age's monthly Consumer Linage Report is a listing of ad page totals and year-to-year cumulatives for 430 consumer magazines. Data are supplied by publishers.

Circulation data for most consumer publications were obtained from the Audit Bureau of Circulations' Fas-Fax Report for Dec. 31, 1989, which also included prior-year figures. Annual subscription price and single-issue prices for corresponding years were obtained from SRDS or the publisher.

The circulation data source for trade publications was Business Publications Audit of Circulation.

Classifying

Magazines were sorted by SRDS classification code. An individual magazine's code is included in its index listing on Page S-25. That classification determined placement in the chart "Top SRDS categories by total revenues" on Page S-24.

Magazines were ranked by their parents (Page S-24) rather than publishing unit because the parent often contains more than one publishing unit and ultimate control is vested in the parent.

Publishing units whose properties were merged into a parent total include Conde Nast Publications in Advance Publications, Cahners Publishing in Reed International, Billboard Publications in Affiliated Publications, Murdoch Magazines and Triangle Publications in News Corp., Fairchild Publications and Chilton Publications in Capital Cities/-ABC, Penton Publishing in Pittway Corp., Diamandis Communications in Hachette, Southern Progress in Time Warner, and Ziff-Davis Publishing in Ziff Communications.

Totals for magazines that underwent a change in ownership within the last year were assigned to the current owner. For example, Sunset magazine is credited to Time Warner, which only last month purchased the magazine's parent, Lane Publishing. □

Kevin Brown, Craig Endicott, Gregg Runburg, Norma Green, Junu Kim, Sarah Polster, Doug McClain, Alicia Lasek, Lisa Johnson and Julie Doherty compiled information for this report.

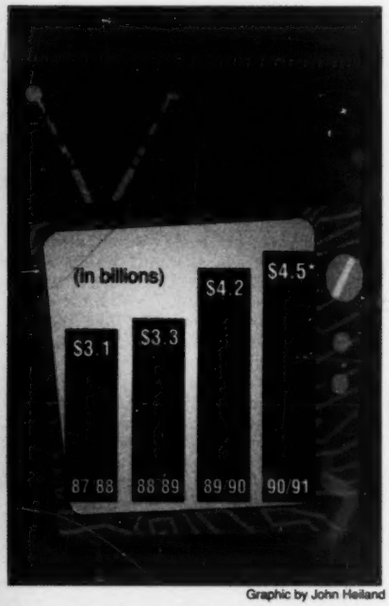
Hollywood fuels TV upfront

By Wayne Walley

Hollywood's movie studios, picking up the slack from flat-spending automakers, helped ignite what will be a record $4.5 billion upfront selling season for network TV.

Ratings guarantees, expected to be one of the most volatile issues in negotiations (see related story on Page 60), have been all but ignored as each network is asking for, and getting, price increases of as much as 20% on a cost-per-thousand basis.



Graphic by John Heiland

Although agency media buyers earlier said this would be a bitter and hard-fought sales period, deals were quietly and quickly completed last week in what one buyer described as "a surreptitious upfront."

"Agencies bitch to the networks, we bitch to the agencies—everyone bitches. But when it comes time for upfront, everyone folds," said an executive with a major advertiser.

Agency sources said entertainment spending is up "appreciably," maybe as much as $150 million, and would more than cover a shortfall in automotive sales.

The car companies drove the upfront market into a frenzy last year by spending more than $700 million, but they're spending less this year, perhaps $600 million to $650 million.

"Fox [Broadcasting Co.] could have sold out every avail on Thursday to the movie companies if they wanted to do that," one agency source said. Fox's new Thursday night lineup is anchored by "The Simpsons."

"No one is meeting planning costs again," said an agency executive who asked to remain anonymous. "Everyone is in an absolute snit over price increases."

ABC initially asked for CPM increases of 25% for non-auto and non-movie categories, agency sources said. At least one major agency has closed a deal with the network at 18%, said buyers who refused to name the agency.

Top-rated NBC and third-ranked CBS also were said to be asking for more than 20% in CPM increases and making deals in the midteen range.

Fox, the fourth network, was getting CPM increases ranging from 20% to 42% from the movie studios.

"The Simpsons," thanks to the demand, was getting as much as $300,000 for a 30-second spot, sources said.

Even though the marketplace has been tough, many say it doesn't compare with last year, when the market moved so fast deals were written in the middle of the night.

Network and agency sources now expect advance sales for prime-time programming to be near completion by the end of this week, with network news, daytime and late-night sales to follow quickly.

"Stuff is happening, but there isn't the same panic as last year,"

U.S. agencies bag 5 Gold Lions at festival

By Laurel Wentz

CANNES—A U.K. campaign for Maxell audiotapes won the Grand Prix at the International Advertising Film Festival here last week.

Three-year-old London agency Howell Henry Chaldecott Lury beat out a British Airways spot by Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, London, and a Chanel spot from France for Egoiste perfume for men, created in-house.

The U.S.'s chance to win the top honor was diminished when Chiat/Day/Mojo's Energizer Bunny campaign for Eveready Battery Co. got thrown out by judges on the grounds it wasn't original (see related story on Page 56).

But U.S. shops did pick up five Gold Lions, including four from regional agencies, seven Silvers and 17 Bronzes.

Gold winners included BBDO Worldwide, New York, for its "Ray Charles" spot for Diet Pepsi, in which the blind musician tastes the difference when someone switches his Diet Pepsi with Diet Coke.

Other, unexpected winners included Minneapolis-based Fallon McElligott's "Handshake" spot for First Tennessee Bank, in which two men do a bizarre ritual greeting to show how hard it is to get a loan from other banks. Earle Palmer Brown Cos., Bethesda, Md., won a Gold for "Frank's Return" for Bob's Big Boy, in which a man returns home to his remarried wife after 15 years at a Big Boy.

Heileman taps Della Femina

LA CROSSE, Wis.—G. Heileman Brewing Co. consolidated its approximately $20 million in ad business at Della Femina McNamee, New York. The agency also picked up $10 million in sales promotion spending, previously handled by a variety of shops. Previous agencies were Borders, Perrin & Norrander, Portland, Ore., and Seattle (Henry Weinhard); W.B. Doner & Co., Baltimore (Colt 45 malt liquor); Chiat/-Day/Mojo, San Francisco (Rainier and Lone Star); and Young & Rubicam, Chicago (Old Style and Special Export). Della Femina's Pittsburgh office previously had the Iron City brands of Pittsburgh Brewing Co., a Heileman sister company. The size of the Heileman account may hinge on how the brewer's debt is restructured. The restructuring—expected to be completed by week's end—is likely to put Heileman's banks in firm control, removing Australian brewing and media executive Alan Bond as a major factor.

Texas threatens Ragu

AUSTIN, Texas—The Texas Department of Health is threatening to seize Ragu Fresh Italian pasta sauce in a labeling dispute. The department said in a letter to Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu Foods unit that the state will start placing the product "under state detention at the wholesale level within 60 days." The letter said the sauce violates

Suchard buy brings PM close to Nestle

By Judann Dagnoli and Dagmar Mussey

Philip Morris Cos. appears to have hit upon a seamless acquisition in Jacobs Suchard, a fit that will make Philip Morris a major power in European coffee and chocolate and closer in line with marketing superpower Nestle.

With the acquisition of Zurich-based Suchard last week, Philip Morris vaults into third place in the European confectionery market and the leading position in European ground-roast coffee.

Under the deal, announced Friday, a holding company owned by Suchard Chairman-CEO Klaus Jacobs becomes a unit of Philip Morris, giving the latter an estimated 60% control of the operating company. Philip Morris later will make a tender offer for the remainder of publicly traded Suchard shares. When the deal is completed, the acquisition cost is expected to be $3.8 billion.

The deal gives Philip Morris a well-established stable of brands, including Milka and Toblerone chocolates, and Kroenung, Night & Day and Jacobs Cafe coffee.

Not included in the purchase are Suchard's Canadian subsidiary, E.J. Brach in the U.S. and Suchard's industrial chocolate business. Mr. Jacobs is buying these back.

The combination will give Philip Morris, which in 1989 had $5 billion in international cigarette revenues and $3 billion in international food revenues, a total of $11.6 billion in revenues outside the U.S. Philip Morris' total revenues for 1989 were $52 billion.

Suchard offers Philip Morris an "entree into the $26 billion European confectionery market" and a stronger foothold in the $8 billion European coffee market, said Diana Temple, Salomon Bros. analyst.

The acquisition also will put Philip Morris well ahead of Nestle in the European ground-coffee race.

In 1989, Suchard held an estimated 15% share of the total European roasted coffee market. Philip Morris-owned General Foods International held a 6.5% European share last year while Nestle held 3.3%.

Les Pugh, Salomon analyst in London, said the Suchard deal will "make PM a much more formidable competitor with Nestle," which he said now holds 22% of the European confectionery market, vs. Mars Inc.'s 18% and Suchard's 11%.

Suchard's ad agency lineup also seems to be a neat fit with Philip Morris' international agency roster.

Young & Rubicam, Frankfurt, is worldwide agency for Suchard's Milka and also Philip Morris' agency for its Kaffee Hag coffee. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising handles Suchard coffee, and Philip Morris already is indirectly linked with that shop through New York-based Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, which handles Miller Brewing Co. and Parliament cigarettes. Both shops are units of Saatchi & Saatchi Co., London.

Suchard has been seeking a

Texas warns Heartwise

By Jennifer Lawrence and Julie Liesse

Kellogg Co.'s Heartwise cereal may be yanked from store shelves in Texas unless the company can prove the product isn't a drug.

The Texas Department of Health, through the state attorney general's office, last week notified Kellogg that the department's food and drugs division believes Heartwise's psyllium content makes the cereal an "unapproved new drug."

Psyllium is an Indian grain used in some laxatives. It's a concentrated form of soluble fiber that Kellogg research shows can help reduce cholesterol.

On Friday, Celeste Clark, Kellogg VP-nutrition marketing and communications, told Advertising Age, "We are particularly perplexed at the inconsistency of the state's position on Heartwise, given their recently announced position that a food manufacturer would be permitted to represent his product as part of a diet low in cholesterol and saturated fat—one that can reduce the risk of heart disease.

"When you look at this inconsistency, it's a clear example of why national uniformity in labeling and health claims is necessary and critical."

Kellogg has staked a lot on Heartwise. Although the company has scaled down expectations for the product, its previous public statements indicate it's unlikely to back down in a confrontation with Texas.

"We continue to be committed to Heartwise and are optimistic about its potential in the marketplace," Ms. Clark said.

Kellogg Chairman-CEO William LaMothe is a vocal opponent of state intervention in health claims and labeling, and has stated repeatedly the company believes strongly in the science behind Heartwise's product proposition.

The company complied with a request for more information on Heartwise last fall from the U.S. Food & Drug Administration (AA, April 9). The FDA inquiry is still under way—a factor that prompted Texas officials to take immediate action, sources say.

Kellogg last week received a cover letter from Texas Assistant Attorney General Stephen Gardner dated June 20 that included a copy of a letter to him from Dennis Baker, the state health department's director of the division of food and drugs.

Mr. Baker's letter, dated June 15, said psyllium doesn't have "Generally Recognized as Safe" (GRAS) status with the Food & Drug Administration. For that reason, Heartwise violates Texas law and could be prohibited from sale there. □

EPA may set green claims

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—Draft legislation from Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D., N.J.) would make the Environmental Protection Agency responsible for establishing definitions governing all environmental marketing claims.

The draft bill, a copy of which was obtained last week by Advertising Age, is being circulated among business, consumer and environmental groups for comments.

The proposal would set up a 13-member board of consumer, environmental and industry advocates to come up with product marketing rules or guides.

An aide to Sen. Lautenberg said a bill is expected to be introduced before the Aug. 6 Senate recess, but it's not clear how closely it will resemble the draft version.

Ever since Sen. Lautenberg said at a May 16 Senate hearing that he was drafting legislation to deal with marketers' burgeoning use of environmental claims, some observers have feared the bill might try to establish definitions for such terms as biodegradable or recyclable. But instead, the draft legislation calls for the new board to handle that task.

Under the proposal, that board would recommend to the EPA within six months of its first meeting a set of "definitions and standards to be used in regulating environmental marketing claims on a national basis."

The draft would appear to let states sue marketers believed to have violated the established definitions. It stipulates a civil penalty of up to $25,000 for each violation and a criminal penalty of $25,000 per day of violation and jail of up to a year, or both.

Initial reactions to the draft hasn't been positive.

The Sierra Club, for example, says the federal government should stick to research and leave details like definitions and standards to private organizations.

A section of the draft that's particularly upsetting business interests would require marketers using environmental claims relating to the "recyclable" nature of a product or its packaging to provide information "that specifies each state in which such product or packaging is recycled at a sufficient level . . . to warrant the use of such term." □

100 LEADING MEDIA COMPANIES

Top 100's media revenues up 8% to $71 billion, but cutoff dips for first time

By R. Craig Endicott

Time Warner executives can utter the classic second-place lament: Wait until next year.

Although Capital Cities/ABC again can claim the title as the nation's top media company with $4.8 billion in 1989 revenues, Time Warner is poised to offer the greatest challenge for the lead in recent years. Time Warner's $4.6 billion revenue figure fell just $192 million shy of Cap Cities' total, according to Advertising Age's 10th annual report on the 100 Leading Media Companies.

Time Warner appears to represent that which is best in generating media revenues: magazines and cable systems.

The nation's top 100 media companies built up strong 1989 returns largely from cable and magazine properties. They collected media revenues of $71.2 billion, up 8% from 1988.

Time Warner, a merger of Time Inc., No. 2 in last year's report, and Warner Communications, previously No. 30, is the apotheosis of the two hot media categories, drawing 59.9% of its media net revenues from cable (Warner Cable Communications, American Television & Communications Corp. and Home Box Office) and the remainder from a powerful roster of consumer magazines.

Although the $14 billion merger of Time and Warner still left the combo in Time's old runner-up spot, there was plenty of maneuvering within the Top 10.

- Gannett Co. replaced General Electric Co. in the No. 3 slot as the latter's NBC-TV Network and its owned-and-operated stations suffered a 6.8% decline in net revenue.
- CBS Inc. retained No. 5, while Advance Publications moved to No. 6 from No. 7, switching with Times Mirror Co.
- Acquisition-minded TCI exploded from No. 11 a year ago to No. 8.
- Last year's No. 8, Knight-Ridder, clung to the No. 9 position, barely holding off fast-charging News Corp.

Magazine revenues generated by the 37 media companies on the list grew a strong 12.8% to $11.9 billion, increasing the category's share of the 100's total media pie from 15.9% in 1988 to 16.7% in 1989.

That growth rate likely will not hold. Publishers Information Bureau reports consumer magazine advertising is up only 1.9% from January through May this year.

Cable continued to climb, although not as rapidly in terms of percentage growth as in previous years.

Thirty-four companies with cable operations among the Top 100 pushed the category's net revenues to $13.4 billion, up 17.9% from the prior year but off the 23.9% pace charted by the same cable properties in 1988. Cable boosted its share of the Top 100's total media revenues to 18.7%, up from 17.2% in 1988.

Both magazines and cable stole share points from the other major media categories even though the others recorded marginal to modest growth.

TV slipped from 22.9% to 21.6% of total media and radio dipped from 1.6% to 1.5%.

While still the biggest revenue generator, newspapers fell the furthest in terms of contributing to total revenues, falling from 37.4% to 36%.

Indicative of magazines' relative health as a media property, revenues of two of the four new entries to this year's Top 100 were fueled by magazines. Additions include No. 73 Family Media and No. 95 Pittway Corp.

Ackerley Communications entered the chart at No. 99 with its outdoor media, and Heritage Communications reached No. 84 through its purchase of Actmedia Inc., an in-store company that accounts for 70.4% of Heritage's net revenues.

To qualify for the Top 100 list, a media company required net revenues of $130.1 million, represented by No. 100 DTH Media, parent of the Dallas Times-Herald. It edged Knapp Communications, which earned $130 million in revenue.

For the first time in the 10 years Advertising Age has been tracking media companies, the revenue cutoff declined. This illustrates the impact of consolidations over the past few years among leading media companies and the relatively slow growth in several media categories in 1989.

Magazine sector growth engineered some dramatic leaps on the chart. Moving at least eight places were Reed Publishing USA (formerly Cahners Publishing Co.), from No. 37 to No. 27; International Data Group from No. 52 to No. 41; Ziff Communications from No. 71 to No. 63; Forbes Inc. from No. 76 to No. 68; Maclean Hunter from No. 77 to No. 69; Edgell Communications from No. 91 to No. 72; U.S. News & World Report from No. 93 to No. 82; and CMP Publications from No. 98 to No. 89

However, it wasn't all rosy in the magazine category. Reader's Digest Association dipped to No. 26 from No. 23 a year earlier based on a 1.8% decline in net revenues largely associated with the flat performance of Reader's Digest.

Consolidation among cable properties continued to influence net revenue growth. TCI joined with No. 66 Adelphia Communications Corp. in buying out Cooke Media's cable operations for $1.6 billion. Continental Cablevision, No. 20, spent $500 million for five major cable systems.

Such consolidations helped push revenue growth above 20% for a number of cable companies, with TCI up 38%.

TV operations, unlike cable, fared poorly. The 43 companies with TV properties saw net revenues crawl forward to $15.4 billion, a 1.8% advance compared with a 6.3% movement in the prior year.

Newspapers turned in a decidedly lackluster performance. Net revenues of 49 companies with newspaper operations grew 3.9% to $25.6 billion, reflecting the same growth rate as in 1988.

Both media categories are not likely to rebound in 1990 as TV and newspaper advertising continues to soften. Although the major newspaper companies' growth was marginal, the public companies among them performed fairly well. (See chart on Page S-3.)

The public companies' percentage of media to total revenues slipped from 32.9% in 1988 to 32.4% in 1989. Media revenues of the 49 public companies grew to $50.3 billion, up 7.9%, while total revenues expanded 9.9% to $155.2 billion. □

Methodology

Companies listed on the 100 Leading Media Companies chart, whether U.S.- or foreign-based, were ranked by net revenues generated by their U.S. media properties. Net revenues exclude agency commission on the ad side and such items as provisions for newsstand returns, unpaid subscriptions and subscription agency commissions on the circulation side.

Figures used were either calendar year 1989 or the latest available fiscal returns.

Treatment of acquisitions and divestitures was on a pro forma basis where available. A pro forma reading was obtained for Time Warner reflecting combined net revenues had the merger been consummated at the beginning of 1988. Macfadden Holdings would not include Star magazine, purchased this year from News Corp.

Ratings shown for 1988 in this year's report are based on figures reported by companies or estimated by Ad Age this year.

The careful reader will note that a newcomer to this year's list, Family Media, publisher of such titles as Discover, Health and Savvy, should not have been a newcomer. Its 1988 total revenues ultimately were estimated at $165 million, surpassing that year's cutoff of $131.7 million.

With more than half the companies in this report private, estimates were required. Estimates by Ad Age or from secondary sources such as "Duncan's Radio Market Guide" for radio or Paul Kagan Associates for cable were shown to the media company whenever possible. Most private companies were forthcoming with their total net revenues and media category breakouts.

Ad Age identifies all the numbers as estimates even though most were confirmed by the companies because many of the numbers credited to certain media categories, such as TV and radio, rarely appear in such form in audited results. Most companies, for example, couple TV and radio under "broadcast" without specifying amounts in either.

Similarly, many media companies are involved in what Ad Age considers non-media activities, such as contract printing, book publishing, book and record clubs, movie production, etc. □

A Newhouse Newspaper

Magazines run hotter than papers

Newspaper properties of the 100 Leading Media Companies, unlike their magazine counterparts, were locked in an industrywide ad crunch in 1989.

Newspaper volume leader Gannett Co. drew $2.9 billion from its newspaper operations for a 5.7% increase. The only other top 10 newspaper company to surpass this was Washington Post Co. with 6.4% growth. No other top 10 company grew more than 4.4% in revenue.

Those returns parallel the nationwide slippage in newspaper ad volume growth trends.

Newspaper ad growth in 1988 hit 6.1%, followed by last year's slower 3.8% uptick to $32.4 billion. The first quarter of this year continued the shrinkage as total advertising topped out at $7.3 billion, down 0.3% from the comparable quarter in 1989.

Classified advertising, particularly vulnerable to economic declines, dropped 11.2% for the quarter.

Competitive forces in the marketplace altered the newspaper landscape in 1989.

Hearst Corp.'s Los Angeles Herald Examiner closed down at yearend. Capital Cities/ABC's evening Kansas City Star early this year merged with the morning Times.

Ingersoll Publications' St. Louis Sun folded, and the Supreme Court approved the biggest joint operating agreement, in Detroit.

Magazine companies reported handsome gains that made Time Warner's advance of 5.9% seem paltry. On a volume basis, however, Time Warner's net revenue of almost $1.9 billion, nearly doubled Hearst's $992.5 million.

News Corp. registered the largest year-to-year percentage gain of 39.9% as it folded in full-year's results of its 1988 acquisition of Triangle Publications.

Some of the leading magazines changed hands during 1989 and early 1990 as McCall's went from Lang Communications to the New York Times Co.; Sunset was bought by Time Warner; the Star moved from News Corp. to Macfadden Holdings; and the travel publications of News Corp. left for Reed International.

In the first five months of 1990, ad volume of about $3 billion represented a slight increase of 1.2% over the comparable period in 1989. The increase, however, resulted from boosting rates; ad pages dipped 4.3% below earlier levels, according to Publishers Information Bureau. □

Sagging broadcast seen rebounding

The days when TV stations were seen as "cash cows" are over.

In fact, the revenue stream of the broadcast industry—TV and radio—has trickled to far below the double-digit growth enjoyed up to two years ago.

The 43 media companies with TV properties on the Ad Age 100 combined to show only a 1.8% gain in revenues—a figure somewhat misleading because of the impact on the group of No. 1 General Electric Co.

GE, with $3.4 billion in net revenue generated by its NBC-TV Network and owned-and-operated stations, represents 22% of the $15.4 billion TV aggregate.

Without GE, the other 42 companies collectively would have grown 4.6%. GE revenues dropped because 1988 figures were inflated by the NBC-aired Olympics, which powered NBC to a 12.2% annual gain in 1988.

In general, TV's fortunes are expected to revive in 1990. First-quarter network TV results showed advertising at $2.6 billion, up 13.6% compared with the first quarter of 1989. Spot TV had a modest 3.4% gain while syndication, which includes Fox TV Network, ballooned 32%, according to Arbitron's Broadcast Advertisers Reports.

Showing particular strength among the top 10 TV companies in 1989 was News Corp. with estimated growth of 12.9% largely tied to Fox TV Network, and Tribune Co., up 10%—a credit to its strong stations in New York, Los Angeles and Chicago.

Buyouts slowed to a trickle. The only major group moving in '89 was TVX Broadcast, a unit of six independent TV stations, 49% of which was bought by Paramount Communications. One of the largest single station deals was Cook-Inlet's $125 million purchase of WSMV-TV, Nashville, from Gillett Holdings.

The 23 media companies active in radio among the Top 100 returned net revenues of $1.1 billion in 1989, up 6.6%, but below the 11.1% growth recorded for 1988. The industry grew 6.7% to $8.3 billion in 1989 ad revenues.

If national spot ad totals for the first quarter of 1990 establish a pattern this year, radio owners are in for tough times. Ad revenues plunged 42.2% from the prior year period, to $192.9 million—most of the drop from spot's two leading categories, food products and automotive. □

Yellow Pages leaders gain 8% to $7.7 billion; GTE on top

By Sarah Polster

Revenues of the top 10 Yellow Pages publishers continued their steady climb in 1989, rising 8% to $7.7 billion in Advertising Age's 100 Leading Media Companies.

The top 10 companies represent about 93% of total Yellow Pages advertising, which the Yellow Pages Publishers Association places at $8.3 billion, up 6.4% from 1988. The association figure also includes advertising in white pages, as do Ad Age's figures.

Communications Trends, a Yellow Pages tracking service, predicts the industry will grow 7.3% in 1990 to $8.3 billion—an estimate that excludes white pages.

In this medium, white pages are just one of the components in the mix that is no longer "yellow." Talking Yellow Pages and image processing already are contributing promising revenue streams.

GTE remained the leader with revenues of $1.4 billion. Nynex entered the ranking for the first time—it would not divulge its 1988 Yellow Pages revenues—landing in the No. 5 spot based on 1989 revenues of $818 million.

The only other change was Southwestern Bell's drop from No. 5 in 1988 to No. 7 in 1989.

The only year-to-year decline in Yellow Pages revenues among the top 10 was the 1.1% drop by Donnelley Directory, attributed by Donnelley to the expiration of a sales agency contract with Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. □

Cable gains 17.9%

Growth pace slows, pay cable is struggling

Cable continues to outpace growth in other media, although possible re-regulation and tighter financial markets are slowing acquisition activity and system upgrading.

Total cable revenues of the 34 companies with cable operations among Ad Age's 100 Leading Media Companies increased 17.9% to $13.1 billion, slowing down from 23.9% growth a year ago.

Total industrywide cable ad spending rose 28.5% to more than $1.9 billion in 1989, according to Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau. Subscription fees still contribute more to total cable revenues than advertising, which is becoming increasingly important as subscriber counts flatten.

Newly merged Time Warner claimed the No. 1 cable spot among the Ad Age 100, the same position held by its predecessor Time Inc. in 1988. Tele-Communications Inc., with 38% revenue growth, was No. 2 again.

TCI continued to add properties, buying 50% of Viacom's Showtime Networks for $225 million, splitting the purchase of Cooke Media's cable with Adelphia Communications and others for $1.6 billion and snapping up a slice of Centel Cable.

Perhaps fearing proposed cable regulations that would prohibit cable operators from owning systems that control more than 15% of the national market, this January TCI split into two publicly traded companies covering cable and programming services.

The only new entry to the cable chart was Whittle Communications, whose controversial Educational Network brought in $10.9 million. Advertising on its Channel One contributed the revenues, but in early 1990 two other services were added to the network—the Educators Channel and the Classroom Channel.

New pay channels such as The Comedy Channel and HA! aren't faring as well as Whittle's niches. Their receptivity has been low, leading their respective parents, Time Warner and Viacom, to merge the two channels later this year.

Pay cable in general struggled through the year, dropping 5% in average weekly viewership, according to CAB. Basic cable viewership is growing the fastest; average weekly viewing for cable households went up 13% in 1989.

During the year, major deals included Centel Corp.'s divestiture of its cable systems for $1.4 billion to various MSOs including Time Warner and TCI.

Cooke Media Group, last year's No. 18 on the cable chart, dropped off the list after selling its cable systems to TCI and Adelphia for $1.6 billion.

Howard Publications sold its only cable property, a partial share of Hearst Cable. Early this year, Cablevision Systems snapped up major Long Island and Cleveland suburban systems from Viacom for $550 million.

Chronicle Publishing Co. outpaced all other MSO operators in year-to-year revenue cable growth at 39%, just ahead of TCI's 38%, Hearst Corp.'s 37% and Turner Broadcasting System's 36%. □

MAY AD RESULTS

Magazine ad pages continue downhill run

By Scott Donaton

Magazine ad pages took their steepest plunge of the year in May, following an April that had some publishers predicting the end of the ad page drought.

Ad pages fell 6.5% to 15,301.86 for the month, down more than 1,000 pages from the year before, according to Publishers Information Bureau. Year-to-date pages were off 3.2%, to 71,399.28.

Following a 3.5% drop in the first quarter, page counts rose a slim 0.4% in April, boosting some publishers' hopes. But May's dismal performance may negate that optimism.

Advertising softness has already led to a number of magazines folding or going on the selling block. Industry consultants predict a major shakeout.

Last year's ad page leader, Business Week took the top spot for the first time this year despite dropping 13.1% in pages. The McGraw-Hill magazine carried 1,551.37 ad pages through May, compared to 1,785.54 in the same period last year.

Forbes, one of the few titles to see ad pages rise in the first five months, ran a close second with 1,502.73 pages, a 7.5% gain. Rival Fortune carried 1,245.63 pages, up 2.2%.

Time Warner's People continued its downward slide with 1,428.27 pages, a 10.1% drop. Rupert Murdoch's TV Guide, meanwhile, saw pages fall 12% to 1,287.53 pages through May.

The top newsweeklies all posted declines for the year through May. Time was down 8.2% with 1,054.2 ad pages; Newsweek was off 12.2% with 902.78 pages; and U.S. News & World Report carried 744.3 pages, a 6% drop.

CYNTHIA WATSON

In the women's service field, Hearst Corp.'s Good Housekeeping passed Family Circle to take the ad page lead in the category with 679.43 ad pages, up 8.7%. Hearst's Redbook was the only other women's service title to register a gain with 464.31 ad pages, up 0.1%.

On the down side, Family Circle posted an 18.3% decline with 660.5 pages, and Woman's Day carried 636.74 pages through May, down 18.1%. Better Homes & Gardens was off 12% with 527.76 ad pages. McCall's had 404.01 pages, down 13.7%. Ladies' Home Journal dipped only slightly, down 0.7% with 648.97 ad pages.

Among men's magazines, Sports Illustrated carried 1,057.67 pages, a 17.2% decline; GQ carried 765.23 ad pages, down 8.4%; and Esquire, with 488.07 pages, was off 1.7%. Playboy's pages fell 9.6% to 285.32 pages. Penthouse was up 4.6% with 255.83 pages.

Among magazines posting double-digit ad page gains through May: Entrepreneur (845.58 pages, up 10.3%); Popular Photography (495.71 pages, up 23.9%); Financial World (465.78 pages, up 41.4%); Conde Nast Traveler (457.93 pages, up 17.5%); Bon Appetit (453.86 pages, up 12.9%); HG (452.71 pages, up 18.2%); Parenting (287.26 pages, up 21.2%); Child (236.37 pages, up 13.9%); European Travel & Life (220.78 pages, up 10.6%); Spin (209.29 pages, up 21.4%); Cooking Light (184.37 pages, up 20.1%); Health (179.05 pages, up 13.2%); Decorating Remodeling (164.19 pages, up 79.3%); Practical Homeowner (157.83 pages, up 60.9%); and National Geographic (121.16 pages, up 12.5%). □

Tide ad recall sprouts with help of Earth Day

By Kate Fitzgerald

Procter & Gamble Co.'s Tide detergent flowed back into the list of the 10 best-recalled ads last month on the strength of heavier overall advertising and promotions.

Tide shared the No. 10 spot (its first top 10 appearance since November) with Chrysler in Advertising Age's AdWatch poll for May.

Tide scored high thanks to a heavier print ad schedule in women's magazines, new TV executions and several special promotions including one tied to Earth Day on April 22.

That promotion, part of P&G's "Keep America Beautiful" campaign, incorporated a free standing insert underscoring P&G's commitment to the environment, such as Tide powder detergent boxes made of 100% recycled paper.

P&G also ran another promotion for the "Pro Bass Sweepstakes" in May, for both its Tide and Bold brands. Saatchi & Saatchi, New York, handles.

First place in the unaided-recall race went to Coca-Cola, which pushed rival Pepsi-Cola back to the No. 2 spot in the ongoing duel for cola dominance.

Ford maintained its spot among the top three for the fifth consecutive month, finishing No. 3 in May. Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and Chevrolet tied for fourth.

McDonald's held steady in the No. 6 spot, while Nike tiptoed down the charts to No. 9, behind Toyota at No. 8.

Gone from the top 10 in May was Infiniti, which fell not quite to infinity but to No. 14 last month from No. 10 in April.

AT&T moved up one notch to No. 7 in its second month back in the top 10, after its TV and print blitz to launch the new Universal credit card broke last March. Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, New York, created the campaign in partnership with Young & Rubicam.

In aided awareness, H.J. Heinz Co.'s 9 Lives reappeared in the pet food category in the No. 5 spot, due to the popularity of its 15-second TV spot for 9 Lives Kitten Dinners. The commercial features kittens making human baby sounds, ending with a burp. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Cleaning up at Clios

BBDO wins 5; Riney gets best nat'l campaign

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—BBDO Worldwide was the big winner at the 31st annual Clio Awards show here last week.

The agency took five Clios: for its Pizza Hut spot called "Right Field," a Diet Pepsi spot titled "Missing Link," "Excuses" for General Electric Co. and "Entrepreneur" for Apple Computer. In addition to winning the retail food category, the Pizza Hut spot also won for new adaptations of music.

Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, won the best national campaign Clio for its Stroh's Light spots.

American Honda Motor Co.'s "Art Gallery" spot by Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, won three Clios, for automotive, special effects and original scoring.

Other agencies winning multiple Clios included HDM for Lea & Perrins steak sauce ("Rifle") and Mita Copiers ("Flip Card Man"); Korey, Kay & Partners for apparel marketer Members Only and the Tri-Honda Dealers Association ("First Sale"); Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco, for the University of California("125 Years & Still No Sports") and the Oakland Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals ("Toby"); Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, for Timex Corp. ("Psychic") and KRIV-TV, Dallas ("Weather Watch"); and Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, for Prell ("Baseball") and Glad Lock plastic bags ("Angry Bees").

Other winners included: Goldsmith/Jeffrey, best local cable spot; Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., best apparel spot for Nike; Cliff Freeman & Partners, entertainment promotion Clio for Home Box Office; Ammirati & Puris, retail services Clio for a United Parcel Service spot; and the now defunct New York office of Keye/Donna/Pearlstein, a media promotion-print Clio for a spot for Playboy.

Riney wins again for its pseudo-Stroh's pitchmen.

In the international competition, Simons Palmer Denton Clemmow & Johnson, London, won three Clios—automotive, cinematography and editing—for one spot for Samson Car Batteries. TBWA, London, won best TV campaign for the Opticians Association.

The winners were chosen from 25,490 entries from 59 countries. □

WPP's odious little phone number

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Once a year, WPP Group proves it's really a fun company by publishing a subtle joke in its annual report.

This year, the touch of humor is the line OLJ-x213, printed inconspicuously on the back cover of the annual report at the end of a list of stock market codes. WPP watchers know OLJ could only stand for Odious Little Jerk, David Ogilvy's sobriquet for WPP Group Chief Executive Martin Sorrell.

Mr. Ogilvy called Mr. Sorrell that last year when Mr. Sorrell made his successful bid to buy Ogilvy & Mather. Mr. Ogilvy has since become chairman of WPP Group and stopped referring to his new employer in that manner.

Mr. Sorrell's direct extension at WPP headquarters is number 213. □

& Warren's Excellent Ad Venture, Portland, Ore., for the Portland International Film Festival, a woman is shown eating disgusting food such as giant beetles and raw dogmeat. In W.B. Doner & Co.'s "Baltimore's Other Major League Team" spot for Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, fans, musicians and athletes comment on the BSO as if it were a baseball team. Doner's Baltimore office created the spot.

A depressed ad market worldwide forced agencies and production companies to cut back this year on their usual lavish entertainment, villas and boats.

Although the overall number of spots entered rose 5.9% to 3,742 from 3,532 last year—and U.S. entries were up 1.8% to 831 from 816—17 of the 42 countries participating entered fewer spots.

Brazil was especially hard hit, with entries falling 78.4% to 37 from 171. The U.K. signed up 405 spots, down 0.2% from last year's 429, and France's entries were down 24.1% to 265 from 349.

There was confusion for several days about whether a Leo Burnett USA spot for Procter & Gamble Co.'s Prell shampoo was in the festival or out. Burnett tried to remove the spot in the belief P&G didn't want it to compete, sources said, then re-entered it when P&G didn't object.

In the commercial, male baseball players discuss split ends; a relief pitcher is sent in because the coach likes the highlights in his hair.

P&G pulled the spot from a U.S. test market because it considers Prell a woman's brand, though sources said Burnett is still urging wider airing.

The Screen Advertising World Association, the festival's organizer, voted during the week to back its U.S. member, Screenvision, in its fight against Walt Disney Co. and Warner Bros. ultimatums to U.S. theater owners to stop showing paid advertising before their movies.

The U.S. film studios haven't tried to ban commercials elsewhere, but association members said they believe that could happen.

"I'm afraid this will become a problem all over the world," association President Massimo Momigliano said.

The group's support will include financial help with legal fees, he said.

Screenvision President Terry Laughren said the Federal Trade Commission is studying the issue but hasn't decided whether to launch an official investigation into possible antitrust and free speech violations.

Agencies continuing to use Cannes for international meetings this year included Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, RSCG and DDB Needham Worldwide.

DDB Needham's two-day meeting included talks about bringing to Europe the "guaranteed results" compensation program the New York-based agency is trying in the U.S.

"What we're doing is thoroughly evaluating the possibility of the guarantee in Europe," said David Fernley, the agency's VP-Europe. He said the guarantee could be offered to clients in Europe by yearend.

Herve Brossard, chairman-creative director of DDB Needham France, Paris, said his office has been testing the guarantee program with one client since the beginning of the year.

This year's top fashion accessory —the male ponytail—was sported by jury president Tim Mellors, executive creative director of Publicis U.K., London, and South African judge Robyn Putter, executive creative director and chairman of Ogilvy & Mather Rightford Searle-Tripp & Makin, Cape Town. The look also was popular among many young admen at the all-night bar at the Martinez, the serious party-goers' hotel.

The jury of 22 judges from 15 countries gave many spots 0 to 3 on a scale to 10 during the 3 seconds they have to vote on each entry.

U.S. judge Rick Fizdale, president-chief creative officer of Leo Burnett Co., Chicago, said after watching almost 2,000 commercials: "I only gave three top marks—to Energizer, Nike and Maxell tapes."

The spots for Maxell (U.K.) feature people singing the wrong words to songs because they're not listening to a Maxell tape.

"The funny stuff goes down well because everybody gets so bored," said U.S. judge Mary Moore, vice chairman-chief creative officer of Wells, Rich, Greene/Worldwide, New York.

Another popular spot was Chanel's ad, created in-house, for Egoiste—French for "selfish"—men's cologne. In the commercial, a series of glamorous women throw open shuttered windows to shout "egoiste" at a man who has broken their hearts and mistreated them. □

Judges boot copycat 'Bunny'

By Laurel Wentz

CANNES—In a shocking move, judges threw out early Grand Prix favorite Eveready Battery Co.'s "Bunny" campaign, on the grounds it wasn't original.

Early last week, the determined pink bunny captivated judges and attendees at the International Advertising Film Festival, making its commercials an early favorite for the Grand Prix.

But the European judges were quick to point out the campaign from Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., showing the bunny marching through fictitious TV spots, was similar in concept to a U.K. campaign for Bass' Carling Black Label beer.

Sources said the Bunny spots had enough points to win a Gold Lion, but the judges considered the basic idea of the spot unoriginal.

The Carling campaign, created by WCRS, London, four years ago, consisted of a series of spoof commercials in which two Carling Black Label spokesmen appeared at the end and said, "I bet he drinks Carling Black Label."

Judges said the Energizer Bunny idea was derivative of this Carling Black Label spot—and threw it out of the competition.

In one three-spots-in-one commercial, a cowboy runs across a desert, has a beer in a Wild West saloon and takes off on horseback pursued by bad guys. The camera then switches to a parody ad for an album of love songs and the cowboy soon canters across the screen. The scene then shifts to a supermarket where two housewives are discussing detergents when the cowboy rides through the store.

At the end of the spot is the beer's long-running slogan, used to describe anyone who does something unusual: "I bet he drinks Carling Black Label."

"I'm somewhat disappointed Energizer is ripping off Carling Black Label. While it could win a Gold, I don't know if in all conscience I could vote for it for the Grand Prix," one judge said earlier in the week.

The 4,000 Cannes delegates would probably have voted differently. When the short-list spots were screened Friday to a packed auditorium, the audience applauded enthusiastically throughout the two Energizer commercials.

Sources said Chiat was aware of the Carling Black Label campaign before it entered three "Bunny" spots at Cannes. In the spots, the bunny marches through spoof commercials for coffee, nasal spray, greatest-hits records and Alarm soap. □ said Lou Schultz, exec VP-director of media services for Lintas:USA, New York.

Upfront

"One automaker is up and the other is down. Total [auto] spending is flat," an agency source said. "Autos simply won't drive the upfront this year. But entertainment companies are up and package goods are up. It will make for a bigger upfront marketplace, but it won't do to the market what the autos did last year."

Arthur Kesteloot, manager-advertising and media relations for Chrysler Corp., said the No. 3 domestic automaker "consciously went into the upfront market with less money than a year ago" because of expected price increases.

He wouldn't specify how much money was pulled from the network budget but said the money saved would go to cable TV and other media.

General Motors Corp., by making a three-year, $500 million to $750 million deal with NBC for prime-time, sports and cable in early May, helped calm the automotive spending spree.

But that deal did help ABC and CBS command CPM increases of between 14% and 20%.

Automotive buyers had hoped to keep costs down this year, but because GM had already locked up preferred positions in desired programs on NBC, the rivals flocked to the other networks and drove prices skyward despite reduced overall spending.

Although the furor over ratings guarantees apparently died down when ABC, CBS and NBC adopted a uniform viewer-counting plan to reduce liability for advertiser make-goods (AA, June 18), buyers said the issue remains part of the negotiation process.

Still, the flap over ratings guarantees has apparently benefited syndication and cable TV.

Barter syndicators now expect to reap $1.2 billion in upfront sales this year, up 20%, while cable TV is predicting at least a 50% increase to $750 million to $800 million in upfront sales.

"The turmoil in network television pricing and ratings guarantee strategies really fueled the barter syndication upfront," said Karl Kuechenmeister, senior VP, Warner Bros. Media Sales. "Advertisers wanted to protect themselves from getting hurt in the network upfront. We're close to being done now."

Campbell Soup Co. will put "a lot more money than anticipated" into syndication this year because of the network guarantee situation, said Paul Mulcahy, VP-advertising. But he also said his company couldn't afford to abandon network TV entirely, a refrain heard from many advertiser and agency executives because of what the alternatives were.

"Major syndicators tried to package too much garbage with the good stuff," said Jon Mandel, senior VP-director of national broadcast for Grey Advertising. "They've got clearance, scheduling and other unknowns to contend with. As a result, overall, syndication has been a relatively soft marketplace. Only a handful of top shows got really good increases. The rest of it was single-digit CPM increases." □

Nets nix Eastern, Bart

CBS rejects airline ads; ABC, NBC turn down BK

By Jennifer Lawrence and Scott Hume

The ad careers of Martin Shugrue, Eastern Airlines' court-appointed trustee, and the animated Simpson family have hit snags with the Big 3 TV networks.

Four Eastern commercials featuring Mr. Shugrue have been shut out of ad time on CBS news programming in their current form.

The $10 million to $15 million campaign still broke June 17 as scheduled on ABC and NBC.

The spots show Mr. Shugrue at an employee meeting in an unscripted context.

The airline, operating under federal bankruptcy protection, and its agency, Ogilvy & Mather, New York, refused CBS' demand that the spots carry a corporate logo or the words "corporate message" during news programming.

"Our concern was that Mr. Shugrue was standing at a microphone at an employee conference that could be an actual news event," said Matthew Margo, VP-program practices, CBS/Broadcast Group. "CBS asked for a small but important change to put viewers on notice that it is a commercial."

Eastern and O&M had no objection to CBS' request that in network non-news programming, the spots should be preceded and followed by other commercials—or "podded"—to avoid viewer confusion. No logo or superimposition would be required.

Two new spots, filmed on an actual Eastern flight, focus on Mr. Shugrue talking with passengers.

CBS approved the first commercial in that series late last week and at press time hadn't seen the second spot.

In an interesting turn of events, CBS was the only one of the Big 3 networks that said last week it's willing to air upcoming TV spots for Burger King Co.'s promotional tie-ins with the Simpsons, the characters from the popular Fox Broadcasting Co. series of the same name.

Burger King has planned an August through October promotion with the characters. But ABC and NBC turned down TV spots even though no finished commercials have been submitted to them.

ABC said it would refuse to air any Burger King spots with the Simpsons because of a longs anding policy not to cross-promote competitors' shows.

The network has accepted spots that featured stars of competing TV shows but only when the actor isn't in character. While admitting the use of animated characters "is fuzzy," ABC said it believed the Burger King spots were a cross-promotion.

ABC is reviewing its policy at the fast-food chain's request, but sources at the network say they doubt the decision will be reversed.

NBC also said it would nix the Burger King spots, citing a similar policy. The network said the policy won't be reviewed.

CBS said it would accept the spots as long as the name of the Fox program isn't mentioned.

This could present a problem for the chain, because the media schedule sent to franchisees promised a total of 2,200 gross rating points of TV support for the three-pronged promotion.

Company sources put the TV budget at $15 million and total media spending at $20 million. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, is the agency.

Franchisees have been stocking up on 32-ounce beverage cups for the first phase of the promotion, to run July 30 to Sept. 9.

A "Summer Vacation With the Simpsons" promotion with Simpson figurines is slated for Aug. 6 to Sept. 16, and a promotion involving posable Simpson dolls is set to run from Sept. 17 to Oct. 28.

Whether network TV spots for the promotions will run now is in question.

Burger King's official line last week was that it "has made no announcements concerning tie-ins with 'The Simpsons' and all reports are just speculation." □

Ad industry arms for new tax battle

Deductibility likely to become issue again

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—President Bush's announcement that higher taxes may be included in any deficit-reduction package triggered a new wave of concern among advertising and media groups that tax proposals are headed their way.

President Bush last week said the "size of the deficit problem" may require "tax revenue increases," and that prompted an instant summit among industry leaders here.

"When the president said we have to consider new options for revenues, he put us back on table as being potential tax targets," said Hal Shoup, VP at the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

The biggest issue is the full tax deductibility that advertising, as a cost of doing business, now enjoys.

A congressional aide—who works for Rep. Pete Stark (D., Calif.), longtime sponsor of legislation to deny deductibility to tobacco and alcohol advertisers—said President Bush's statement dramatically changed the climate for raising taxes.

The aide said it's more than

Fast-food faces wary public

GALLUP SURVEY

By Scott Hume

A significant percentage of consumers are making fewer trips to fast-food chains following public charges about high-fat foods, an Advertising Age/Gallup Organization survey shows.

Almost 40% of those respondents who were aware of saturated-fat and cholesterol charges said they had cut back fast-food eating either "somewhat" or "greatly" in the past 30 days.

Consumers surveyed said their declining patronage applied to all such chains, not just McDonald's Corp., even though it was McDonald's that came under attack by crusader Phil Sokolof. Mr. Sokolof's advocacy ads claimed some of that chain's food is too high in saturated fat and cholesterol.

Other fast-food chains have tried to distance themselves from McDonald's by promoting changes in products or cooking methods that reduce the amount of fat in their foods.

In April, in page newspaper ads from his National Heart Savers Association and in subsequent appearances on TV news programs, Mr. Sokolof charged McDonald's is part of a "poisoning of America."

The chain's use of both beef fat for french fry cooking and hamburger meat that's too high in saturated fat contributes to the nation's high rate of heart disease, he said.

The fast-food industry responded quickly. McDonald's said it's testing the cooking of Tampons go for green

J&J, Tambrands use environmental claims

By Judann Dagnoli

A new wave of environmental ad efforts is turning up in a rather unexpected marketing category—feminine hygiene products.

The ad strategies, from Johnson & Johnson Personal Products Co. and Tambrands, are partly a reaction to garbage, including medical waste and tampon applicators, that has washed up on the nation's shores in recent years.

J&J is the latest to join the environmental bandwagon, this week breaking a $2 million campaign calling its o.b. tampon an environmental alternative because it comes wrapped in a biodegradable film, with no applicator to throw away.

The network TV and radio campaign, themed "Everything I want, and no waste," is from Cadwell Davis Partners, New York.

The TV spot shows a young woman walking through a park, talking about why she uses that brand. At one point, she kicks a discarded soft-drink can and says, "When this environmental problem came along, I suddenly realized with o.b., no applicator to throw away means no waste."

An o.b. spot shows a woman talking about how using the non-applicator product means no waste.

In radio commercials breaking July 5, J&J gives rather humorous tips on how teens can clean up the environment. One spot suggests bringing coffee mugs into school to avoid using paper cups and another suggests swatting insects rather than using repellent, with exercise being a side benefit, said agency President Franchellie Cadwell. Promotions involve the giveaway of coffee mugs and fly swatters, she said.

Market leader Tambrands is also planning an extensive environmental campaign involving consumers and the trade.

Tambrands is running a network TV spot that shows a woman walking in a meadow with the voice-over saying: "We thought

Headaches at Bauer

NEW YORK—Bauer Publishing's First for Women was left last week without a top sales executive in the U.S. Senior VP Todd Selbert left the Magazine Consultancy, which handles ad sales for First and sister publication Woman's World. This follows last month's departure of Exec VP J. Riley McDonough for Newsweek after just a few weeks at Bauer. The departures were the latest trouble for First, which cut its rate base 25% to 3 million in April and had to abandon a controversial plan for agency volume discounts. In addition, sources close to First said, the women's service monthly is carrying an average of 20 paid ad pages per issue, down from 37 last year. Bauer executives couldn't be reached.

New Apple president takes on marketing

By Bradley Johnson

Apple Computer, trying to boot up its sluggish U.S. sales, last week quietly eliminated its top domestic marketing post and turned over responsibilities to its new operations-minded U.S. president.

David Hancock, 44, senior VP-marketing of Apple USA, left on a company-mandated six-week sabbatical and will return to a post yet to be determined.

Robert Puette, 48, who filled the slot of Apple USA president last week, will take over Mr. Hancock's duties.

The changes came a week after Apple USA's top sales executive, Senior VP William Coldrick, 48, moved into a part-time advisory role. Michael Dionne, formerly a regional sales VP, succeeded him as VP-sales.

The management shifts cap a shake-up that began in January when Chairman-CEO John Sculley brought in Apple Europe President Michael Spindler, Wunderkind of Apple's international business, as chief operating officer to revive Apple's domestic operation.

Apple, long the practitioner of what one observer called "just-in-time marketing," has little time to spare. It still must decide what ad strategy to take with the expected October launch of a low-price Macintosh computer (AA, June 25), critical to re-establishing Apple's position on the low end.

It faces more competition from IBM Corp.'s new, entry-level PS/1 (AA, June 18). And it faces an assault from Microsoft Corp.'s Windows 3.0 software, which lets IBM-compatible personal computers mimic Macintosh's popular graphics features.

Management changes weren't unexpected given the dismal performance of Apple's U.S. arm. In the first half of fiscal 1990, ended March 30, Apple's U.S. sales fell 2% from a year ago to $1.7 billion; international sales soared 23% from a year ago to $1.2 billion.

D. Hancock

Mr. Puette, a 24-year Hewlett-Packard Co. veteran, had been general manager of Hewlett-Packard's PC division since 1981 and built it into a nearly $1 billion business. At Apple, he replaces Allan Loren, a one-time insurance industry executive who was forced out as Apple USA president in January. Mr. Spindler had been acting president since January.

Mr. Puette also takes over for Mr. Hancock, a Britisher who ran U.S. marketing for about two years and served in international posts earlier. Mr. Hancock left July 1 on a six-week sabbatical, a vacation mandated for all Apple employees every five years.

"When he returns, we will begin exploring new assignments," Mr. Spindler said in an internal memo.

Efforts to reach Mr. Hancock weren't successful.

In an interview, Mr. Puette said he intends to leave corporate vision and direction to Messrs. Spindler and Sculley.

"I don't like to be a dreamer," he said. "I like to be a great team builder, [an] implementer."

While Mr. Puette likely will look heavily to his bosses for ad strategies, he still vows to play an active role in advertising.

Mr. Puette leans toward a conservative, consistent ad approach, though, he said, occasionally "we might do a few wild hair things."

He said his favorite computer ads are two recent Apple spots from BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles, in which an IBM PC devotee wonders how it could be that his company's employees flock to Macintoshes. As for Apple's breakthrough "1984" spot six years ago, Mr. Puette said, "I thought that was a bit bizarre."

Industry observers say Apple's latest management arrangement is also a bit bizarre in that Apple's best-known marketer, Mr. Sculley, isn't doing much marketing. Mr. Sculley, the ex-president of Pepsi-Cola Co., is focusing on product development; Mr. Spindler, an ex-engineer, is running worldwide operations and marketing; Mr. Puette, an

Peugeot gets transparent

By Raymond Serafin

What can follow Infiniti's much-discussed don't-show-the-cars advertising? Maybe the now-you-see-it, now-you-don't TV spot from Peugeot Motors of America.

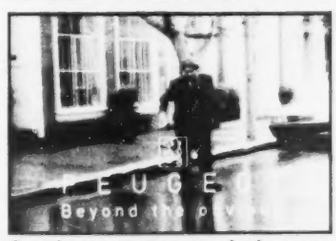
In the 30-second commercial breaking today on cable and spot TV, a Peugeot 405 sedan is heard, but the car and its driver are invisible to viewers and several people the car passes on a country road.

The first glimpse comes when the car is parked on a city street. The driver, a man in a business suit, is seen as he opens a still-invisible door, revealing some of the car's interior.

As the man walks away, he looks back at the car. This time, viewers see it with him as the voice-over says, "The Peugeot 405. It takes a special eye to appreciate it." The spot closes with a woman on a motorbike looking on in consternation as the man returns to the once-more invisible car to polish off some blemish with a handkerchief.

The TV spot closes with the theme line, "Beyond the obvious," which will also be used in print ads. Newspaper ads break in mid-July, followed by a variety of magazines beginning in August issues. HDM, New York, handles.

"It wasn't intended to be a parody of Infiniti, but some people in our test groups brought up the comparison," said Daniel Petit, national marketing manager for Peugeot.



A curious young woman looks on as a man polishes his invisible Peugeot, in a new spot from HDM, New York.

"We're really trying to go with our strength, which is to appeal to people who tend to be open-minded," he said. "We can't sell to someone who is worried because no one else on his block owns one."

"We're not trying to keep our car invisible to people," HDM President Patrick Hillman said. "We're trying to make it more visible by its absence in part of the communication."

Visibility is a chronic problem for Peugeot, with an estimated ad budget of about $20 million. The company sold 2,021 cars in the U.S. in the first five months of 1990, only 0.05% of the total car market.

The 405 was introduced in the U.S. two years ago after being named European Car of the Year but never has really taken off. The model had already received the bulk of Peugeot's ad spending but will get even more now that the larger 505 line is being discontinued except for a station wagon in the 1991 model year.

With a price range of $15,300 to $21,700, the 405's competitors range from top-of-line Honda Accords to entry-level products from BMW, Infiniti and Lexus.

Mr. Hillman said the "Beyond the obvious" theme is intended to last a long time. "Until Peugeot becomes obvious, it's a direction we can extend," he said.

Peugeot and HDM are also preparing a direct marketing effort that could reach as many as 100,000 people who travel to France, subscribe to French magazines or are French-language teachers.

While the direct mail piece will mention Peugeot's French origins, the general media campaign doesn't, because the image of French technology is weak.

"It's not that the image for French technology is so negative," Mr. Hillman said. "It's just that the image for other French things —style, perfume, fashion, love, sex, wine—is so strong. People look for simple labels, and it's not something we can fix with a few ads." □

Guaranteed pitfalls

Your editorial "DDB pay plan: A small step" (AA, May 21) correctly identified several problems inherent in the "guaranteed results" program proposed by Keith Reinhard.

Some may argue that the move is genius, an effective means of gaining more of their clients' overall marketing dollar, while maintaining greater control over the creative product. It certainly seems like a brilliant response to the continuing shift away from traditional advertising and media.

But there are major flaws in this plan. As the editorial points out, an agency has no control over such common occurrences as raw materials shortages, strikes and competitive breakthroughs. They also have no say in production levels, product pricing, sales and distribution, and a host of other essential pieces crucial to the entire marketing puzzle.

It surely appears that DDB Needham has offered to take on a risk far greater than the return. There are just too many unforeseeable roadblocks in the path from advertising idea to consumer sale for it to work as well in practice as it may on paper.

Our company has had such arrangements in the new-product area and has learned that, even though the concept and strategy are on target, there are innumerable ways to derail a sure bet.

The DDB plan is a bold effort, but will inevitably fall short. After all, it would require clients to relinquish some of the control they've regained in the past decade. And that is not likely to happen today.

To Herzbrun's defense

I found David Herzbrun's book, "Playing in Traffic on Madison Avenue," to be a thoroughly delightful read. I especially enjoyed the chapter covering the Ogilvy years, which you excerpted in your April 23 issue, since I was on hand at the time.

I was a bit puzzled to read a letter in your June 11 issue which claimed that none of Ogilvy's top management could recall a particular incident involving the Sears account. It certainly had quite an impact on David, since it caused him to resign from the agency.

As one of David Herzbrun's writers when he pitched Sears, I was cross to see anyone questioning that episode in David's book. It's the utter, mere truth—just how it happened.

The fact that David is so entertaining doesn't mean he exaggerated. He didn't have to.

The 'Newsday' combo

The "Top 100 newspapers by daily circulation" listing (AA, May 7) had only one entry for the New York tri-state Newsday family, "(New York) Newsday."

If this is a composite of Newsday, the Long Island paper, and New York Newsday, which claims to be a NYC paper, then I don't think the combo has earned its No. 8 ranking.

Anti anti-smokers

In a recent letter (AA, June 4), New Jersey anti-smoker John Slade claims that "future cigarette sales depend on addicting new smokers before they are out of high school." This is as nonsensical as saying future real estate sales depend on selling mortgages to high school students.

Mr. Slade's comment is a textbook example of the way anti-smokers attempt to use the issue of youth as an excuse to harass and restrict the behavior of adult smokers and their access to product information. The truth is, Mr. Slade objects to all tobacco advertising and sponsorships, and the fact that tobacco advertising is addressed solely to adults who choose to smoke does nothing to dispel his opposition. . . .

On the other hand, Mr. Slade praises California's government-sponsored media blitz against the tobacco industry. He is delighted by that state's $28 million worth of commercials which portray tobacco executives as callous fat cats hatching their plots in smoke-filled rooms. Perhaps he would not be so delighted to be on the receiving ends of such attacks: if, for example, the tobacco industry were to run ads depicting anti-smokers as blue-nosed prigs and self-appointed moralists with little respect for the rights of others.

Although such advertisements are not contemplated, based on the recent extreme positions sanctioned by anti-smokers, they would be entirely justified.

Truth in smoking

In your editorial (AA, June 11) you say that limiting the sale of cigarettes to minors will allow "cigarette makers to advertise truthfully to adults, including young adults." My heart leaps at the thought of cigarette makers advertising "truthfully."

I await the first Marlboro ad that tells young men that smoking will cut 18 years off their lives. Or the first Virginia Slims ad that advises women that smoking during pregnancy seriously damages the health of their unborn children.

Cigarette makers have always been free to truthfully advertise what cigarettes do to people who are addicted to them. They have never advertised that truth in the past. What makes you think they are going to start now?

The Oreo Blues

It gave me the blues recently to see that the marketers of Oreo cookies (a unique original, I always assumed) think that an imitation is as good as the original.

In their TV spot the copy asks, "Ever wonder what made Chubby Checker think of the Twist?" implying that he was the creator of this "oldie but goodie." The writer should know that Chubby's version was, in fact, a much less satisfying imitation of the original by R&B great Hank Ballard and the Midnighters.

CORRECTIONS & CLARIFICATIONS

■ In the Ad Age 300 top magazines ranking (June 18, P. S-6), Playboy should have ranked 23rd; correct total gross revenues were $144.1 million.

■ The following corrections pertain to the "Sales Promotion Agency Report" published April 30: Frankel & Co.'s listing on the sales promotion agency chart should have indicated its gross revenue total was verified by an outside accountant (P. S-2); Noble Communications' sales promotion billings were transposed for 1989 and 1988, so that the 1989 figure should have been $8,378,500, which would rank Noble 25th instead of 39th among ad agencies based on their sales promotion billings (P. S-3); Keller Crescent Co., No. 30 on the sales promotion agency chart (P. S-2), should have been on the chart ranking U.S.-based ad agencies by their sales promotion billings, where it would have been No. 7. □

Danger of flashing lights

I have been fascinated with advertising since I was about 10 years old. That's when I first saw Cary Grant in "Mr. Blandings Builds His Dream House."

For the life of me, however, I cannot understand why major advertising agencies insist on using flashing lights in their television commercials. Don't they understand that there are people such as myself with epilepsy? My seizures (of the grand mal type) are a result of being photosensitive. Translated, that means sensitive to flashing lights.

Oh, I know, I could turn away when the flashing light commercials come on, but would you like me, as a consumer, to block out your product? I'm not the only person with epilepsy; we're about 2 million strong. I'm sure not all of us are photosensitive, but how many are?

I don't want to threaten anyone. I just ask that ad agencies be more aware. After all, isn't the '90s the decade of awareness?

Network clutter on the rise

Program and business-side developments in broadcasting.

Clutter up. If it seems like there are more commercials on network TV today, it's not your imagination. The American Association of Advertising Agencies and Association of National Advertisers have proof that time set aside for commercials on the Big 3 networks is rising (see charts).

The two groups commissioned Advertising Information Services to monitor program and non-program activity on the networks during the week of Nov. 8-14 and for daytime shows Nov. 13.

Although the networks claim self-imposed guidelines limit their amount of commercial time, all three exceed the old National Association of Broadcasters non-program material standards of 10 minutes per hour in prime time and 16 minutes per hour in all other dayparts. A lawsuit brought the death of the NAB commercial code in the 1970s.

The results of the 1989 report are somewhat startling. The number of minutes of non-program material per hour—commercial and billboard time—in prime time on ABC and CBS reached record highs in 1989—10 minutes, 42 seconds and 11 minutes, 40 seconds, respectively—while NBC declined from seconds to 10 minutes, 58 seconds. Fox Broadcasting Co., measured in the study for the first time, had even more non-program material per hour, 13 minutes, 23 seconds.

The number of commercial messages per network pod didn't increase in 1989, the report found. NBC was unchanged while the average number of spots in different length pods in different dayparts decreased on CBS and NBC.

In a limited monitoring of syndicated series, the report showed "Star Trek: The Next Generation" had 14 minutes, 10 seconds of non-program time (7 minutes of national commercial/billboard time and 7 minutes, 10 seconds of local commercials/promotions), the most among 1-hour shows monitored. "A Current Affair" totaled 9 minutes of non-program time (1 minute national commercial, 30 seconds national promotion and 7 minutes, 30 seconds local commercial/promotion) during its half-hour telecasts, while "Entertainment Tonight" had 8 minutes, 33 seconds. Syndicated repeats of "The Cosby Show" had 8 minutes, 10 seconds, while "Jeopardy!" had 7 minutes, 38 seconds.

Tee time. Helene Curtis Industries, General Mills, Sara Lee Corp., Sharp Electronics Corp. and Toyota Motor Sales USA have committed to ad time on the Crosby 1990 celebrity golf tournament. The telecast will be syndicated to TV stations for airing July 7 to 29. Program Syndication Services, a unit of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, has cleared 110 stations, including the top 25 markets.

Educated launch. The Discovery Channel, with the Public Broadcasting Service; WNET-TV, New York; and WGBH-TV, Boston, is exploring the feasibility of launching a cable TV service focused on education. PBS President Bruce Christensen characterized the discussions as in the "early" stages but said the project would involve a partnership with the more than 175 PBS affiliates. □

COVER STORY

Brains and brawn in June spotlight

By Janice Kelly

Cover Story is a monthly ranking of celebrities' popularity as reflected by their appearance on the covers of more than 30 of the nation's leading publications.

Editors went on a spring cleaning spree in June, packing away old standbys and introducing a new lineup of hot celebs. The principal winners were an odd couple: muscleman-turned-actor Arnold Schwarzenegger and Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev.

Magazines and adoring fans seem star-struck with Mr. Schwarzenegger after a month when he appeared everywhere. And a few highly charged publicity campaigns haven't hurt, hyping his latest action-thriller, "Total Recall," his chairmanship of the President's Council on Physical Fitness & Sports and the birth of his daughter, Katherine Eunice Schwarzenegger.

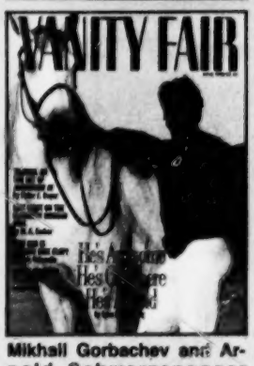
Several celebrity and men's publications on the newsstands in recent months have carried stories about him, even if his face wasn't on the cover. But often it was, earning Mr. Schwarzenegger 15.5 points in the June Cover Story survey.

Cover Story assigns point values to cover appearances based on factors including prominence of the photo and frequency of the publication.

Gracing at least three covers already in July, Mr. Schwarzenegger could keep the Cover Story crown for two months running.

Balancing out the Schwarzenegger hype in June were newsweekly profiles of a subject publications could take more seriously: Mr. Gorbachev, the subject of many cover stories with the predictable summit spin. The Soviet leader scored 15 points to take second place.

If anyone could make waves with readers without even splashing, it's Elizabeth Taylor. Ms. Taylor tied for third with 8 points when supermarket tabloids continued to speculate on whether she's really recovered from her "mysterious disease." She tied with actor Mel Gibson, starring with Goldie Hawn in the comedy film "Bird on a Wire."



Mikhail Gorbachev and Arnold Schwarzenegger caught the public's eye in June, for different reasons.

A three-way, fifth-place tie goes in part to the hottest U.S. couple since Sonny and Cher: Warren Beatty and Madonna. The duo is grabbing headlines with their summer blockbuster film "Dick Tracy" and their on-screen and off-screen romance, earning 7.5 points each in the June survey.

Sammy Davis Jr. earned 7.5 points in the June tally, bringing his 1990 total to 15 points since his death earlier this year.

Eighth place saw a tie between the oddest couple since Unger and Madison: Donald Trump and Marion Brando. Both have encountered adversities that will change their lives. The Donald is having a troublesome year: first a rift with wife Ivana, then rumors of an affair with March Cover Story queen Marla Maples and now talk that his empire could crumble under financial problems.

Mr. Brando's crisis is a different story: his son, Christian, has been charged in the murder of his sister's lover.

Other celebrities whose faces stared back at us from the newsstands in June included actress Julia Roberts and comedian/talk show host Arsenio Hall, earning 5.5 points each and tying for 10th. □

Grey crafts $10M unwired TV deal

By John McManus

National advertisers, always looking for bargaining leverage against the Big 3 TV networks, are finding independent stations more attractive—and accessible.

Grey Advertising, which played a role in Procter & Gamble Co.'s $18 million, two-year "unwired network" ad deal with Katz Television Group in May, is at it again on behalf of several clients, including Block Drug Co. and Red Lobster.

New York-based Grey has taken $10 million earmarked for upfront spending on the broadcast and cable networks and syndicators, and placed the money into an unwired network of stations that clear 85% to 95% of the country.

The buy was made via Katz and Blair Television.

Unwired networks have been around for more than a decade. But cumbersome paperwork and logistical problems, including trouble getting adequate audience delivery information, have prevented many advertisers from making timely buys.

"We've been buying unwireds for 10 years," said Jon Mandel, senior VP-director of national broadcast at Grey. "But as an industry, there was previously no system for us to judge independents vs. network."

Now, under a new initiative spearheaded by Lana King, VP-marketing for the Association of Independent Television Stations, stations have streamlined the negotiating, buying and audience-measurement process.

The stations involved have put time availabilities into a pool so negotiations can be done on a national basis.

"It's the beginning of an opportunity to tap into a significant amount of new money," Ms. King said. "We're going to market plans like this to other agencies."

"Because of what's been done here, we have a viable, actionable alternative to networks in several dayparts," Grey's Mr. Mandel said. "We can make a national buy, get national coverage on a competitive national [cost per thousand] with national ratings, on a national network. The reps and stations have learned to do their homework."

He said he would consider further unwired network proposals as he divvies up his agency's $300 million to $400 million in scatter spending during the next year.

Katz, Blair, Petry and Seltel are the national sales reps that so far have submitted proposals to Grey.

Some national reps and stations contend an unwired network deal "devalues" a station's inventory. Individual stations have been able to command higher prices in the national and local spot marketplaces than they could when they sold the time as part of an unwired network.

But faced with a flattening national spot market, some TV stations and their national sales reps have more aggressively sought access to new sources of ad revenues.

The pooling is "a way for broadcasters to get some money converted back into spot," said James Murtagh, senior VP-general manager at Seltel. "It's much more costly for the reps because we're being asked to do all the back-office work. But because the marketplace is flat, stations are looking to replace the dollars shifted out of spot." □ the alternatives."

The smaller demand for network time softened the average network CPM increases. Network and agency sources said increases settled at an average of 10% to 12%, depending on program mix and desired demographics.

However, competitive categories such as automakers and movie studios paid significantly higher prices, as reported.

Agency and network sources said some ad packages at ABC and NBC included CPM increases of 18% or more, while CBS, thanks to the influx of lower-price inventory on new shows, put together some packages with increases as low as 5%.

But CPM costs can be misleading.

"CPM is just a convenient shorthand. . . . a network source said. "If you want a lower CPM, you just change the program mix. If you buy more new shows, chances are you'll have a much lower CPM."

The emergence of Fox as a true competitor to the Big 3 also tempered spending on ABC, CBS and NBC.

"Fox is out of the closet as a competitor; that's what the spoiler was," a Big 3 source said.

Industry estimates vary, but NBC once again topped the four networks in upfront sales at an estimated $1.5 billion, down 6.2% from last year.

ABC set company records for gross upfront sales, average unit prices and CPMs, said Jake Keever, exec VP-sales. He declined to give specifics, but industry sources said ABC's sales totaled about $1.4 billion.

Depending on the source, CBS finished the prime-time upfront with sales either as low as $850 million or as high as $1 billion.

Estimated upfront sales for Fox were between $525 million to $550 million, almost double last year's $306 million.

Network estimates showed the movie studios spending about 24% more in the upfront market this year, while the beverage industry hiked spending by as much as 52%, reflecting increases by smaller players in the category.

Fast-food spending rose about 15% while package goods, one of the largest network ad categories, was up 8.8%.

On the downside, automotive spending was flat or below last year's level while retail spending was down 12%. Drug company spending was also off "significantly," network sources said.

Ratings guarantees, expected to be an explosive issue, turned into a non-item in negotiations as advertisers accepted the network-adopted policy designed to limit liability for make-goods if TV usage levels inexplicably drop again during the 1990-91 season.

"One or two clients didn't buy time or cut back on network spending because of the policy, but they will spend the money in the scatter market," ABC's Mr. Keever said. "The buyers recognized the problem, and it seems they figured if the situation does exist and TV usage drops, it's better to have some form of a guarantee."

With prime-time buys complete, attention started to turn toward network news, daytime and late-night.

Network sources said initial daytime budgets submitted by advertisers are up about 7% over last year, and the network news market is expected to be "healthier" than prime time.

Late-night sales could also be a buyer's market with the introduction of ABC's "Into the Night With Rick Dees" and a new CBS entry.

In syndication, "The Arsenio Hall Show" is already commanding CPM increases of 30% to 40% and unit costs in the $40,000 range.

"There's been a narrow supply source in the daypart, and clients are eager for more competition," a network executive said. "ABC and CBS are positioned to be a good buy." □ its fries in vegetable oil and added several low-fat menu items, including low-fat frozen yogurt.

Hardee's Food Systems had already switched to vegetable oil for fried foods. The No. 3 chain is now rolling out a new burger called The Lean 1, 30% lower in fat than its other burgers. Wendy's International publicly proclaimed its burgers are already lower in fat than The Lean 1.

Gallup in May asked a nationally projectable sample of 1,001 adults whether they were aware of "any claims that a fast-food hamburger restaurant cooks its products in animal fat, which has an impact on the cholesterol level of users of its products."

Three in 10 people polled (31%) said they were aware of the charges, 68% said they were not aware and 1% was undecided.

Awareness was lowest (23%) among adults ages 18 to 34, the heaviest consumers of fast-food.

Among respondents ages 35 to 54, 34% were aware; 37% of those 55 or older said they had heard of the charges.

Those who said they had heard about the controversy were asked which fast-food chain the health claims were made about, and 65% identified McDonald's.

Burger King Corp. was identified by 5%, while 22% said they weren't sure which chain had been criticized.

Asked whether the criticisms have caused them to increase or decrease usage of the chain they identified as the target of the charges, 39% said they've "somewhat decreased" or "greatly decreased" their patronage.

Better than half (59%) said the charges had no effect on their consumption patterns, and 3% said they've either increased consumption or are unsure. (Figures exceed 100% due to rounding.)

The problem Burger King, Hardee's, Wendy's and others face, along with McDonald's, is that similar percentages said the charges have affected their patronage of fast-food restaurants in general.

Beyond their patronage at the chain they identified as the target of the charges, 38% say general usage has dropped somewhat or greatly, and 59% said it's unchanged. Four percent said their usage increased.

Among people ages 18 to 34, 37% said their patronage of fast-food restaurants has decreased.

Concerns about fat and cholesterol "are a problem that the industry as a whole is going to have to wrestle with," said Steve Rockwell, restaurant analyst with Alex. Brown & Sons.

"The news coverage of [Mr. Sokolof's ad] appeared to indict the whole fast-food industry," he said. "And I think they'll have to fight the issue together."

Respondents were also asked how many times in the previous month they had eaten at or bought food for takeout from McDonald's.

Among 18-to-34-year-olds, the mean number of visits was 3.01. For 35-to-54-year-olds, the mean was 1.86, and it was 1.06 for those 55 or older.

The telephone survey had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%.

Asked for comment on the survey, McDonald's VP-Communications Chuck Rubner said the question asking respondents if they had heard about the claims that cooking in animal fat has an impact on the cholesterol level was "negatively written and likely to receive a negative answer as a result."

As to the survey's indication that more than one-third of respondents have decreased their patronage, Mr. Rubner said McDonald's has seen "no impact at the sales counter as a result of Mr. Sokolof's ad." □ you'd feel good knowing that more women trust their bodies to the tampon that's very, very kind to the earth. Flushable Tampax tampons. Biodegradable since 1936."

Tampons

The commercial originally ran in April for Earth Day but has been recut to a 15-second spot from a :30 for regular airing.

Tampax is also flagging its cardboard applicator products with: "Flushable and biodegradable—tampon and applicator."

In July, the company starts running trade ads in Progressive Grocer and other supermarket publications stating, "What's good for the environment is good for your business."

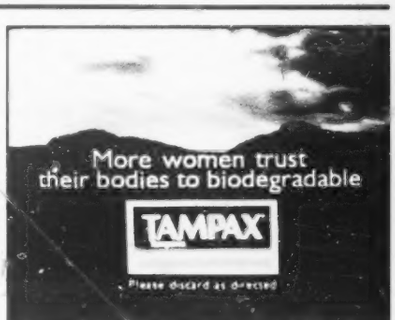
Styled as an open letter from Tambrands Chairman-CEO Martin Emmett, the retail trade ad says: "All tampons and tampon applicators, including plastic applicators, are lighter and more compact than bulky pads, use less raw materials and take up less space in landfills" than sanitary napkins.

The ad goes on to note that "over the next year, all Tampax packaging will be made from recycled board (currently 90% is)" and that Tambrands "plans to educate women on the environmental benefits of tampons through promotions, publicity and package inserts."

The campaign could have a major impact, since Tampax leads the $600 million segment, said Prudential-Bache Securities analyst Andrew Shore. "When o.b. yells, only a few people will listen, but if Tambrands does it, it'll become the next wave," he said.

The ads may also be good for Tambrands' business, since they advocate the use of tampons—the company's flagship product—as environmentally superior to sanitary napkins, a market in which Tambrands' Maxithins is doing poorly.

The ads, all from Ally & Gargano, New York, "are just two parts of a more extensive environmental campaign" involving trade and consumer promotion as well as package inserts, said Bruce Garren, Tambrands group counsel.



In a new TV spot, Tampax says its tampons have been "biodegradable since 1936."

Playtex Family Products will also be talking about environmentalism in local newspaper ads this summer in New Jersey and Massachusetts, a spokesman said.

The ads, which ran last summer in those states, urge consumers to "dispose of tampon applicators in the trash . . . not the toilet" because "flushing the applicators can cause household plumbing problems, and the applicators can eventually appear on beaches and shorelines." Grey Advertising, New York, is the agency. Unlike Tampax, all Playtex's applicators are plastic.

Kimberly-Clark Corp., marketer of Kotex tampons, plans no environment-oriented advertising or promotion.

Ms. Cadwell said the average woman uses 240 tampon applicators a year. Mr. Shore estimated their contribution to solid waste is too small to be measured.

Tampax had a 60.3% share of the tampon segment in April, followed by Playtex, 25.8; o.b., 7.6%; and Kotex, 5.2%. □

Jamie Kellner says Fox is like an awkward toddler with a few flashes of brilliance.

Fox's Kellner savors his 'risky' business

Sitting in a wing chair in his Los Angeles office, Jamie Kellner, Fox Broadcasting Co. president-chief operating officer, talked animatedly about Fox's successful upfront selling season, the network's relationship with advertisers and its plans for the future.

An edited transcript of his interview with Advertising Age Reporter Marcy Magiera follows:

Advertising Age: Your hits, "Married . . . With Children" and "The Simpsons," have been consistently called risky. But you just sold $550 million worth of inventory in the prime-time upfront market. How have you been able to sell Fox to advertisers?

Mr. Kellner: I think when we set out to design FBC, we met with a lot of advertisers and agencies, looking for the need of the industry. What we perceived the need to be was a targeted audience of the 18-49 adult age group, that didn't try to be all things to all people.

ONE ON ONE

Then we added on our desire to be very popular with the teen group, because they'd be the next 18-34 age group.

The reason we are now successful with advertisers is because we were correct in ascertaining what their needs and interests would be. . . .

It's interesting to me that if you look

Time runs out for Lord Geller

WPP merges agency with Brouillard

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Despite a bitter court battle waged by Martin Sorrell to save Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein, the agency's 23-year life as a separate entity has ended.

Mr. Sorrell's London-based WPP Group late last week merged Lord Geller into Brouillard Communications, a $70 million WPP subsidiary, to form Brouillard/LGFE.

The move came after Schieffelin & Somerset Co., Lord Geller's oldest client, fired the agency from its $10 million account. That spelled doom in a saga that began more than two years ago, when Lord Geller's top executives walked out and formed Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, bankrolled by Young & Rubicam.

WPP sued the six executives, Lord Einstein and Y&R, and ultimately collected a $7 million settlement. But the fallout of the legal fight included the loss of the $138 million IBM Corp. account and, with it, much of the agency's prestige.

Lord Geller once was a highly profitable $240 million jewel of JWT Group, acquired by WPP in 1987 in a hostile takeover.

M. Sorrell

A merger or shutdown of Lord Geller "was something contemplated for quite some time," said WPP spokesman Tom Davies, "and with the loss of one of its major accounts, it was felt by all parties concerned that [Lord Geller] no longer had the critical mass to justify having it as a separate agency."

Brouillard, specializing in financial and corporate advertising and public relations, will be home to the combined agency, which should have combined billings of $110 million. The merger could result in layoffs at

Anheuser near $90M football deal at ABC

By John McManus

Anheuser-Busch and ABC this week will cut a four-year, $90 million deal in which A-B will advertise on "Monday Night Football" and Super Bowl XXV.

The Super Bowl will likely feature the third installment of the "Bud Bowl," a much-hyped promotion for Budweiser and Bud Light, since the exclusive ad package gives A-B 10 30-second commercial spots on the broadcast.

The network is also close to signing a similar deal for a "Monday Night Football" sponsorship with Miller Brewing Co., sources said, except that it won't include a Super Bowl package.

To secure both agreements, ABC was forced to make concessions that could cost it more than $50 million in beer ad revenue over the course of its new four-year, $950 million contract with the National Football League, industry sources say.

Under the terms of the A-B deal, the brewer will pay an estimated $8 million to be the exclusive beer sponsor for the Jan. 27 Super Bowl.

The last two Super Bowls have featured the Bud Bowl, a series of high-tech spots in which teams of helmeted bottles of each brand play a football game in front of bleachers filled with fans represented by anthropomorphic beer cans.

Both A-B and Miller initially will pay about $240,000 per 30-second unit for four units in each "Monday Night Football" broadcast—each brewer gets half-game ex-

Levine tastes Smartfood

DALLAS—PepsiCo's Frito-Lay named Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, New York, to handle the estimated $10 million ad budget for Smartfood popcorn. Mullen Advertising, Wenham, Mass., continues as PR and direct marketing agency for the brand, which has just completed its national rollout. Mullen resigned the ad account when a "positioning conflict" arose over a TV spot that the agency created for juice marketer Veryfine. That spot shows people passing up a Pepsi-Cola Co. vending machine in favor of a Veryfine machine.

HHCC beefs up for Infiniti

MARINA DEL REY, Calif.—Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos last week made three senior-level additions to the creative ranks of its office here, which handles Nissan's $100 million Infiniti account. Ivan Horvath, 44, joined as senior VP and co-creative director, teaming with Hill Holliday's Dan Mountain, exec VP and co-creative director. He comes from Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles, where he was senior VP-creative director (AA, July 2). Bruce W. Ritter, formerly at DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, will join Jonathan Mandell, who exits BBDO Worldwide, New York, as another senior team on the account. Both men become VP-associate creative directors. Mr. Ritter was VP-associate creative

Chrysler accelerates corporate campaign

By Raymond Serafin

Chrysler Corp. is shifting ad funds from its three divisions to boost visibility of the "Advantage: Chrysler" corporate campaign, media and agency sources say.

The move will likely double the campaign's original $25 million budget but carries the risk of diminishing individual brand-building efforts. The shift would cut Chrysler's media spending on brand advertising, estimated at $300 million this year, by about 8.3%.

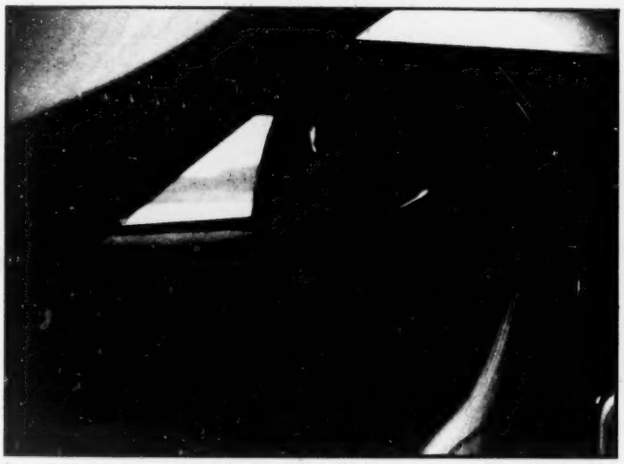
The shifting of money indicates an endorsement of the campaign by Chrysler as its best hope for regaining automotive market share. Chrysler is the No. 3 U.S. auto marketer.

Corporate agency Bozell, New York, created the campaign, which has emphasized head-to-head comparisons with competitive Japanese brands.

The campaign's fourth phase, touting seven of Chrysler's performance models as faster than rivals from Nissan, Mazda and Toyota, broke last week on network and cable TV.

As in all three previous phases, Chairman Lee Iacocca is the pitchman. Standing next to Chrysler's Lamborghini Diablo, Mr. Iacocca ends the 30-second TV spot by saying, "If Chrysler isn't the performance company, then I'm Joe Isuzu," a reference to American Isuzu Motors' well-known, fictional ad spokesman.

A six-page gatefold breaking in today's issue of Sports Illustrated and August issues of Motor Trend and Car & Driver starts with a two-page headline: "If you think Nissan, Mazda and Toyota have the edge from 0 to 60 . . . Think again. Think fast."



Lee Iacocca revs up a Lamborghini Diablo to prove Chrysler is the performance automaker.

The gatefold opens into a four-page layout that features Mr. Iacocca with the seven models—the Diablo and versions of the Eagle Talon; Plymouth Laser; Dodge Daytona; Dodge Spirit R/T and Stealth, both coming in the 1991 model year; and Dodge Viper, making its debut in 1992.

John Damoose, VP-brand marketing, earlier had said Chrysler's performance cars would be featured in separate ads to counteract a perception the company markets dull, stodgy cars.

The shifting of funds, combined with the inclusion of models from all divisions in the performance-car advertising, illustrates that Bozell is being relied on to carry more of Chrysler's marketing load.

Bozell's Birmingham, Mich., office handles Chrysler/Plymouth division, while BBDO Worldwide, Southfield, handles Dodge and Campbell-Mithun-Esty handles Jeep/Eagle.

Based on LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service figures, 1989 media spending was $139.8 million for Dodge, $85.9 million for Chrysler/-Plymouth and $74.3 million for Jeep/Eagle, a total of $300 million. Chrysler is maintaining the same level of spending this year.

BBDO is believed to be affected

Saatchi vets to start over

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Roy Warman and Terry Bannister, Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s former joint chief operating officers, plan either to start their own ad agency or buy one.

Lawyers for Messrs. Warman and Bannister, both of whom abruptly left Saatchi in May following a power struggle with Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus, are hammering out the legal details with Saatchi that would allow them to re-enter the ad business.

"We're in the design stage," Mr. Bannister said of the two executives' future plans. "We know it will take some time to design what we want and [decide] how broad a geographical spread—whether it will be confined to the U.K. or have an international orientation.

"It would be a shame to waste our international experience," he said, adding, "I don't believe the world needs another commodity-based company. We would make anything we started different from what exists."

Mr. Bannister said, "In essence, [the new company] would be going further back upstream than most agencies do in devising a total communications strategy in which advertising would be [a later] part of the execution."

R. Warman

T. Bannister

Photos by Marc Schlossman

The settlement Messrs. Warman and Bannister have negotiated with Saatchi enables them to return to advertising as long as they don't approach Saatchi clients or staff for a period of three years and perhaps longer, sources say.

Financially, the settlement is believed to cover Messrs. Warman's and Bannister's $600,000 annual salaries for the remaining four years of their contracts as well as compensation for pension and other benefits.

The two men, with Saatchi since it was a small agency in the early 1970s, departed after a reorganization by Mr. Louis-Dreyfus—who was brought in to turn the company around—left them without an important role.

Messrs. Warman and Bannister were considered part of the inner circle of executives trusted by the Saatchi brothers, Charles and Maurice.

The duo had worked as a close team—even as far as sharing a desk—since taking over Saatchi's London agency in 1981. Shared jobs running the communications division during the go-go years of Saatchi growth preceded their last job at the holding company.

Mr. Warman began on the media side of the agency business, while Mr. Bannister joined Saatchi on the account side.

On another front, Saatchi & Saatchi took an important step last week by disposing of another unwanted consulting unit.

Saatchi reached conditional agreement to sell Gartner Group to U.S. investment fund Information Partners for $70 million, of which only $55 million will be in cash. Saatchi paid $86 million for Gartner in 1988.

Saatchi spent about $425 million to assemble a consulting division and, with three more small companies still to sell, will probably end up receiving about $136 million less for the businesses than it paid, after expenses, industry analysts report. □

Chicagoland McDonald's Operators Association co-op removed poster ads from the controversial vending boxes for the Chicago Observer, a new free monthly newspaper. City officials had complained that the 3-by-4-foot McDonald's ads on the boxes constituted unlicensed outdoor boards (AA, July 2). Executives with local outdoor advertising companies reportedly are among the backers of the new paper. Mayor Richard M. Daley supports a pending ordinance restricting the size of newspaper vending boxes and prohibiting ads on them. Leo Burnett USA handles the co-op and McDonald's Corp.'s national account.

■ Checkout Channel in August begins testing TV monitors in supermarket checkout lanes in 10 stores in Atlanta; Charlotte, N.C.; Columbus, Ohio; Detroit; Los Angeles; and New York. The joint venture of Actmedia and Turner Broadcasting System airs commercials and other programming. No advertisers have signed yet; Actmedia is selling ad time. The test will run through October; Actmedia and Turner plan expansion to 5,000 supermarkets nationwide in early 1991.

NEW CAMPAIGNS

■ Bowling Proprietors' Association of America plans a $20 million ad campaign to strike the sport's low-brow image. Five 30-second TV spots and five 60-second radio spots are expected to break in August in 20 markets. Themed "It's a whole lot more than a game," the effort targets recreational bowlers including families, stay-at-home moms and seniors. Print, outdoor, direct mail and point of purchase support. Ogilvy & Mather, Houston, created the spots. The association is reviewing Texas agencies to buy media.

An upcoming $20 million ad campaign shows bowling isn't just for guys like Ralph Kramden.

■ Circuit City today breaks a spot TV campaign in eight markets, themed "Circuit City. Where service is state of the art." J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles the estimated $25 million broadcast account.

■ ShowBiz Pizza Time today breaks three TV spots in about 70 markets, continuing the theme "Where a kid can be a kid." One spot designed to look like a 1950s educational film examines the keys to a happy childhood, including ShowBiz pizza. Another shows a kid treating his mom to dinner at ShowBiz after a long day. Keller-Crescent/Southwest, Irving, Texas, handles.

■ Victoria Bank & Trust is running in Texas a TV, radio, print and outdoor campaign themed "Banking, pure and simple." The slice-of-life campaign profiles people and communities, such as the "power breakfast club" that meets at Faires' drugstore in Edna, Texas. Taylor Brown Smith & Perrault, Houston, handles.

■ Toyota Motor Sales USA is running ads in People's 94 regional editions profiling 167 dealers who earned the company's highest award for customer satisfaction. The campaign broke July 2 and runs for four weeks. The "Toyota Touch President's Award" campaign, via Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/-Pacific, Torrance, Calif., first ran in 1988.

PRODUCT NEWS

■ Rocco Enterprises in August will introduce Shady Brook Farms Marinated Fresh turkey cutlets in six flavors in the Northeast. A $4 million TV and print effort themed "Deliciously fresh. Deliciously different" will support via Warwick Baker & Fiore, New York.

■ Florida Lottery's Fantasy 5 on Aug. 6 will expand to three drawings a week from two. Drawings will be held Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights. Since its April 1989 introduction, the game has averaged $9 million in sales each week. Bozell, Tampa, Fla., handles the $34 million account.

■ Heublein bought the Cocktails for Two prepared drinks line from Schenley Industries. Heublein is the prepared drinks market leader with Heublein Cocktails and Club Cocktails. Mentler & Co., Dallas, has handled Cocktails for Two promotions; Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, bought media.

AGENCY NOTES

■ MacNamara, Clapp & Klein, New York, is looking for a new president following the departure of Keith Fischer, who held the post for two years. Chairman Frank MacNamara said Mr. Fischer left last week by mutual agreement. Mr. Fischer couldn't be reached for comment.

The $38 million agency has gone through several changes, many resulting from the sale of its biggest client, liquor marketer Buckingham Wile Co., to Hiram Walker Inc. Last month, Hiram Walker moved its $8 million Beefeater gin account to Eisaman, Johns & Law, Chicago. Two other brands, Denaka vodka and B&B liqueur, also were moved, but Mr. MacNamara said the brands had no ad support this year. He said the Beefeater billings have been replaced by new business, including the launch of Fathom, a fragrance from Mem Co.

■ Brown Marketing Group, Turnersville, N.J., has been formed by David Brown, 27, former account supervisor at Earle Palmer Brown & Spiro, Philadelphia. The agency specializes in minority marketing programs and mainstream marketing strategies for minority-owned businesses.

Morgan Furze is a unit of Grand Metropolitan. . . . Kentucky Fried Chicken Kansas City Co-op, Kansas City, Mo., to Hoffman, York & Compton, Milwaukee, from Travis/Walz & Associates, Overland Park, Kan., for the approximately $1 million account. . . . Guest Quarters Suite Hotels, Boston, to Gerbig, Snell/-Weisheimer & Associates, Worthington, Ohio, first agency for the hotel chain's estimated $1 million Midwest and Southern local/regional accounts.

Summit spotlight keeps Houston hot

By Jennifer Lawrence

HOUSTON—The economic summit that begins here today is proving to be a boon to media companies.

National and local marketers are seeking visibility as leaders of the seven Western industrialized nations meet for three days.

Pepsi-Cola Co. and Wendy's International jointly bought three outdoor boards welcoming summit participants. Also running boards are M.W. Kellogg Co., a petrochemical engineering company, and Continental Airlines, said Donna Baker, VP-general manager of Patrick Media Group of Houston.

Interest in the economic summit has benefited media.

The Houston Chronicle's special section on the summit July 8 was the paper's largest ever, 96 pages, including 48 ad pages. An extra 3,500 copies will be available during the meeting.

The Houston Post on July 1 issued a 48-page special section previewing the week's events; it carried 31 ad pages. An earlier edition was mailed to delegates and media representatives.

"It didn't require any bells and whistles [to sign advertisers]. It was an easy sell," said Ray Dallman, Post senior VP-advertising and marketing.

The Wall Street Journal's special report on the summit appears today in Asian, European and U.S. editions.

Houston, the fourth largest U.S. city and President Bush's adopted hometown, also could turn around its image as the local economy rebounds. A group of local ad executives led by agency Taylor Brown Smith & Perrault created a logo and a radio spot themed "Houston's hot," offered to advertisers by the host committee. City officials hope to use the theme as a tagline after the summit ends.

Companies including Houston Lighting & Power Co., Conoco Inc., Adolph Coors Co., Foley's and Kroger Co. have picked up the theme for their own summit-related ads.

Anyone who doubts Houston is hot hasn't been here in July. But there's no cause for worrying about the weather in "the most air-conditioned city in the world," said Peter Roussel, communications director for the Houston Economic Summit Host Committee. □

Yucas cross cultures to carve their slice of American dream

YOUNG CUBAN AMERICANS

Anays Robles and Roberto Suarez are like many successful married professionals in their 30s: They own their own home, drive new cars and spend a significant portion of their annual $100,000 income on entertainment, clothing and popular consumer goods.

But unlike yuppies, the Suarezes are yucas—young, upwardly mobile Cuban Americans. For marketers targeting this affluent niche, it is a crucial distinction.

"This market segment has a great deal in common with yuppies," says Gary Berman, president of Market Segment Research. "But there are two important differences. One, they hold on to their traditional values of family, religion and language. Two, and most important, they are bicultural and bilingual—they have options."

The facility to participate in Cuban and Anglo cultures makes them both hard to find and hard to target. But their high incomes, unique dependence on the wealth of their extended families and full participation in the accoutrements of the American dream make them especially alluring as an upscale target.

Take Roberto Suarez. He arrived in Miami 30 years ago at age 8 and says he spoke much better English than Spanish until he spent time as a professional in Venezuela.

He got his undergraduate degree at Rutgers University and his masters of business administration at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., before returning to Miami in 1975. He now is a partner in the Peregrine Group, a business and investment consultancy.

Mr. Suarez wears a Rolex watch, Armani suits and drinks Absolut vodka, Amstel Light beer and California wines. His wife calls him Robert, even though they speak with each other in Spanish half the time.

But Mr. Suarez has some very Cuban habits as well.

The son of Miami Herald President Roberto Suarez Sr., Mr. Suarez professes to read El Nuevo Herald along with the Miami Herald and The Wall Street Journal.

He switches back and forth between Spanish and English-language radio, watches local news in Spanish and national news in English—a quality issue, he says.

"I consider myself a Cuban American," he says.

His wife, 31, arrived in Miami as an infant and never left. She went to a local parochial girls school and graduated from Florida International University. Her father was a doctor and her mother, she says, is independently wealthy.

Ms. Robles stopped working five years ago when she married and enjoys shopping and working out.

She reads Newsweek, Travel & Leisure, Food & Wine and the Vida Social section of Miami's El Nuevo Herald.

She watches Spanish-language TV when there is "something special," and her choice of English or Spanish depends on with whom she is speaking, though she's more comfortable in English.

The couple are part of a large, affluent market. Of the estimated 1 million Cuban Americans in the U.S., 304,000 are between the ages of 20 and 39, according to 1989 U.S. Census figures.

Richard Tobin, president of Miami's

MasterCard turns up heat

By John McManus
and Kate Fitzgerald

MasterCard International, eager to boost declining market share, is launching a major promotion that will give its cardholders a discount at seven retailers in the fourth quarter.

"This is a critical step in reinforcing our mainstream position. . . . We definitely see a long-term potential with this program."

Those retailers are Toys "R" Us, K Mart Corp., Montgomery Ward & Co., Casual Corner, B. Dalton Bookseller and Musicland Group/Sam Goody.

In October and November, MasterCard will offer discounts on selected merchandise at the checkout counter when the card is used in conjunction with a coupon available at the store or through a MasterCard billing statement insert.

MasterCard is expected to unveil plans of the "MasterValues" promotion today and will support the effort with more than $10 million in a special holiday advertising campaign via Lintas:New York.

"Up to this point, MasterCard's been holding its own in second place rather diplomatically, but it looks like they're getting far more aggressive now," said Kurt Peters, editor of Credit Card News.

Elements of the "MasterValues" program include up to 20% savings on leading book titles in the holiday cooking, children's and reference departments at B. Dalton; 20% savings on purchases of $50 or more at 760 Casual Corner stores; and savings of up to

Waxman asks vote on anti-tobacco bill

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) last week shocked the ad industry by announcing he will ask his 23-member House Health & Environment Subcommittee to vote on his anti-tobacco proposal within two or three weeks.

H. Waxman

The bill is the most comprehensive anti-tobacco advertising measure ever considered by Congress.

Advertising industry officials say they think they have the votes to defeat the bill in subcommittee. But Rep. Waxman's intent to press for a vote ignited speculation that he might agree to jettison parts of the proposal to win votes.

"It will be a close vote, but it's important to have the committee members record their views on this issue for their constituents," Rep. Waxman said.

"I'm not sure what to make of it," said Dan Jaffe, exec VP of the Association of National Advertisers and a former Senate committee aide. "Maybe he thinks he has the votes, although that is inconsistent with what we've been told when we've polled members. . . . Or perhaps he wants to get people on the record to see if what they say behind the scenes is consistent with how they vote."

Mr. Jaffe also speculated that Rep. Waxman might want a vote because at least three sympathetic subcommittee members won't be back in 1991, "or maybe he's offered deals to people on their bills and is calling in IOUs now."

Key provisions of the bill would drastically alter how tobacco products are advertised and could amount to a de facto ban on ads for the entire category. It would:

Rain delays during the All-Star Game didn't help CBS produce blockbuster ratings.

CBS 'Dream Season' looks like washout

By Wayne Walley
and John McManus

The CBS "Dream Season" is starting to stack up as a ratings nightmare.

The network's $3.6 billion lineup of premier sporting events, from January's Super Bowl to last week's baseball All-Star Game, hasn't been the blockbuster CBS had hoped for.

Media buyers agree that the network can't be held responsible for the streak of blowouts, mismatches and rain delays that have hurt ratings for the live events, but they quickly add that the poor performances mean CBS' sports gamble will lose a lot of money.

Rival networks estimate CBS will lose $100 million each year of its four-year baseball contract alone.

"There's not enough red ink in New York for CBS," an agency executive said. "It's been the luck of the draw. Who knew they would have to take it on the chin with so many events this year? They will take a bath on baseball and not do much better with football either."

The CBS "Dream Season" of sports telecasts in 1990 includes Super Bowl XXIV and Sunday National Football League telecasts; the Professional Golf-

Swatch taps Saatchi

BIEL, Switzerland—Swatch Watch International named Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, London, to handle its estimated $20 million second-half 1990 campaign. An agency of record for the new $35 million worldwide account will be named by yearend, said Raymond Zeitoun, president of SMH U.S., a division of Swatch parent SMH. ASGS/BBDO, Zurich, is also a finalist in that review. It was a good week for Saatchi: In the U.K., the agency picked up Royal Insurance, Liverpool, for a new $18 million corporate awareness campaign; Racal Electronics' Orbitel cellular radio division, Wockingham, for a new $7 million pan-European account; and L.A. Gear's new $6.8 million footwear account on the Continent.

Goodby, Waring capture Heublein

By Patricia Winters and Alice Z. Cuneo

Heublein, traditionally handled by major national agencies, has assigned an estimated $15 million to $17 million in billings to Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein and Waring & LaRosa.

San Francisco-based Goodby won the bulk of Heublein's loose account, getting an estimated $12 million and $15 million in billings.

Goodby won Finlandia imported vodka, the Jose Cuervo line and other tequilas, and Heublein Cocktails. The agency also won Heublein's fine wine group, including the Inglenook, Christian Brothers, BV and Baron Phillippe de Rothschild labels, and its jug wine group of Almaden and Lancer's.

All of that business, plus Christian Brothers brandy, was previously at Young & Rubicam, New York (AA, March 19).

Waring & LaRosa won the Christian Brothers brandy account, which is expected to bill about $2 million.

Ironically, it was Goodby's work on Christian Brothers wine and brandy that led Heublein to the shop. Goodby had the account for several years, but when Heublein acquired the Christian Brothers brand last year, it consolidated by moving its accounts to Y&R. Goodby, however, made enough of an impression with Heublein to win tequila products business.

For the San Francisco agency, the win brings its billings close to $70 million. It also marks a significant move into the national arena by the award-winning creative shop.

Heublein couldn't be reached for comment at press time.

The move to the two smaller shops is unusual for Heublein, whose other primary agency is giant McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

But it's typical for Grand Metropolitan's International Distillers & Vintners, Heublein's parent since 1985, which has proved to be a great believer in linking with smaller shops.

International Distillers & Vintners' Carillon Importers hooked up with TBWA a decade ago for the successful introduction of Absolut vodka, while its Paddington Corp. uses Geer, DuBois and boutique Grace & Rothschild.

For the San Francisco ad community, the win marks the second time in two months a major piece of ad business has left New York for the Bay area. Last month, Foote, Cone & Belding's San Francisco office picked up the $32 million Nintendo of America business from McCann-Erickson, New York.

Also, Dole Food Co., now at Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, is considering a number of San Francisco ad agencies, including Goodby and Hal Riney & Partners, for an umbrella campaign.

The move appears to reverse a late 1980s trend, as a number of accounts left the Bay area primarily due to mergers and to a number of company headquarters leaving San Francisco. □

DCI mulls sell-off switch

'Woman's Day' sale may instead be 'Memories'

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Diamandis Communications Inc. plans to step up efforts to sell its popular Memories and might pull Woman's Day off the block if it doesn't get its asking price, DCI sources say.

DCI put Woman's Day up for sale in mid-May. The sale of the women's service book and the 21 Woman's Day Specials—a group of single-topic titles—was originally expected to generate between $200 million and $250 million.

The deadline for bids has been extended, but if Woman's Day is not sold or is sold for less than $200 million, it could increase pressure on DCI to sell Memories, a fast-growing 2-year-old nostalgia/news magazine.

The subsidiary of France's Hachette recently approached Time Warner about buying Memories in a joint venture with its editor and publisher, but Time Warner executives decided against the acquisition (AA, June 18).

DCI had planned to wait until after the Woman's Day sale to make a decision on Memories, but a DCI source said several publishers have expressed interest in the title and that DCI now plans to increase its efforts to find a buyer.

Memories will increase frequency to monthly from every-other-monthly with its October issue. It's expected to raise its rate base 33% to 800,000 next year.

The Woman's Day sale was designed to cut Hachette's estimated $400 million U.S. debt in half and allow DCI to focus on special-interest magazine publishing. When the title was put up for sale, DCI President-CEO Peter Diamandis expected a deal to be cut within six to eight weeks (AA, May 21).

Lack of buyer interest in Woman's Day may force Diamandis Communications Inc. to put more effort into selling the successful Memories.

But sources say investment banker Veronis, Suhler & Associates, which is handling the deal, was forced to extend its original mid-June deadline for bids because interest in the title wasn't as strong as expected.

Hachette is now seriously considering not selling the magazine if its asking price isn't met, sources say. The company is expected to make that decision as early as next week.

"In the negotiating process, it's not over until it's over," said a source close to Woman's Day. "We probably won't have any idea of what's going on for at least a week and a half. Veronis is still taking bids. But if [Hachette] doesn't get the money, they won't sell it."

Mr. Diamandis couldn't be reached for comment last week. Veronis executives have refused to comment while negotiations are ongoing.

The biggest names in magazine publishing were mentioned as possible bidders when Woman's Day was put on the block. But sources said several balked at DCI's high asking price and the investment of time and money the magazine needs. The magazine, published 15 times a year, has seen ad pages and circulation fall in recent years.

Bauer Publishing, for example, is still mentioned in publishing industry circles as a possible buyer. But company sources say it's no longer involved in the negotiations.

Among the companies still named as possible buyers: Cahners Publishing Co., Hearst Corp., Meredith Corp., Reader's Digest Association, MacFadden Holdings and U.K.-based Maxwell Communications.

"I think it's going to be a slow process," said one publishing executive, who said his company is "on the fringes" of the bidding. "They're still collecting bids. I don't think there are a lot of players."

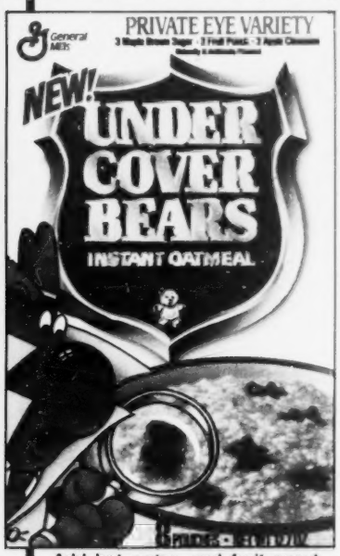
Woman's Day posted operating profits of $25 million last year, DCI says. That figure is expected to drop this year, largely due to softness in magazine ad spending and a decline in single-copy sales. The magazine's overall circulation fell 15.6% to 4.7 million in the last six months of 1989, compared with the same period a year before, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations figures. Ad pages were down 18.1% to 636.74 through May, according to Publishers Information Bureau figures. Ad revenues dropped 17.8% to $45.6 million. □

General Mills' new oatmeal is a cover-up

By Julie Liesse

General Mills is already putting its gloves on for winter as the marketer prepares to introduce its newest hot cereal—Undercover Bears.

The company in September will roll out the lumpy instant oatmeal. When the lumps dissolve in hot water, chewy, flavored bears are revealed.



Add hot water, and fruit snack-type bears pop up in General Mills' Undercover Bears instant oatmeal, rolling out this fall.

The introduction underscores General Mills' commitment to a kids-oriented marketing strategy in hot cereal. This is the company's first new cereal in two years, except for Benefit and Raisin Oat Bran, two adult brands that have been discontinued.

Undercover Bears contains plain oatmeal with bears in four varieties: strawberry, maple brown sugar, a Private Eye pack of three flavors (apple cinnamon, fruit punch and maple brown sugar) and a Super Sleuth Assortment (cherry, cinnamon spice and strawberry).

The texture of the bears is similar to General Mills' fruit snack products.

Packaging and advertising will play up detective imagery, sources said; on the box is a dog investigating the cereal a la Sherlock Holmes.

An estimated $10 million network and spot TV campaign from Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Minneapolis, will run from September through March, the traditional hot cereal season. Couponing and direct mail product samples will support.

Two years ago, General Mills targeted kids with Oatmeal Swirlers in an effort to bolster its lackluster entry into the $750 million hot cereal category. The move paid off; Swirlers has more than a 5% share, compared with 3% for Total oatmeal, the company's first cereal in the category.

"After stumbling with Total [oatmeal], they have found a nice little niche in hot cereal with Swirlers," said one cereal executive. "Given the strength of their media packages to reach kids, and the General Mills heritage, it's a niche that makes sense for them."

General Mills is third in the hot cereal category with more than an 8% share, trailing Quaker Oats Co.'s 61% and Nabisco Brands' 15%. □

Burger King attacks Big Mac with brands

By Scott Hume and Ray Serafin

Burger King Corp. is upping the ante in its battle to gain ground on fast-food market leader McDonald's Corp.

The No. 2 hamburger chain is looking to add brand name products to its mix of offerings, chain sources said.

Burger King last week said it will start testing branded Domino's pizza in four Burger King units in Columbia, S.C., in September. The Domino's test is planned to run for a year, while the two chains decide whether to expand it. Domino's is the No. 2 pizza chain behind PepsiCo's Pizza Hut.

But that's just the beginning. A likely next candidate is frozen yogurt, chain sources said. McDonald's, the largest quick-service restaurant chain, added frozen yogurt at its stores earlier this year as it continues to test pizza at upwards of 200 of its stores.

"We know if we don't work with Burger King, one of our pizza competitors might."

Officials of TCBY, the No. 1 frozen yogurt chain, said they've had no discussions with Burger King about a joint effort; No. 2 I Can't Believe It's Yogurt said they're discussing ventures with fast-food chains but not Burger King.

Burger King is also deciding whether to conduct similar tests with other branded menu items, chain sources said.

"We know if we don't work with Burger King, one of our pizza competitors might," said Burke Cueny, director of marketing for Domino's Pizza's newly created Pizzazz unit, which will oversee the Burger King test.

While not confirming an interest in a frozen yogurt test, a Burger King spokesman said the chain "is always looking at options and we have not ruled any out. We have been very active in developing cross-promotions and intend to continue to do so."

Burger King added Newman's Own salad dressings to its offerings last May, and the chain last

Dentsu hires American

Freeman's job: Bigger U.S. presence for DCA

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Dentsu, the world's biggest ad agency, took an unusual step toward boosting its U.S. profile last week by hiring an American, C. Ray Freeman, to be chief operating officer of DCA Advertising.

Mr. Freeman is one of six executives who led the March 1988 walkout from Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein to form Lord Einstein O'Neill & Partners, where he was exec VP-chief operating officer. In his new job, Mr. Freeman said, he will concentrate on building a U.S. client base for Dentsu, which "definitely wants to become a force in American advertising."

Acquisitions, he said, haven't been discussed as a way of beefing up the shop.

DCA has never been regarded as a serious agency presence here, but Dentsu executives in Tokyo are stressing the importance of building non-Japanese ad revenues quickly.

At DCA, Mr. Freeman, 47, will also be responsible for day-to-day operations here and for the office's biggest account, Canon USA's $40 million office

Microwave-only food market loses steam

By Julie Liesse

Weak or poorly positioned products have zapped the strength of the microwave foods market, grocery marketers say.

Once seen as the wave of the food industry's future, sales of microwave-specific products are slumping in category after category.

The novelty of such new products fascinates consumers, but sales rapidly fall off when they don't meet consumer needs.

Here are some recent sales trends: microwave dessert mixes down 32.3%; microwave instant potatoes down 31.6%; microwave frozen pizza down 16.6%; microwave frozen pies down 5.9%; microwave bacon down 5.5%.

These figures for the year ended March 23 are from Arbitron/SAMI, which reports that all those products underperformed relative to their overall product categories.

In addition, virtually all categories of microwave-specific frozen vegetables were down, and sales of microwaveable frozen potatoes—including the much-ballyhooed microwave french fries—were down 6.4% in the first quarter of 1990, though the frozen potato category was up overall.

Although overall sales of microwave foods rose 9.7% last year to $2.3 billion, executives are questioning the long-term potential of microwave products.

"Quality is the problem," said Jim Watkins, chairman-ceo of Golden Valley Microwave Foods and father of the microwave popcorn industry.

"Many of the products that got on the microwave bandwagon were 'soft conversions' of existing products—putting on trick packaging that yielded a lot of products that were microwaveable," Mr. Watkins said. "But many failed to deliver what the consumer has been looking for."

Other executives say quality is only one problem. Food marketers face a more knowledgeable microwave owner who demands significant time savings from using the microwave oven and is wary

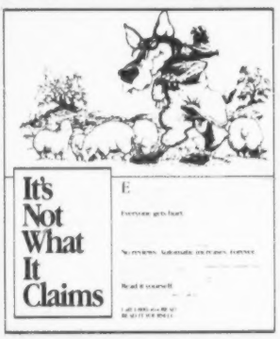
Liquor tax vote prompts ads

By Bradley Johnson

California voters, facing a November vote on the largest alcohol excise tax increase in U.S. history, are the target of an estimated $10 million ad campaign designed to derail the proposal.

The state's Alcohol Tax Act of 1990 would raise the tax on a 12-ounce can of beer, 5-ounce glass of wine or 1-ounce jigger of liquor by about 5¢. Backers say the "nickel-a-drink" measure is a user's fee that covers some of the social costs of consuming alcohol, such as alcoholism treatment, hospitals and law enforcement. Manufacturers or distributors would pay the tax.

The proposal would raise the tax on beer 1,432.5% to 57.3¢ a gallon from 4¢; on liquor 420% to $8.40 a gallon from $2; and on wine 129% to $1.29 a gallon from 1¢. The state estimates the proposal would boost alcohol excise tax revenues 461.5%, to $730 million from $130 million.



Californians are urged to vote against a tax increase.

Californians in 1988 voted to raise the state cigarette tax 350% to 35¢ from 10¢ per pack, and last month agreed to phase in a doubling of the state's gas tax to 18¢ a gallon.

In that atmosphere, Taxpayers for Common Sense is mounting a statewide TV, radio and newspaper campaign, contending approval could lead to other tax hikes. A print ad headlined "It's not what it claims" explains that the proposal requires the state to increase spending on alcohol-related programs, possibly at the expense of other social programs. TV breaks closer to Election Day; radio and newspaper ads began in June via Nelson/Ralston/Robb Communications, Costa Mesa, Calif.

The state demanded ads carry a notice that the group gets "major funding from the Beer Institute and industry, Wine Institute and Distilled Spirits Council."

The group said it raised $10.6 million in the six months ended May 31, primarily through industry contributions. While Press Director Bill McIntyre wouldn't say how much more the group expects to raise or what it will spend on advertising, a group of tax hike proponents, Alcohol Tax Initiative, expects alcohol interests to spend $15 million to $20 million on ads, close to what the tobacco industry spent in 1988 fighting the cigarette tax increase.

Alcohol Tax Initiative will rely on the media and grass-roots efforts, and may request airtime under the fairness doctrine.

"We don't have the money at this point to buy any meaningful media. I don't think we're going to raise more than $2 million, $2.5 million," said Leo McElroy, president of McElroy Communications, Sacramento, agency on the campaign. □

When shoppers decide what to buy

The grocery list is alive and well, with 61% of supermarket purchases planned before shoppers even visit the store. That means promotions for most products are more effective when they target consumers at home. However, with partially planned purchases (where the brand is chosen in the store), in-store support is more likely to influence brand choice.

Other radio doubles

After reading James Brady's June 25 column, "I Love a Mystery" and "One Man's Family" came alive again for me, too.

But if my memory is still functioning correctly, Michael Raffeto wasn't the only one who played a double role. I believe that the actors who played Doc and Reggie also appeared as Barbours and that both programs were created by the same writer, Carlton E. Morse.

It's one thing to move Mr. Raffetto's reassuring baritone from show to show, but quite another to successfully draft sedate drama one day and all-out action the next. Or maybe it was simply terrific sound effects—"Paul" tapping his pipe or "Jack" shouting over the roar of a seaplane's engine. And did we ever find out where the Barbour family's "Sky Ranch" was supposed to be located?

I believe Doc, played by Barton Yarborough, was a Texan, not simply a "Southerner." Barton went on to play Joe Friday's sidekick on radio's "Dragnet," and then on to the TV version until his demise. . . . Mercedes McCambridge played almost all the women's parts. There was one episode concerning three sisters, Faith, Hope and Charity, and she played all three with different voices.

Include regional editions

I was disappointed with the special supplement on the Washington market (AA, June 11) and feel that you missed a very compelling marketing opportunity by excluding any reference or listing of regional editions of national magazines.

While I appreciate your space limitations, the Washington market is sufficiently important to a number of national magazines for them to maintain local advertising sales offices. In addition to Time, Fortune, Newsweek, U.S. News & World Report and TV Guide, a variety of other national magazines are represented here for the purpose of servicing and selling national, regional and local advertisers.

The combined Washington area circulation of just the magazines that maintain facilities in this market nearly exceeds the total circulation of all local/regional magazines combined.

What's more, several representatives of these magazines play an active role in the local advertising communities. . . . Their combined contributions play no small role in the overall success and prosperity of the Washington advertising community.

Perhaps future city sections of this nature should attempt to include listings of national publications that are sufficiently committed to these local markets to make substantial investments in them. In so doing you would provide your readers with a more complete presentation of media options available to them.

Another survey shortfall

In your June 11 issue, a couple of letters supported Sid Bernstein's column [on phoney surveys]. . . . They point out the harm being done to the research industry by telemarketing companies disguising their sales pitches as research.

Anyone involved in this business is well aware of the increases in refusal rates for telephone surveys over the last 10 or 12 years. They not only raise the costs of research but threaten the validity of the sampling, since some members of the population are more apt to refuse than others.

Not all the blame, however, can be placed with telemarketers. Some of the responsibility for consumers' disenchantment with survey research can be traced to practices in the industry itself.

A rule of thumb many years ago was that the greatest cost in survey research was in establishing contact with a qualified respondent. Once he was on the line, we had free rein to spend 20, 25, 30 or more minutes abusing him with trivial, redundant questions about what we now realize are often simple, nearly thoughtless choices. . . . Eight attribute ratings for each of five brands may look like a single question to a client and research analyst. The interviewers and respondents who have to endure them see it as 40 tedious questions.

Piggy-backing political or social issue questions may be a cheap way for researchers to gain publicity when the results are released to the press, but only at the expense of respondents who are forced to endure extra questioning because they are too polite to hang up.

So who can be surprised about rising refusal rates? . . . After all, consumer participation is voluntary, and the quickest way to stop someone from volunteering is to abuse him for doing it.

Ethnic insensitivity

Your article "Should marketers target blacks more?" (AA, July 2) gives cause for concern on how ethnic groups are perceived in the U.S.

How can a country which prides itself on being the originator of modern marketing be so insensitive to the opportunities which these cultures represent? Why this reluctance to target more effectively these growing market opportunities?

According to the Census Bureau, black Americans and Hispanic Americans together represent one out of every five persons in the U.S. How can any businessman worth his salt ignore 20% of his market and expect to maximize his profit potential? Why do we still have to debate the elementary issue of targeting ethnic groups?

Maybe we should look East for answers to these questions. Over the past 40 years the Japanese have rebuilt their country into an economic powerhouse on three basic principles: hard work, long-term planning and investment and, last but not least, know your market.

Will we never learn?

PROMOTION & ACCOUNT ACTIVITY

Coupons in clover: Consumers still believe in coupons and the companies that offer them, according to a new Carolina Manufacturer's Service survey. Of 1,365 grocery shoppers polled, 85% said they believe cents-off coupons reduce their grocery bills, and 84% said products discounted through coupons are of high quality. Eight in 10 said coupons encourage them to try new brands; seven of 10 said coupons give them an incentive to stock up on products they usually buy. M/A/R/C, Dallas, conducted the phone survey.

Ford revamps rebates: Ford Motor Co. is testing dealer-only rebates on selected Mercury car lines in New England, New York and New Jersey, Automotive News reported. If results are good, dealer rebates may replace direct-to-customer rebates at Ford. Ford is giving dealers $300 to $1,500 on some 1989 and 1990 models based on performance against quota. CASE STUDY: Children's Miracle Network

Case Study summarizes the results of a recent promotion.

- Who: Children's Miracle Network, a national fund-raising non-profit organization, and nine marketers: Clorox Co., Eveready Battery Co., GTE Corp., Hershey Foods Corp., Johnson & Johnson, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Kraft General Foods, Shulton Inc. USA and 3M. Ryan Cause Marketing, Westport, Conn., developed and executed the full promotion; Quad Marketing, New York, placed the free standing insert. Marketers paid Ryan a participation fee averaging $25,000.
- What: Children's seventh annual telethon, designed to raise money for the 160 children's hospitals in the U.S. A 26-page FSI mailed to 50 million households carried $20.00 worth of coupons for 88 brands, averaging 40¢ in value. For each redeemed, marketers made a donation to the charity, up to $250,000 per category. Retailers including food, drug and mass merchandisers displayed in-store ads in 36,000 stores.
- When and where: The telethon was broadcast live from Disneyland June 2-3 on more than 180 TV stations across the U.S. Every hour during the 21-hour telethon, on-air celebrities held up the FSI, encouraging consumers to use the coupons.
- Results: The fundraiser brought in $89 million, up 15.6% from 1989. About $7 million was raised via the FSI.

Free standing inertia

Innovations enhance FSIs

By Alison Fahey

Package-goods marketers, facing increasing costs for free standing inserts and flat coupon redemption rates, want to spice up their FSIs.

"People are out there saying, 'How can we make our FSIs more interesting?' " said Ken Bortner, president of News America Publishing/FSI Division.

Mr. Bortner, who heads up News America's Quad Marketing and Product Movers, the leaders in the $1 billion FSI industry with a combined 60% share, said the company has "10 different creative proposals in front of major advertisers like Nabisco and Procter & Gamble."

News America in November will introduce a program that affixes product samples to FSIs carrying cents-off coupons. An undisclosed major advertiser has signed up for an FSI drop reaching 50 million households, Mr. Bortner said.

Another new approach replaces cents-off coupons with checks. North American Marketing Enterprises, a direct marketing agency specializing in package-goods data-base marketing, is seeking sponsors for Brand Cash, a program that puts checks on FSIs. The checks also have been used in direct mail and on packages.

Brand Cash checks, like cents-off coupons, are redeemed at checkout. A shopper endorses a check made out to the retailer and gets the value of the check discounted from the purchase.

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and a cigarette marketer are expected to participate in a November drop of 10 million FSIs carrying checks, said Carl Fergo, president of North American Marketing Enterprises.

Bristol-Myers Squibb couldn't be reached for comment.

Marketers' main benefit is higher redemption rates, 50% to 200% higher than traditional coupons, Mr. Fergo said.

The checks also offer demographic information because consumers endorse them with their name and address and on the back of the check are asked three questions about brand preference.

Marketers also are increasingly enhancing FSIs with tie-ins and 900 numbers. Tie-ins aren't new, but recently "every marketer is out there looking for an issue to tie into," Mr. Bortner said.

For example, Ralston Purina Co. on July 8 ran an FSI tied to Global ReLeaf, a reforestation project. The FSI carried $2 worth of coupons for three cereal brands and encouraged consumers to call a 900 number (for a $3 charge) to have a tree planted in their name. Callers receive an additional $7 worth of coupons.

Despite the techniques in development, some agency executives doubt FSIs will change drastically.

"I think the bolder [marketers] will do things other than straight coupons. [But] no one is going to take chances in an economy that's somewhat stagnant. . . . Most marketers won't give up the coupon," said Ron Melk, senior VP-director of creative services at Comart-KLP, New York.

Effectiveness is becoming more critical as FSI prices rise.

"When FSIs cost about 5 bucks [per page] a couple years ago, there was no reason not to do them. But as the prices come back up, we need them to be more effective," one marketing executive said.

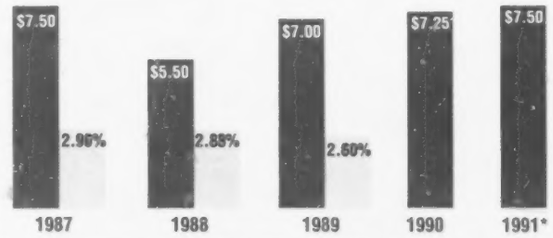
In 1991, News America/FSI Division will charge $7.50 per FSI page, up 3.4% from this year, Mr. Bortner said. Next year's price is the same as 1987 costs but significantly higher than the $4-per-page low during the 1988 FSI pricing wars, he said.

Marketers also want to stand out in a sea of Sunday coupons.

Last year, 88.7% of package-goods coupons were distributed via FSIs, up from 80% in 1988, reported the Summary Scan! division of the Advertising Checking Bureau. But redemption rates for coupons overall are flat at less than 4%, despite a 4% jump to 263 billion coupons distributed in 1989, Summary Scan! reported. □

Inflation frustration

The cost of FSIs continues to rise, while overall coupon redemption levels are flat. A typical FSI run reaches 50 million households.



Note: Coupon redemption rates for 1990 and 1991 are not available. *Projected of heavily packaged foods for price and environmental reasons.

Microwave

Pillsbury Inc. offers a case study. When Pillsbury, a pioneer in microwave products, introduced the first microwave cake mix in late 1986, it responded to consumer requests for a quicker way to make a traditional dessert cake.

"That's what consumers told us they wanted," said Linda Keene, VP-marketing for desserts and sweet snacks. "So that's what we gave them: a conventional analog for a traditional, round layer cake."

But after initially being hailed as the product that would resuscitate the baking mix category, microwave mix sales have slumped dramatically. Sales of dessert baking mixes fell 7.2% to $718.6 million, but sales of microwave products within the category slid 32.3% to $65.4 million for the year ended March 23.

Although 70% of consumers had told Pillsbury they would use microwave cakes as a dessert, most were serving them as a snack, the company discovered. Given that, the product didn't match the consumers: Snackers didn't like the pan, which had to be greased beforehand, or the cake size, and they wanted a package that included frosting.

And they didn't buy lemon cake mixes or anything with vanilla icing—two of Pillsbury's offerings—for snacking.

Pillsbury will try again this fall, spending $15 million to sell consumers on its reformulated, repositioned microwave cake mixes, via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

Over the years, Pillsbury has tinkered with the cake mixes now being shipped to retailers; the product formulation has been upgraded several times and frosting packets became a staple in 1988.

Two flavors—lemon and chocolate with vanilla frosting—are being discontinued in favor of such typical snack cake flavors as carrot and banana walnut.

"We changed the product to fit the occasion," Ms. Keene said. "A cake mix plays a different role when it goes into the microwave. We didn't anticipate that."

For other marketers, the problem is "relying on 'microwaveable' as their [product's] unique product benefit," said Sandy Bredine, partner in Bishop/Bredine Associates, agency for microwave sandwich marketer Pitaria Products Co.

"Microwaveability itself doesn't make a product different," he said, "and the consumer is way ahead of marketers on this."

He and others agree the frozen microwave sandwich market is headed for a shakeout—having grown 51.5% last year to $265 million, on the strength of too many inferior products.

"We're still very optimistic about where the microwave food market is going, but we do have questions about the total size of the market. It's not as big perhaps as we originally thought," said Blaine Jacobson, director-marketing for J.R. Simplot Co.

Simplot, first out with microwave french fries under the MicroMagic name in 1985 and sandwiches and milkshakes in 1986 and 1987, has seen sales soften as a bevy of marketers entered the microwave snack foods market.

Geo. A. Hormel & Co. continues to market its New Traditions frozen sandwiches but has dropped microwaveable french fries after a disappointing test.

Quaker Oats Co. is determined to make its new microwaveable OvenStuffs frozen sandwiches a success (see story on this page). But Quaker knows it faces an uphill battle.

"Microwaveability itself doesn't make a product different, and the consumer is way ahead of marketers on this."

"There is a subgroup of people who are looking for convenient alternatives and will try anything once. Then quality becomes an issue. Tricks in the microwave are less appealing than they used to be," said Eileen Thompson, Quaker's director of marketing research for new ventures. "It's doubly hard to enter a category like frozen sandwiches, where quality perceptions are low."

Golden Valley's Mr. Watkins said, "Part of what's happening is that the microwave owner is starting to get more demanding about the products he buys, but the microwave still, by and large, represents a quality compromise."

He said—and many other executives agreed—that microwave popcorn, the standout success among microwave foods, owes its popularity to two simple facts: The microwave oven delivers a better product in terms of taste and texture, and the popcorn's inflatable-bag technology makes it easy to tell when the popcorn is done cooking.

Microwave popcorn marketers have successfully segmented the $596 million market with flavored and "light" offerings.

No. 2 microwave popcorn marketer General Mills will take that segmentation strategy one step further this summer when it launches Pop Secret Singles: boxes of five popcorn packets half the size of the current industry standard, which is 12 cups of popped corn.

In some cases, consumers—many with more than a decade of microwave experience under their belts—simply are learning how to use the microwave with "regular" products that are often less expensive.

Executives attribute some consumer disillusionment to microwave products such as Hershey Foods Corp.'s new Perfection microwave pasta, which with a cooking time of 8 to 10 minutes offers no significant time savings over most regular dry pasta.

Green Giant President Gary Klingl said the return to microwaving "regular" products is true in such categories as frozen vegetables, where the "regular" product—in this case sold in polybags—cooks and tastes nearly on a par with single-serve products labeled as microwave-specific.

In addition, "regular" products tend to avoid the appearance of overpackaging, a growing issue in some microwave product categories.

"As environmental issues are coming in, consumers want products without the extra layers of packaging—unless there really is a convenience benefit in that packaging," Quaker's Ms. Thompson said.

Despite all these concerns of product quality and convenience, price/value relationships and consumers' environmental awareness, some marketers say the microwave food industry is changing simply because it's maturing.

"Historically, the novelty of the microwave could sell a product. But now the euphoria of microwave ovens has settled down," said Barry Wegener, a public relations supervisor for General Mills.

With microwave penetration now at 85%, according to Campbell Microwave Institute, "The food industry still has many opportunities in microwave foods," Mr. Watkins said. "But they have to fit the 'Big Mac lifestyle.'"

Dial Corp.'s Lunch Buckets and Hormel's MicroCup line of single-serve, portable meals, for instance, seem to have found a niche.

Part of food marketers' optimism about the continued vitality of microwave foods is centered on children, who are growing up with microwave ovens and microwave foods designed especially for them. □

Quaker stuffs $22M in sandwich

By Julie Liesse

CHICAGO—Quaker Oats Co. is committing $22 million to convince consumers its OvenStuffs aren't like other microwave-only sandwiches.

Quaker this fall is rolling national with OvenStuffs after a nearly two-year market test.

The line of six frozen, microwaveable sandwiches performed well in Cleveland, Denver and Pittsburgh, chalking up as much as a 20% monthly share of the frozen sandwich market, industry sources say. But Quaker spent at a national equivalent rate of $8 million in advertising, and media spending for the national launch is budgeted at just $5.5 million.

In those tests, Quaker found shoppers bought OvenStuffs on impulse, so the company has budgeted a whopping $16.5 million for trade and consumer promotions, including couponing and in-store sampling.

Media advertising includes TV and print ads from Bayer Bess Vanderwarker. The campaign, set to break on spot and network TV in October, is tagged "The great stuff you've been looking for."

Each OvenStuffs features a filling—turkey and swiss, for instance—in one of three breads: flaky turnover pastry, french rolls or pita-style bread.

OvenStuffs is the first new product out of Quaker's Frozen Foods Division, set up last month as a separate entity within the company's U.S. Grocery Products unit.

Quaker desperately wants success in frozen foods, where its only offerings to date have been Celeste pizza and lackluster products under the Aunt Jemima brand.

The frozen sandwich market—mostly microwaveable entries—grew 51.5% to $265 million for the year ended March 23, Arbitron/SAMI reported.

Although Quaker stresses that OvenStuffs has an advantage as a line designed specifically for microwaves, it will enter the market at a tough time. Most national competitors are already well-entrenched, with some executives predicting a shakeout.

In addition to market leader Hot Pockets, from Chef America, Campbell Soup Co. has just completed national rollout of Souper Combos; Pitaria Products Co. is close to national distribution with its PitaStuffs line; and Oscar Mayer Foods Corp. continues moving Zappetites into new markets.

Other national competitors include ConAgra Frozen Foods' Zap line and Geo. A. Hormel & Co.'s New Traditions. □

Ad industry fears falloff

Media look anxiously for yearend turnaround

An Advertising Age roundup

Fears are growing that a "selective" recession hitting some media may spread throughout the ad industry and worsen.

Newspapers, magazines and local TV stations, already hard hit by advertising cutbacks, fear prospects of a fourth quarter without a rebound. Ad agencies and network TV, so far relatively unaffected by the recession, are eyeing the fourth quarter with increasing concern.

Uncertainty is growing, triggered by worsening conditions in the print media.

Magazine ad pages are already 3.3% behind for the first half of 1990 compared with the same period last year (see related story on Page 32). The Newspaper Advertising Bureau, which halved its projection for 1990 revenue gains in April, from the original 5.9% to just 3% to 4%, now says papers will be lucky to do even that well.

In the second quarter, the media's confidence level has ebbed and the fear of a general recession has spread.

The worst fears are at media companies.

"I'd love to think we've bottomed out, but we have no information that tells us that," said Brian Donnelly, president of Gannett Co.'s metro newspapers.

Mr. Donnelly said Gannett's West Coast papers, which had been relatively unaffected until recently, began to show weakness in June.

Gannett last week announced a 6.1% decline in net income for the second quarter, its first such drop in 22 years. It wasn't alone.

Other media companies reporting lower earnings included The New York Times Co., Scripps-Howard, Pulitzer Publishing Co.,

Wendy's changes oil

DUBLIN, Ohio—Wendy's this week is expected to announce a shift to 100% vegetable oil for cooking its french fries. It's been using a blend of animal and vegetable oils. Burger King made a similar announcement last week. Both chains are expected to promote their switches with in-store materials. McDonald's will be the only major hamburger chain not to have switched.

Coors Extra Gold for FCB

GOLDEN, Colo.—Adolph Coors Co. moved the Coors Extra Gold account to Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, from GSD&M, Austin, Texas. Coors spent $22 million on Extra Gold ads last year; support has been lower this year in anticipation of a new campaign. GSD&M keeps the Coors brand and Hispanic advertising.

Jhirmack taps Rosenfeld

NEW YORK—Jhirmack, a Playtex Family Products unit, moved back to its original agency, Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss, after Backer Spielvogel Bates resigned (AA, July 16). Ad spending has been about $8 million, but the brand will be relaunched in early 1991 with a larger budget.

Lauder to roll out natural Origins line

By Pat Sloan

NEW YORK—In a radical departure for the cosmetics industry, Estee Lauder Cos. will become the first major U.S. beauty company to bring natural, non-animal-tested products packaged in recyclable containers into department stores.

Estee Lauder is launching a new corporate division called Origins Natural Resources and next month will start marketing skincare, body products, aromatherapy and makeup under the Origins name.

It's the fifth major cosmetics unit for Estee Lauder Cos. The others are Estee Lauder, Aramis, Clinique and Prescriptives.

In line with the green movement, Origins will even accept empty bottles at the cosmetics counter from consumers who don't have access to recycling programs.

Campbell cuts marketing budget

By Judann Dagnoli

Campbell Soup Co. is cutting its marketing budget for the first time in five years and softening its hard line on agency compensation.

Herb Baum, Campbell North America president, said the company's domestic and Canadian marketing budget, which has traditionally risen 15% to 20% annually, is headed 5% downward in fiscal 1991, starting Aug. 1.

"It's partly because of divestitures, but some of it reflects a dramatic push for more productivity," Mr. Baum said, adding that most of the cutbacks "will be in regional marketing spending."

Campbell North America's marketing budget in fiscal 1990 was more than $250 million, according to Advertising Age estimates.

"It's partly because of divestitures, but some of it reflects a dramatic push for more productivity."

At the same time, Campbell is revising its agency compensation system formulated only last April.

Under the terms of that incentive compensation system, base compensation for Campbell agencies would be lowered from 15% to a sliding scale that averaged 13% to 14% (AA, April 30).

Sales goals were to be agreed upon at the start of the company's fiscal year, and if the agency met or exceeded those goals the compensation rate would be increased accordingly, but never to exceed 15%.

Dentsu eyes Europe through CDP deal

By Laurel Wentz and David Kilburn

Dentsu is discussing a deal with U.K.-based Collett Dickenson Pearce that would give Dentsu much-sought access to a European network.

The world's biggest agency also may be talking about links with other agencies in the U.K. and elsewhere in Europe. Dentsu has said publicly it wants to see faster growth of its relatively small non-Japan business; however, its overall strategy for doing this isn't clear.

If negotiations with CDP are successful, Dentsu would take a large minority stake in CDP's Luxembourg-based international holding company, CDP International, sources say. A deal could be announced this fall.

In Tokyo, Dentsu executives refused to comment on the CDP negotiations or its expansion plans.

CDP Chairman Christopher Stewart-Smith said, "All we've ever confirmed is that we're in regular discussion with them about clients, and I think they have a high regard for us. I believe they have been talking to a number of people."

He said although Tokyo-based Dentsu and London-based CDP currently share only Toyota, they have talked about several other Dentsu clients CDP might handle.

Sources said Dentsu and CDP would later seek a U.S. agency to buy, giving CDP a much-needed U.S. partner.

When CDP in 1988 bought back a 40% stake that Young & Rubicam, New York, held in the agency, CDP executives said they would try to buy a midsize New York agency in a year or two. However, as an independent, CDP has made little progress toward establishing a U.S. link.

In CDP, Dentsu would get not only the U.K.'s No. 11 agency, with 1989 gross income of $39 million from billings of $270 million, but also a collection of continental agencies in which the holding company owns equity or has an affiliation with. The holding company has stakes in or has an affiliation with the Alice agency in France, Grupo Barrio in Spain, Canard in Italy, and agencies in West Germany, the Netherlands, Denmark, Austria, Switzerland and Turkey.

Until now, Dentsu has operated in Europe only through small representation offices in West Germany and Spain that don't create or place advertising. The Spanish office, opened in Barcelona in January 1989, has mainly been involved in sponsorship deals for Japanese advertisers.

In the U.K., two local agencies denied rumors they too are negotiating a closer relationship with Dentsu.

"We work very closely with Dentsu and we share the agency fee on Mazda," said Len Weinreich, executive creative director of Burkitt Weinreich Bryant Clients & Co. "We've done a number of special projects [for Dentsu] from time to time. Dentsu does that with quite a lot of agencies. Because they have so many conflicting clients, they have to have many relationships" outside Japan.

However, his agency's expansion plans involve building a network of independent shops in different countries and have nothing to do with Dentsu, Mr. Weinreich said.

Butterfield Day Devito Hockney also has a relationship with Dentsu on the Honda account, a Dentsu client BDDH handles in the U.K.

"Beyond that, we have no other plans or formal agreements with Dentsu," said Leslie Butterfield, BDDH's chairman and planning director.

Dentsu plans to expand its own DCA Advertising, New York, and recently hired an American, C. Ray Freeman, to be chief operating officer.

It's also part owner of HDM Worldwide, along with Young & Rubicam and Eurocom. □

Seagram axes media unit

$55M in ad buys returns to brand agencies

By Patricia Winters

NEW YORK—The elimination of 177 jobs at Jos. E. Seagram & Sons is benefiting Seagram's ad agencies.

As part of the staff reduction, Seagram last week eliminated its 20-person in-house media buying unit, including VP-Media Allen Goldin, and is moving about $55 million in buying back to its brand agencies.

The bulk of spending went to Ogilvy & Mather, agency for Seagram's name liquors, and DDB Needham Worldwide, agency for premium brands such as Crown Royal and Chivas Regal, a company spokesman said.

Wells, Rich, Greene and the Mingo Group also will buy media for their accounts. Brands handled by WRG include Seagram's Coolers; Mingo is the company's black consumer market agency.

Based on 1989 spending figures compiled by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, DDB Needham wins $26 million in media buying, O&M receives $17 million and WRG gets $10 million.

The Seagram spokesman said he didn't know how the agencies would be compensated now that they handle both media and creative.

Seagram's overall staff reduction—accounting for about 7.5% of its work force—underscores the trouble that's plagued the liquor industry for more than a decade.

Last year, liquor volume fell 3% to 156 million 9-liter cases, said John C. Maxwell Jr., beverage analyst with Wheat, First Securities.

"The market is down again this year by 4% to 6%, and it will be that way for the foreseeable future," he said. "And if Congress has its way with more taxes, it could be worse."

Seagram isn't the only company with problems. Schieffelin & Somerset Co., a joint venture company between Moet Hennessy and

"With a reduced ad budget, you have to question the long-term merit of an in-house media buying unit."

Guinness, confirmed last week it's axed 14% of its 280-member staff, including marketing and sales positions. The cuts are the first since Schieffelin Co. and Somerset Distilling merged in 1987.

Seagram's media department was created five years ago to save money, but media buying has become labor intensive and more complicated.

Industry observers also note that Seagram's media spending has dropped since the mid-1980s, especially with the decline in wine cooler advertising, and is likely to keep shrinking.

"With a reduced ad budget, you have to question the long-term merit of an in-house media buying unit," said one source close to the company.

Seagram noted there are fewer and fewer wholesale and retail outlets in the industry, and added that the company has only about half of the brands it once had. Seagram last year eliminated most of its mass, unadvertised brands to focus on premium spirits—the industry's one growing area.

Schieffelin took the same tack, concentrating on premium brands like Hennessy cognac, Moet & Chandon champagne, Tanqueray gin and Johnnie Walker scotch.

In the 1980s, the strategy worked; premium segments such as champagne and cognac saw sales growth. But now even those segments, except for imported vodka and some premium varietal wines, are facing tough times.

"We were insulated; we operated with premium brands," said Penn Kavanagh, president-ceo of Schieffelin. "The categories of merchandise we sold were growing, and our business was driven by category growth. Now we don't see growth. . . . we can only look to growing share."

Seagram is the nation's No. 2 liquor company with a 14% share, Mr. Maxwell said. Grand Metropolitan's International Distillers & Vintners, owner of Carillon Importers, Paddington Corp. and Heublein, is No. 1 with an 18.7% share. Schieffelin is ninth with 2.8%. □

Ad boom seen for brands, Europe

By Gary Levin and Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—European ad spending will continue to skyrocket, and a renewed focus on brand-building in the U.S. will overshadow the sales promotion boom.

Those are the key findings for the advertising and media businesses in Veronis, Suhler & Associates' annual communications industry forecast, released last week.

This year's report marked the first time the media brokerage company tracked foreign spending, with figures released for seven countries where substantial spending gains of the past several years are expected to continue.

In Spain, Italy, France, West Germany, the U.K., Japan and Canada, measured media advertising totaled $69.8 billion in 1989, up 10.5% from 1988 and approaching U.S. measured media spending of $77.5 billion as tracked by Veronis Suhler. Combined ad spending in those countries has more than doubled since 1980's $29.6 billion total.

Among the seven countries, Spain and Italy have grown the fastest since 1981, with compound annual ad spending growth of 27.4% and 17.4%, respectively. Both will continue strong through 1994, with compound annual growth rates of 25.2% and 10.8%.

Measured media forecasts for the seven countries show that as a percentage of total ad dollars spent, TV will grow to 37.1% by 1994 from 31.5% in 1980, due partly to deregulation and commercialization of foreign networks. Newspapers' share of the advertising pie will decline to 38.3% from 43.2%. Radio's share will drop slightly to 5.9% from 6.6%, and magazines will remain about even at 18.7%.

In the U.S., Veronis Suhler estimated total 1989 advertising and promotion spending at $222.9 billion, a 5.8% increase from 1988—the lowest percentage gain in any of the past five years. Promotion spending rose 6.1% to $98.2 billion, accounting for 44% of the total; measured media spending rose 5.7% to $77.5 billion; and other spending, including direct mail and Yellow Pages, rose 5.7% to $47.2 billion.

Over the past five years, "measured media has really taken its licks in comparison with promotional spending and the economy," said John Suhler, president of the company. "Leveraged buyouts had a dramatic effect on the economy. Advertising and promotional spending were viewed as discretionary during the restructuring."

But Mr. Suhler said early signs of a comeback for "building brand franchises" are appearing as spending cutbacks ease in general image advertising.

"We think advertisers are getting a little jaded with promotional spending," said David Wilkofsky, president of the Wilkofsky Gruen Associates economic consulting company.

The forecast paints a rosy ad revenue picture for U.S. broadcasters, predicting a 6.8% compound annual growth rate for networks and local TV stations from 1989 to 1994.

Network advertising by 1994 will total nearly $12.8 billion, up from $9.3 billion in 1989, reflecting a 6.6% compound annual growth rate that is nearly triple the 2.2% compound growth of the past five years.

"The growth rates of competing media have moderated, and the negatives for network TV are fewer," Mr. Suhler said.

"This is not a plug for network TV, but as it relates to media vehicles, no one has found a more efficient vehicle for mass delivery," Mr. Suhler said, adding that his forecast for more brand-equity advertising in large part will fuel this gain.

Networks won't be the only beneficiaries of increased ad spending, the study said. Local station advertising will grow at a 6.9% compound annual rate, reaching almost $21.2 billion by 1994 compared with $15.2 billion last year.

Veronis Suhler also projected spending on cable TV subscriptions and advertising will grow at the same 8% annual rate to reach $16.5 billion by 1994.

Total cable advertising, the forecast said, will grow to $3 billion by 1994, a 13.7% annual increase that reflects much slower growth than the average annual 23.8% rise of the past five years as cable penetration has increased.

Cable, which Mr. Suhler described as "the darling of our reports for the last 10 years," now has "arithmetic problems. The circulation won't increase as much by new wires. and the big increases are behind us," he said. "We're now down to marginal growth rates."

Ad spending in magazines will grow at a 6.8% compound rate, slightly faster than average growth since 1984. Consumer magazine ad revenues will reach $9.4 billion by 1994, compared with $6.75 billion last year, while trade magazine ad spending will rise to $3.65 billion by 1994, compared with $2.77 billion in 1989, the study said. □

JUNE AD RESULTS

Magazine declines mount

By Wayne Walley

Magazine publishers would cheer the first-half results of 1990 if it were any other year.

Ad pages for the first six months of 1990 totaled 85,451.4, Publishers Information Bureau reported. That's up 9.8% from the same period in 1989, but down 3.3% from the record-setting 1989 figures.

June ad pages for titles tracked by PIB were down 3.9% from a year earlier to 14,050.4.

Despite the drop in ad pages, ad revenues for the first six months rose 1.6% to $3.3 billion, while June ad revenues increased 3% to $547.5 million.

Spending in the top 10 ad categories, which accounted for more than 60% of magazine ad spending last month, was flat at $370.7 million. First-half spending levels in those categories fell 1.4% to $2.3 billion, PIB reported.

Automotive, the largest category, dropped 12.6% in the first half to $415 million. Cigarette and tobacco advertising showed the steepest first-half decline, 27.2% to $154.6 million.

Computers, office equipment and stationery fell 7.5% to $110.9 million, while business and consumer services spending was off 0.4% to $252.7 million.

Other top 10 ad categories, however, increased spending. Those showing gains, according to PIB, were retail (up 22.7% to $108.7 million); food and food products (up 11.4% to $233.6 million); apparel, footwear and accessories (up 11.2% to $193.4 million); toiletries and cosmetics (up 6.6% to $340.4 million); travel, hotels and resorts (up 3.8% to $217.1 million); and direct response (up 1.4% to $261 million).

The number of ad pages paints a bleak picture for the industry. Of the top 100 magazines, 70 posted declines in ad volume for the first half of the year while 30 showed an increase.

Last year's ad page leader, Business Week, rebounded in June, posting a 10.4% increase in ad pages to 490.45. The McGraw-Hill magazine carried 2,041.82 ad pages in the first six months, down 8.4%, and was the only magazine to top 2,000 during the first half.

Forbes, one of the few publications enjoying an up year, increased ad pages in June by 9.8% to 299.68 and ranked second for the first half with 1,802.41 pages, a 7.9% increase.

Major weeklies continued to be the hardest hit by the slump. Ad pages in Time Warner's People fell 7.9% to 268.68 for June and 9.7% to 1,696.95 for the first half. Time dropped 3.5% to 194.57 pages in June to finish the first half off 7.5% at 1,248.78 ad pages.

TV Guide rebounded in June with 152.64 ad pages, up 6.3%, but ended the first half down 10.4% with 1,440.17 ad pages. Newsweek was up 13.7% in June to 168.29 ad pages, but was still off 8.9% for the first half with 1,071.07. U.S. News & World Report had 146.82 ad pages in June, up 10.2%, and finished the first half down 3.6% at 891.23. □

New cereal brands put snap in market

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

The ready-to-eat cereal industry witnessed another strong year in 1989 with volume up about 3.5% to 2.6 billion pounds. On a dollar basis, sales climbed some 15% to $6.8 billion.

For 1990, volume will increase another 3.5%.

Kellogg Co.'s share erosion, down almost 3 points last year, reflects the decline of established brands.

Corn Flakes, Rice Krispies, Raisin Bran and Froot Loops have continued to erode.

On the other side, Common Sense Oat Bran flakes, introduced late in 1988, has been a real winner for Kellogg.

Heartwise, Kenmei Rice Bran and Bigg Mixx have been introduced recently so it's too early to make a judgment on these brands.

There will be some added erosion of Kellogg's share this year, along with a further stream of new-product introductions.

General Mills gained more than 2 share points for the year, and the company will maintain or increase its share this year. General Mills' basic products have continued to perform well.

Its two newest products, Apple Cinnamon Cheerios and Total Raisin Bran, have added to the company's total share.

Kraft General Foods' share erosion continued, down about 1.5 points for the year, and this has continued into 1990.

As with Kellogg, many Kraft General Foods' Post products don't speak to the new health perceptions of people relating to such foods as oats and bran. Honey Bunches of Oats, one of Post's first new products in many years, is doing well.

The company needs a stream of new products to at least maintain share, but there may be more erosion during the year.

Quaker Oats Co. also is under pressure, with its main product, Cap'n Crunch, eroding slightly, along with Life cereals. Some recently introduced products have offset the declines of these older products.

Without some new-product movement, however, there will be further erosion on the Quaker front.

Ralston Purina Co. gained some share in 1989 and this year, mainly due to its licensed products such as Nintendo Cereal System and Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles.

The company is losing market share on some of its old-line products, such as Chex, Almond Delight and Cookie-Crisp, and is increasingly dependent on licensed products to see growth.

Nabisco Brands continued its share loss in 1989, and the company will lose more share unless it comes up with products that meet the current consumer spectrum.

Teddy Grahams Breakfast Bears has been recently introduced, but it's too early to evaluate this product's performance. □

Mr. Maxwell is an analyst with Wheat, First Securities, Richmond, Va.

Kleenex bathroom tissue is ready to roll

By Laurie Freeman

Kimberly-Clark Corp. this fall will re-enter the premium bathroom tissue segment with the introduction of Kleenex bathroom tissue.

The company got out of the segment in 1984, pulling Kleenex Boutique bathroom tissue because "it didn't have the quality we wanted" to represent the Kleenex brand, said Jean Allen, director of corporate communications.

The company still markets Delsey, an economy brand with about a 1% share of the $2.9 billion bathroom tissue market.

The premium segment makes up 62% of overall market, Nielsen Marketing Research Group reported.

The new tissue will compete against the likes of Procter & Gamble Co.'s Charmin and White Cloud; James River Corp.'s Northern; and Scott Paper Co.'s Cottonelle.

Industry analysts believe Kimberly-Clark is aiming initially for an 11% share in the segment and will spend $4 million to $8 million in marketing support. Kimberly-Clark declined comment on the budget.

"What will be interesting is how James River reacts, because they are the most threatened by Kimberly," said Sherman Chao, paper industry analyst at Salomon Bros. "James River may choose to hit Kimberly in the facial tissue area if Kimberly hurts them in the bathroom tissue area."

He noted much of James River's bathroom tissue business is concentrated in the premium segment, while Scott is strong in the economy segment. P&G is the overall and premium segment leader with shares of 27% and 44%, respectively; James River has a 21% overall share and 26% in the segment; and Scott has a 23% overall and 13% segment share.

The new Kleenex bathroom tissue will be distributed initially in the south and central U.S. Advertising from Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, is expected to start in October. The theme of the print, TV and couponing campaign will focus on the "softness" of the new tissue, Ms. Allen said.

Industry observers earlier this year had expected Kimberly-Clark to market a bathroom tissue made of recycled paper fiber. However, "at present, only virgin fiber provides a premium softness," so the new product doesn't contain recycled paper fiber, Ms. Allen said.

The bathroom tissue, however, uses an inner core of 100% recycled cardboard, water-based inks and a plastic outer wrapper made of recycled manufacturing waste that can be recycled again, she said. □

McCann lands int'l cereals

By Julie Skur Hill

The international joint venture of General Mills and Nestle has served up its cereal account—worth $30 million to $40 million in the first year—to McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

The move is the latest sign that the joint venture, formed last December, intends to take on Kellogg Co.'s dominance in the global cereal business.

Cereal Partners Worldwide, based in Morges, Switzerland, was formed to enable the two parent companies to do just that.

Products of the joint venture, which will carry the Nestle name, will be distributed everywhere except the U.S. and Canada, with an emphasis on Europe.

"We're still in the planning stages on what products and what countries will go first," said Craig Shulstad, director of media and financial relations for General Mills in the U.S.

"Look at where Nestle is now, and they're likely to go there first," said a source close to the situation. "This deal was created to combine Nestle's distribution clout and General Mills' expertise in cereals."

When the joint venture was formed, the plan was for the cereals to be manufactured at Nestle plants. Some of the brands, a General Mills source said at the time, could be marketed in the U.S.

But Europe is the focus now.

"France would be a logical market for them to start," said Bertrand Facon, a food analyst at Credit Suisse First Boston, London. "Nestle has a good market share there. . . . and the partnership is cleaning up an old factory on the border between France and Belgium to use."

Last week, Cereal Partners U.K. announced a deal to purchase Ranks Hovis McDougall's cereal business for $169 million, instantly bringing its U.K. market

Ad industry loses hero in Brennan

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—The resignation of Justice William Brennan from the U.S. Supreme Court may mark the end of a nearly unbroken 14-year string of increasing legal protections for advertising.

Regardless of how his likely successor, Judge David Souter, feels about commercial speech, several legal scholars portrayed the departure of Justice Brennan as a major blow to advertising.

President Bush nominated Judge Souter last week to fill Justice Brennan's seat.

The 84-year-old Eisenhower appointee was considered among the most fervent advocates of granting to commercial speech many of the same constitutional protections enjoyed by political speech.

Lawyer Floyd Abrams, a leading defender of commercial speech, said the impact on advertising of Justice Brennan's resignation is "enormous, almost incalculable.

"No one can serve as a substitute for Brennan," said Mr. Abrams, a partner with the New York law firm of Cahill, Gordon & Reindel. "It is a loss. . . . a major blow regardless of the views of David Souter. Brennan was the leading spokesman on the court for commercial speech, and his influence in that area was far more significant than merely being one vote in nine."

Justice Brennan sided with the majority in what are widely considered to be the two landmark commercial-speech decisions, Virginia State Board of Pharmacy vs. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council in 1976 and Central Hudson Gas vs. Public Service

LAST MINUTE NEWS

FKB in receivership

LONDON—FKB Group last week went into receivership. The troubled marketing services group is now in the hands of two administrative receivers, who said they will sell many of FKB's subsidiaries. FKB owns eight U.S. sales promotion and direct marketing agencies including American Consulting Corp., New York, and QLM Associates, Princeton, N.J. "It came as a surprise to us," said one FKB director. "We were hoping for continued support."

GGK seeks partner

ZURICH—GGK acknowledged it's looking for a partner and is open to a partial sale. A press report here has identified New York-based BBDO Worldwide as a possible suitor of the Swiss agency, but BBDO denied any discussions with GGK. "I know nothing about it," said Chairman-CEO Allen Rosenshine. BBDO parent Omnicom Group, however, is said to be eyeing formation of a third agency network in Europe by acquiring all or part of GGK or another independent European agency group (AA, Jan. 29).

Furor over PGA site sinks golf sponsors

Major advertisers map TV pullout

By John McManus

Shoal Creek is just the beginning.

As advertisers agonized late last week over whether to abandon telecasts of the PGA Championship from Shoal Creek Country Club, they faced a startling reality: When it comes to program content, golf tournaments can explode with as much force as "Married . . . With Children."

The issue blew up when Hall Thompson, founder of the Birmingham, Ala., country club, told The Birmingham News last month that club members could choose with whom they wanted to associate and that the club wouldn't be pressured into admitting blacks.

The remarks by Mr. Thompson, who's since apologized, brought threats of picketing and boycotts of the event by the Rev. Abraham Woods, president of the Birmingham chapter of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

As a result, at least six companies were working to withdraw or reduce their advertising commitments to the ABC and ESPN telecasts: IBM Corp. (ABC); American Honda Motor Co.'s Acura division, Anheuser-Busch and Spalding Sports Worldwide (all ESPN); and Toyota Motor Sales USA and Sharp Electronics Corp. (both ABC and ESPN).

Delta Air Lines and Eastman Kodak Co. planned to drop or curb their on-site presence at Shoal Creek, while United Airlines and USF&G Co. were evaluating whether to stick with the ABC broadcast.

By July 27, ABC Sports Senior VP Steve Solomon reportedly estimated the toll of the pullout at close to $2 million. Before the withdrawal, ABC's ad revenue was projected at $8.4 million and ESPN's take at $850,000. ABC, the network of the PGA Championship for 25 years, has paid $3.5 million for TV rights this year.

On July 26, Birmingham Mayor Richard Arrington announced after meetings with Shoal Creek officials that the club had pledged it would start admitting black members. He asked advertisers to reconsider their positions.

One ad agency executive whose clients had committed to buy time on the Aug. 9-12 telecasts said ABC may yet be able to quell advertiser worries and recover some or all of them in time for the event.

Nearly half of the 39 events on the men's PGA Tour are played at country clubs with no black members.

"Even the ones that are out are really not necessarily out for good," the agency source said. "ABC is talking to us, and because the Shoal Creek situation has been resolved, some of the names will be back in."

But at least one marketer stands by its decision.

"American Honda believed it was a sound business decision to withdraw from the telecasts," said spokesman Bob Butorac. "It goes with our policies as an equal opportunity employer. As for other televised tournaments, we plan to be consistent" in applying the decision.

Although the losses for this tournament may not be huge, the impact of the boycott extends far into the marketing community.

"This raises a whole lot of issues for televised professional golf," said Louis Schultz, exec VP-director of media services at Lintas:USA, New York. "Most tour events are held at private clubs, and private clubs by their nature bar someone. One has to be concerned about ones that have suspect membership practices, but it's so hard to tell.

"The other thing you have to weigh out is the millions of dollars in charities these events raise. It's all open to question now."

National and local marketers spend more than $100 million annually on advertising, sponsorship and licensing tied to nationally televised golf events held at private clubs and other golf courses.

ABC, CBS, NBC and cable operations like ESPN, USA Network, Turner Broadcasting System, SportsChannel America and Prime Network all televise golf events.

The Charlotte (N.C.) Observer has reported nearly half of the 39 events on the men's PGA Tour are played at country clubs with no black members. And many of the host sites of the women's professional golf circuit, the LPGA Tour, don't permit women members.

Golf Digest says 75% of U.S. private clubs have similarly exclusionary membership practices.

"I think exclusionary membership practices are a consideration for all of professional golf and the entire advertising community," said Robert Watson, director-advertising services and public relations for AT&T Co., which didn't participate in the PGA Championship but is a frequent advertiser in PGA Tour events. "When there's a threat of a boycott, advertisers are going to be concerned." □

Eurocom wants U.S. agency

By Laurel Wentz

PARIS—Eurocom's next big step toward achieving its goal of becoming the only French-based major global agency network will be a U.S. acquisition by yearend.

"We have to be in the top 10 in the U.S.," said Pierre de Plas, Eurocom's VP-director general. "We have to double our size; we probably need [to buy] more than one agency."

Mr. de Plas said any agencies bought would be merged with Della Femina, McNamee, New York, to boost that agency's ranking to within the top 10. Della Femina, McNamee now ranks No. 20.

An agency source said a Eurocom buy is imminent.

Mr. de Plas said the French holding company will stick to its plan to develop Eurocom WCRS Della Femina Ball, Della Femina's parent, as its major network.

Eurocom also owns 33% of HDM Worldwide.

Mr. de Plas believes using two separate networks doesn't work. Unlike other agency holding companies with more than one network, however, HDM isn't dependent solely on Eurocom, he said.

EWDB was formed after Eurocom last December bought a majority of the WCRS Advertising Worldwide network and linked it with Della Femina in the U.S. and the Ball Group in Asia.

Eurocom currently owns 60% of EWDB but will increase its stake to 100% over the next several years. Eurocom's partners in HDM are Young & Rubicam, New York, and Tokyo-based Dentsu.

Mr. de Plas said he believes there will be within five to 10 years "one French network, one Japanese and three to five U.S. or U.K. networks, and that's it."

He's intent on making sure Eurocom is the sole French network and said Eurocom is willing to invest to make that happen. The network is nearly complete in Europe, he said, and the main investment now must be in the U.S.

Agency sources said they believe Eurocom will eventually bid for Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide.

Mr. de Plas said only that he hopes to make a deal by yearend and denied Eurocom would buy Backer.

Eurocom is looking for purchases that would together be about the same size as Della Femina, McNamee. Last year, Della Femina, McNamee reported gross income of $87.8 million on billings of $728.7 million.

Mr. de Plas said Eurocom is targeting agencies either in New York or Los Angeles.

He denied that one candidate is San Francisco-based Hal Riney & Partners, an agency that's been considered a likely target.

Simultaneously, EWDB is seeking to expand its below-the-line service businesses worldwide. With its European public relations network complete, Eurocom could eventually go into the U.S. and Far East, Mr. de Plas said.

In sales promotion, he said, Eurocom hasn't made much progress yet. □

'Tracy' nabs recall

Movie's ads arrest viewer attention

By Kate Fitzgerald

All the money being put into movie marketing is starting to pay off.

For the first time in recent memory, a movie—Walt Disney Co.'s "Dick Tracy"—was noted by the adWatch survey for having some of the best recalled ads.

Ads for "Dick Tracy" were the 13th best-recalled advertising in the June adWatch survey, conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization.

The estimated $10 million to $12 million campaign for the movie, playing up the roles of Warren Beatty as "Dick Tracy" and Madonna as "Breathless Mahoney," broke in late May, and the film opened June 15. TV, print and promotions, created in-house by Disney in conjunction with Western International, Los Angeles, supported the introduction.

Helping keep the "Dick Tracy" name top-of-mind, McDonald's Corp. on June 8 began the "Dick Tracy Crimestopper Game" with $40 million in prizes and more than $10 million in network and spot TV ad support. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handled advertising; Simon Marketing, Los Angeles, and Frankel & Co., Chicago, handled the scratch-card game and point-of-purchase material.

GALLUP SURVEY

Meanwhile, Miller Brewing Co. has returned to the adWatch top 10 after a four-month hiatus, scoring sixth overall in the survey for its Miller High Life, Miller Genuine Draft and Miller Lite brands.

Miller's appearance on the list—its first since January—was due to summertime promotions including the humorous "Tour de Lite" TV campaign featuring celebrities as diverse as Woody Harrelson of NBC's "Cheers" and the rap group Run-D.M.C. in a bogus bike race across the U.S. Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, handles.

Also, Miller heavied the TV budget for its "Buy that man a Miller" campaign via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago. The brewer has maintained support of Genuine Draft in various executions from Backer.

Coca-Cola for the second month in a row won the No. 1 spot for best unaided recall, with Pepsi-Cola immediately behind in the No. 2 spot. Pepsi was No. 1 in March and April, and only Pepsi has been among the top three overall advertisers each month in 1990.

Ford held onto its No. 3 position for the fifth straight month, with Chevrolet and McDonald's tied for fourth place.

In an unusual three-way split, adWatch's No. 7 spot in June was crowded by AT&T Co., Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and general grocery store ads.

For AT&T, that position is familiar territory, since it also placed seventh in the last survey, but Budweiser slid three notches to that spot after tying for fourth place in May with Chevrolet.

Procter & Gamble Co.'s Tide detergent and Nike clung to the No. 10 spot in overall recall; the recent survey didn't include the athletic shoe marketer's latest Bo Jackson campaign featuring "Multiple Bos," which broke July 8 via Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore.

In the most recent survey, Chrysler dropped out of the top 10 after a three-month ride, and Toyota also disappeared after two months in the top 10.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Plantation Lite sugar blend tests in East

By Judann Dagnoli

A tiny New York state marketer is hoping to reap sweet rewards from a new light sugar product.

U.S. Sugar Co., a $25 million Buffalo company unrelated to Florida's giant sugar processor of the same name, this month starts testing Plantation Lite all-natural light sugar blend.

Believed by U.S. Sugar to be the first of its kind, Plantation Lite is made of pure sugar and a natural blend of crystallized dextrose and fructose. The blend contains 12 calories per teaspoon, 25% less than pure sugar's 16 calories. U.S. Sugar wouldn't reveal the percentage of sugar in Plantation Lite.

The product is designed as both a tabletop sweetener and a baking ingredient, though the company doesn't recommend it for preparing meringue, brownies and certain hard candies, said Marketing Director William McDaniel Jr.

Plantation Lite is being tested in western New York, Pittsburgh and Erie, Pa., three of the company's strongest markets for its flagship regular sugar product, called U.S., he said. The target audience is health-conscious adults ages 25 to 54.

Mr. McDaniel said Plantation Lite will compete in the $1.5 billion granulated sugar category and against sugar substitutes, estimated to be a $1 billion market.

U.S. Sugar currently has 1% of the highly regionalized pure sugar market, distributing its regular sugar only east of the Mississippi River. Other players include much larger regional marketers such as Amstar Sugar Corp., California & Hawaiian Sugar Co., Savannah Foods & Industries and Imperial Holly Corp.—each with more than $500 million in sales.

But U.S. Sugar has high hopes for Plantation Lite. Mr. McDaniel said the product could become "the first national brand" of sugar blend.

Its closest rival now on the market, he said, is NutraSweet Co.'s Sugar Delight, which has limited distribution. The NutraSweet product is 99% sugar and 1% aspartame. Sugar Delight has 8 calories per serving but isn't heat stable, so it can't be used in baking. Because aspartame is much sweeter than sugar, a serving of Sugar Delight—somewhat less than a teaspoon—has a sweetness equivalent to 1 teaspoon of sugar.

U.S. Sugar won't be able to match the potential spending might of Sugar Delight, handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. Mr. McDaniel said his company can't afford TV advertising yet and instead is opting for a six-week regional radio campaign that ends in mid-August.

The testimonial campaign, created in-house, re-creates comments from consumers in focus groups. Free standing inserts, offering 25¢ off the product, support. □

Sears slipping from No. 1

By Kate Fitzgerald

Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s reign as the nation's largest retailer is about to end.

Sometime during the next few months, and certainly by yearend, Sears will fall behind K mart Corp. into second place and eventually drop to third behind Wal-Mart Stores, retail analysts say.

Retailers will release their July sales figures this week, and Sears is expected to trail K mart as it did in June, for the first time this year. Sears has been the No. 1 U.S. retailer for most of this century.

Depending on how the figures are viewed, K mart could pull ahead of Sears in total sales for the first seven months of 1990.

But one analyst pointed out that the month-to-month sales results for the top three retailers this year don't tell the whole story.

"If you include Sears' credit card business, the question of who's bigger in 1990 is touch-and-go. But as we get to the end of the year, it won't even be close—K mart will be well ahead of Sears," said Edward Weller, an analyst with Montgomery Securities.

K mart's reign as No. 1 may be short-lived, however.

"K mart will be on top when we go into 1991, followed by Sears and then Wal-Mart. But Wal-Mart will be No. 1 by the middle of next year," Mr. Weller predicted.

Rick Nelson, retail analyst for Duff & Phelps, agreed Sears is dropping fast.

"They've been No. 1 for a long time but by next year Sears will have slipped to third place," he said.

Though not conceding the company's fall from the top spot, Sears executives discounted the importance of rankings.

"We want to be the premier retailer out there, but you don't have to be the biggest to do that," Michael Bozic, Sears Merchandise Group chairman, said last week. "It's more important to be the best in each of our individual lines of business."

The slide is likely to cause the retailer to seriously re-evaluate its strategies. Since launching the

NIELSEN UNDER SIEGE

Challenges from clients and rivals imperil stature in media, marketing research

By Wayne Walley and Scott Hume

A.C. Nielsen Co. has its back to the wall, fighting a multifront war to maintain its position as the world's dominant media and marketing research company.

How it responds over the next year to challenges from both competitors and clients is likely to decide whether that dominance will continue.

The most immediate and hottest challenge confronts its Nielsen Media Research unit, which finds itself caught in a nasty crossfire between the Big 3 TV networks on one side and advertisers and ad agencies on the other.

The well-known and widely used TV audience ratings system is under the most serious attack in its history, and the criticisms are coming from Nielsen's primary clients, the networks.

But the Nielsen Marketing Research unit—which accounted for an estimated $800 million in revenues last year, compared with $165 million for the media unit—is under fire as well.

The package-goods sales monitoring service has been forced to play catchup to competitors' innovations and to confront price cutting that's hurting profits. At the

Sen. Kennedy aims at drug marketing

By Patricia Winters and Laurie Freeman

Sen. Edward Kennedy is investigating the marketing practices of the prescription drug industry, the latest sign that Congress suspects marketers are skirting federal rules.

Sen. Kennedy (D., Mass.), chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, sent letters July 12 to the nation's top pharmaceutical companies including Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., Pfizer and Warner-Lambert Co.

E. Kennedy

In the letter, Sen. Kennedy requested information about a variety of promotional practices, ranging from advertising to the use of seminars and non-traditional media such as video news releases.

Sen. Kennedy is well known in the drug industry. His committee sent a letter to drug companies a year ago asking about promotional practices.

In the 1970s he sponsored hearings on the industry's practice of courting doctors with premiums and unsolicited

Clark leaving Brouillard?

NEW YORK—Agi Clark, who last month was named chairman of the newly merged Brouillard/LGFE, will leave the shop in the next several weeks, a high-level source said. Ms. Clark, 48, was chairman-chief creative officer of Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein before that agency was merged by parent WPP Group into Brouillard Communications. Her departure would mean none of Lord Geller's top executives and only a handful of its staffers will remain following a transition period. An agency spokesman said Ms. Clark will go to Brouillard/LGFE and has no other plans.

Chiat's new route for '90s: Austerity

By Cleveland Horton and Gary Levin

High-profile, high-flying Chiat/Day/Mojo has clipped its own wings to prepare for a long journey through stormy weather.

Capping a decade of stellar growth, the agency last week put in place a severe austerity program that included layoffs of nearly 50 people, wage cuts and freezes, and scaled-back overhead.

The program extends beyond the general advertising agency to affect subsidiaries in public relations, design, direct marketing and business-to-business advertising.

The cutbacks stemmed primarily from the agency's hemorrhaging New York operation. Following the decision of Royal Caribbean Cruises to place its $30 million account up for review (AA, July 30), Chiat announced staff reductions in New York and the agency's Venice, Calif., headquarters.

Bob Wolf, chairman of North American operations, said 28 to 30 people were laid off at the New York operation. Sources indicated the figure may rise to 50.

Speculation also centered on the fate of two top people in New York—Jane Newman, president-ceo; and Michael Smith, senior VP-creative director—and on whether Mr. Wolf would return to New York to shore up the office.

"I don't plan to move to New York," Mr. Wolf said. "I don't want to comment on any management moves or speculation. Nothing's decided. . . . Obviously, we have to sit down and talk to Jane about the issues. No one's casting blame."

"To set some rumors straight, none of this has anything to do with the acquisition in Australia."

Asked whether he expected Ms. Newman to leave, Mr. Wolf said, "I don't expect her to leave."

About a dozen major accounts have either left the agency or substantially cut ad spending over the past 18 months. New York billings have dropped to less than $125 million from $200 million a year ago.

In a memo addressed to "Everyone in the Chiat/Day/Mojo family," agency Chairman Jay Chiat outlined the agency's problems and steps being taken to deal with "an extremely difficult year for our industry."

As part of the plan, agency directors, senior management and major shareholders took "significant" pay cuts. Further, staffers earning salaries of $100,000 or more face a wage freeze, while all other raises will be limited to 5%.

Overhead expenses have been "drastically cut," the memo said.

"Naturally, we hope these measures will be very temporary," Mr. Chiat said in his memo. However, other agency executives said privately they expect the company to remain in an austerity posture for several years.

At the company's headquarters, staff cuts were limited to about seven people. Peter deVaux, exec VP-chief financial officer, resigned last week, and Simon Bax, former VP-financial operations, will succeed him.

In an earlier staff cut, the corporate finance department reduced its staff by 15 in July.

Chiat design subsidiary Keith Bright & Associates let go about 12 employes in the Venice and New York offices, dropping the total staff to 49, primarily because corporate identity spending is off.

Observers suggest Chiat is feeling the financial pressures of debts taken on with a leveraged recapitalization and the later $56.5 million acquisition of Australia's Mojo MDA. The recapitalization, funded primarily with junk bonds, allowed agency prin-

Disney, Kellogg team

By Marcy Magiera

Walt Disney Co.'s Buena Vista Television will launch in mid-August a giant cross-promotion with Kellogg Co. for the Disney Afternoon.

The promotion, running through October, will link the Disney Afternoon syndicated TV shows "DuckTales," "Chip 'N Dale's Rescue Rangers," "Disney's Adventures of the Gummi Bears" and "Tale Spin" with six Kellogg cereal brands.

The promotion is one of the largest ever in the cereal industry, said Celeste Clark, Kellogg VP-nutrition marketing and communications, but she wouldn't give a budget figure.

Buena Vista is taking a brand management approach to marketing its syndicated shows. The Disney Afternoon's entire marketing campaign, valued at $100 million, includes Buena Vista's own advertising and promotions; the Kellogg cross-promotion; a promotion with McDonald's Corp. in November or December; and an effort with another, undisclosed partner in first quarter 1991.

That package represents the largest consumer marketing effort ever for a syndicated program.

Spreading out the promotion during the fall and winter "goes back to the brand management system," said Rick Haskins, VP-marketing for Buena Vista. "We're thinking, how do we carry momentum throughout the year."

The Disney Afternoon will start Sept. 10 on more than 150 stations nationally. Each show in the syndicated, five-day-a-week programming block is 30 minutes long.

The Kellogg promotion pairs "DuckTales" with Rice Krispies; "Gummi Bears" with Froot Loops; "Tale Spin" with Frosted Flakes; and "Chip 'N Dale" with Honey Smacks, Corn Pops and Apple Jacks.

Disney Adventures*, the company's first major consumer magazine, will be launched at checkout stands in October.

One of four rubber stamps featuring characters from each show will be in each cereal box. Smaller boxes will also have cutout character masks on the back, while the inside of larger boxes will be printed with games and puzzles.

Kellogg will add 10-second tags supporting the promotion to TV spots that run during network and syndicated children's programming, including the Disney Afternoon.

Kellogg's promotion agency is Denscham & Smith, Los Angeles. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is producing the TV spots. Buena Vista handles creative and promotions in-house; media buying is done by Western International Media, Los Angeles.

In-store displays will offer Disney Afternoon character school folders with the purchase of Kellogg's cereals. In select stores, Kellogg will give "DuckTales" tote bags to consumers who buy Corn Flakes or Rice Krispies.

Corn Flakes boxes will have a proof-of-purchase mail-in offer for Disney Adventures, the entertainment giant's first major consumer magazine.

The digest-size magazine will be launched nationally at 1C0,000 checkouts at supermarkets, convenience stores and drugstores in October, said Carole Black, Buena Vista senior VP-marketing.

The 128-page monthly is filled with comics featuring characters from Disney Afternoon shows, games and puzzles.

Disney hopes Disney Adventures, priced at $1.95, will eventually carry ads from other marketers. The initial issue has ads only for Disney products, including the film "DuckTales: The Movie" and "The Little Mermaid" videocassette. □

Quaker stays course amid woes

By Julie Liesse

CHICAGO—When Quaker Oats Co. announces final results for its fiscal year Aug. 7, the news that sales, earnings and unit volumes dropped will close the book on a disastrous year.

Despite the declines, however, Quaker apparently is sticking with the strategy it launched during fiscal 1990.

At that time, the company decided to focus marketing dollars on "high-growth, high-margin" businesses such as cereals, Gatorade and certain pet foods, and cut trade promotion and ad spending where possible.

New-product plans are being re-evaluated in fiscal 1991 and some ad budgets are targeted for cuts, sources close to the company said. Even such key franchises as Gatorade may be affected in the cuts, those sources said.

The 1990 marketing strategy produced lackluster results for the fiscal year, ended June 30. The financial results disclosed tomorrow will include an overall 6% drop in unit volumes in the key U.S. & Canadian Grocery Products unit, analysts said.

Companywide sales will be down from the $4.9 billion posted in fiscal 1989, even though international sales have increased.

Through the first nine months of fiscal 1990, unit volumes were down 24% for Quaker's pet foods; 13% for Golden Grain and its Rice-A-Roni products; 9% for Aunt Jemima frozen foods; 5% for ready-to-eat cereals; 3% for hot cereals; and 2% for Gatorade.

"Quaker's in sort of a pickle. . . . Overall, their record of the past 10 years looks good, but much of it is window dressing."

In the U.S., only granola bars (up 22%) and foodservice (up 6%) reported significant gains.

Insiders and analysts alike characterized Quaker's year as a nightmarish combination of bad judgment and poor luck.

The company was late in introducing a ready-to-eat oat bran cereal, for instance, and Quaker Oat Bran arrived just in time for the devastating collapse of that segment. With everything but Cap'n Crunch posting disappointing sales, the company's share of the $6.9 billion ready-to-eat cereal market fell to 8% from 8.7% for the year ending in May, industry sources report.

Quaker counted on Gatorade, its largest

Dave Thomas calls himself "an old-fashioned kind of guy."

Thomas shines as Wendy's Col. Sanders

ONE

R. David Thomas, 58, has been in the restaurant business since he was 15. After working at one of the early Kentucky Fried Chicken franchises in Fort Wayne, Ind., he opened the first Wendy's Old Fashioned Hamburgers restaurant in 1969 in Columbus, Ohio. Today, Wendy's International is the nation's fourth largest hamburger chain with 3,729 restaurants and sales last year of nearly $3.1 billion.

Advertising Age Chicago Bureau Chief Scott Hume spoke with Mr. Thomas last week about his company and the industry, and his starring role in Wendy's advertising.

Advertising Age: You've become quite a celebrity through the ads. Are you enjoying that?

Mr. Thomas: Not all the time. I can't go anywhere without people coming up to me, and I don't always like that.

I was in Fort Lauderdale and this guy says, "I know you." I said, "From the post office?" and he said, "No. You're the Wendy's man!" That happens all the time. . . . But it's also fun to go into restaurants and talk to the kids.

AA: You've taken some ribbing about your pronunciations. Does that bother you?

Mr. Thomas: Oh, no. When we were doing the commercial for the Jetsons glasses, I kept saying, "The Jetsons: The Movie." We must have done six or seven takes. Finally, this kid says to me, "There's no 'the' there. It's 'Jetsons: The Movie.' "

AA: Everyone's a critic, eh?

Mr. Thomas: Sure. But . . .

Outdoor feels drought

Spending drops 15% amid cost-cutting, protests

By Alison Fahey

The outdoor advertising industry is showing signs of severe battle fatigue.

First-quarter ad spending in the medium dropped a hefty 15% in the wake of controversial inner-city whitewashing campaigns, legislative threats and budget-conscious advertisers.

The drop compared with an 8% increase in overall outdoor ad spending in the first quarter of 1989, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

"The whole industry had a weak first quarter," said Jay Zitz, senior VP-marketing at Gannett Outdoor. "The primary reason was the economic situation that began fourth quarter 1989. [Marketers] said, 'We've got problems hitting our numbers, so we have to cut back somewhere.' "

Mr. Zitz said another reason for the drop is that "in first quarter 1989 we had an influx of [unexpected] dollars, especially from tobacco marketers."

But other executives acknowledged that special-interest groups protesting tobacco and alcohol outdoor boards, especially those targeted to minorities, took its toll on the industry.

"I think some advertisers, especially tobacco and liquor [marketers], are running scared because of all the negative PR we're getting," said one outdoor executive who asked not to be identified. "No one wants to be in the limelight because they are the target of community protests or boycotts."

"These are issues the industry is going to have to deal with from this point forward," said Jim Eatrides, president of Boiseclair Advertising. "They are not going to go away."

Tobacco companies, outdoor's biggest category, spent about $41 million in first quarter 1990 compared with $55 million for the same period a year ago, representing a 26% decline.

Besides a major decline in tobacco spending, eight of the top

'Forbes' vs. 'Fortune'

Business books fight about rate-card deals

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—The long-simmering battle between the nation's top three business magazines came to a boil last week, the result of a letter Fortune mailed to advertisers charging its competitors with cutting off-rate-card deals.

Although the Time Warner title later retracted a claim against McGraw-Hill's Business Week, it let stand allegations against Forbes. Forbes responded with an ad in the Aug. 2 edition of The New York Times headlined "Why is Fortune fibbing?"

Now, Fortune says it's considering its own advertising response.

The letter that sparked the controversy began, "It doesn't take more than a glance to realize that selling off the rate card is growing in popularity." The July 16 letter, a copy of which was obtained by Advertising Age, went on to say, "Now it has spread to the imported car industry."

"Media don't need that kind of stuff in this kind of year. That kind of bickering makes everybody look bad."

The letter, signed by Consumer Advertising Manager Bruce Argus McNaughton, also said, "Forbes went off the rate card in an offer to a West Coast importer, providing them with a deeper discount than they offer on the card for space purchased."

Forbes also was accused of cutting similar deals with a "Japanese office equipment manufacturer" and a "watch manufacturer."

Business Week was accused of offering "a European manufacturer a package of metro areas free if they bought a national campaign."

"What our 'friends' at Forbes and Business Week are doing is wrong," the letter continued. "We treat all [advertisers] equally and give no unfair advantages."

The letter was sent to an unspecified number of unidentified business magazine advertisers and prospective advertisers. But, within days after the letter was sent, Fortune executives phoned recipients to retract the statement about Business Week.

"We apologized to Business Week for that error, and we regret

First half roars, but second half rumbles

By Christy Fisher

The continued softness in general-market advertising has many Hispanic market practitioners waiting for an adverse rub-off effect.

However, the first seven months of the year have been kind to most Spanish-language media. Hispanic network TV continues to report healthy gains, while print is moving ahead, primarily as a result of a string of new launches. The only real dim spot is network radio (see story below).

Univision Network reports ad revenues are up 26% over the same period the previous year; Telemundo Group says it's realized a 41% gain.

Both TV networks attribute the gains to existing advertisers' spending jumps, new advertisers and rate increases.

"We feel great about our numbers—especially compared to what is happening in the general market," said Gary McBride, Telemundo's senior VP-sales.

National Association of Hispanic Publications, which has 50 newspaper and magazine members, reports that print advertising year-to-date is up about 10%.

Existing advertisers continue to market to Hispanics, but budgets have been relatively flat, said John Catalani of Hispanic Media Associates, NAHP's rep company.

"The Hispanic market is still a reflection of the general market," he said. "If the general market is soft, the Hispanic market will be somewhat soft."

Spanish-language TV, considered a primary buy, could be benefiting at other media's expense, observers say.

Hispanic agencies, meanwhile, are reporting mixed results.

Agencies reporting significant double-digit increases in new and existing business include: Berry-Brown Advertising, Casanova, Pendrill Publicidad, Publicidad Siboney, La Agencia de Orci, Noble & Asociados/USA, and regional agencies Lopez Negrete Communications, Marketing Mercadeo International and Sanchez & Levitan.

"We've heard Hispanic agencies have had budget reductions, but it's been a very good year for us—not just with new account gains, but we've had significant increases from virtually all our clients," said Laura Marella, media director at Casanova, Pendrill. "We may be an exception to the rule."

In most cases, Berry-Brown clients have increased their budgets, said Chairman Bob Berry. "We have had some reduce or eliminate their budget . . . but others have increased considerably."

Young & Rubicam's Bravo Group, Conill Advertising, IAC Advertising and Sosa & Associates expect smaller gains of around 10%.

"Things are pretty stable," said Ernest Bromley, president of Sosa & Associates, which is showing gains of about 8% for the year and no cutbacks by clients. "We've grown a bit, but not as much as last year. There does not seem to be much new-business activity with big clients [as last year]."

Executives at Martinez/Siboney and Montemayor y Asociados said spending is off because national money is being shifted to regional advertising and promotions and advertising is being focused on fewer products.

Robles Communications has seen several clients cut back, said Neil Campbell-Fereira, account management director. "We're not meeting anticipated growth projections. Most of our growth will come from new business as opposed to current business."

Billings are meeting expected levels at Ferrer/Ad America because of new clients, said President Carl Kravetz. "Existing clients are spending more, but not spending as much as they said they would spend."

Conill Advertising reports a handful of budget cuts "related to general-market issues," said CEO Carlos Rossi.

"The market still shows steady growth, but not the growth of the past," he said. "Instead of 20% and 30% increases, I think we'll see growth of 10% to 15%." □

PERSPECTIVAS ACCOUNTS

Charged up: Eveready Battery Co. assigned its Hispanic account to Casanova, Pendrill Publicidad. The now-defunct Bermudez & Associates had handled.

Fuzzy reception: Home Box Office and Publicidad Siboney have parted ways after a two-year relationship. HBO said it no longer requires a full-service Hispanic shop and will hire agencies on a project basis.

Santa Maria: Saint Mary's University of Texas, San Antonio, hired Marketing Mercadeo International for English- and Spanish-language advertising in Texas and Mexico. Pitluck Group had handled.

Taking a shine to ads: Upjohn Co. broke Spanish-language TV, radio and print in Los Angeles, Miami and New York for its Rogaine baldness treatment. Conill Advertising handles.

New campaigns: Pacific Bell is airing two 30-second TV spots from Casanova, Pendrill Publicidad to promote residential calling. In one spot a teen-age Hispanic girl de-emphasizes her background to be accepted by her peers. Later, after having her first child, she realizes the importance of maintaining her cultural ties. . . . Colgate-Palmolive Co. via Publicidad Siboney has introduced a new sweepstakes campaign that uses Univision's "Sabado Gigante" as a cornerstone. The sweepstakes promotes Colgate toothbrushes, toothpaste and mouthwash, and offers a college scholarship, Toyota Corolla, Caribbean cruise or $5,000 in toys and clothes as a grand prize. The effort marks Colgate's first involvement with "Sabado Gigante." . . . AppleTree Markets is airing a Spanish-language TV and radio campaign handled by Rives Smith Baldwin Carlberg. . . . Home Club broke Spanish-language TV and radio ads from Ferrer/Ad America. . . . Pepsi-Cola South broke an English- and Spanish-language TV, radio and POP campaign to help raise funds for SER-Jobs For Progress literacy labs. Former San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros is the spokesman; Ornelas & Associates handles. . . . Pepsi-Cola Co. signed Michael Carbajal, 1988 Olympic silver medal-winning boxer and current light flyweight world champion, as a spokesperson for Diet Pepsi. Radio and print ads featuring him will break in Phoenix and Tucson markets, and may roll nationally. La Agencia de Orci handles Pepsi's West Coast Hispanic account.

National radio tuned out

By Christy Fisher

Concerned by flat national sales and the loss of market share to other media, the Spanish-language radio industry is banding together to get advertisers to tune in.

The heads of the four largest rep companies—Caballero Spanish Media, Katz Hispanic Radio, Lotus Hispanic Reps and SBS Network—met in late June to discuss the slump.

Although they won't provide specifics, Cabellero, Katz and Lotus all report flat sales this year; SBS says its gains have not been as large as expected.

"It's been a very tough year, said Rick Kraushaar, president of Lotus Hispanic Reps. "Radio is not being used anymore."

"We're not seeing many new accounts come to the market," said Eduardo Caballero, president of Caballero Spanish Media. "But, we have seen quite a few leave."

Spanish-language national radio spending has risen fairly steadily over the last five years to about $51.4 million in 1989 from $34.8 million in 1984, according to Hispanic Business.

However, the medium's share of total media spending has eroded to 8.8% in 1989 from 13.2% in 1984.

Some attribute national radio's decline to greater interest in its local counterpart.

Local Spanish-language radio grabs the greatest share of media expenditures—$149.3 million last year, up 14% from the previous year, according to Hispanic Business.

Radio reps said they need to improve radio's reception at Hispanic agencies if it is to pick up greater shares of ad dollars.

"A lot of [the slump in national radio spending] can be blamed on agencies' TV mentality," said Mr. Caballero. "TV commercial creative and production eats up such a large part of the budget, there's hardly anything left to air the spot or go into other media.

"This may seem hard to believe, but it's easier for us to sell Spanish radio to Anglo agencies than to Spanish agencies," he added.

Noble & Asociados/USA has cut radio spending, said Eva May, management supervisor. But this is not due to dissatisfaction with radio, but the attraction of other media.

"For clients such as P&G we always look at TV first," she said. The agency also has been putting more money into other avenues such as coupons, direct mail and promotions, she said.

Agency and media buyers also

Pepsi tops recall

By Christy Fisher

In the first survey of Hispanic advertising awareness, Pepsi-Cola beat Coca-Cola.

According to a recent survey by Market Development, Pepsi topped its arch-rival in unaided advertising awareness among Hispanic consumers in the top six Hispanic markets.

Consumers were asked, "Of all the companies or brands you have seen or heard advertised in the last 30 days, which company or brand first comes to mind?" and "Which next comes to mind?"

Pepsi's "Para la sed de la nueva generacion" ("For the thirst of a new generation") campaign, created by Publicidad Siboney and starring entertainers Chayanne and Luis Enrique, was top of mind among most of the 754 Hispanic consumers surveyed by telephone in Houston, Los Angeles, Miami, New York, San Francisco and San Antonio.

Coca-Cola's "El sabor de tu vida" ("The taste of your life") campaign, via Sosa & Associates, ranked No. 2, followed by a spot from Mendoza, Dillon & Asociados for Ford Motor Co.'s Escort.

Other brands that make the top 10 most recalled list and their agencies are: Sears, Roebuck & Co. (Mendoza, Dillon); General Motors Corp. Chevrolet Motor Division (Lintas:Latina, Miami); Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser (Sosa & Associates); Procter & Gamble Co.'s Tide (Conill Advertising, New York); Goya Foods (in-house); P&G's Pampers (Noble & Asociados/USA, Irvine, Calif.); and General Electric Co. (local retail advertising). □

SHOP TALK

Agencies hook up: W.B. Doner & Co., which shuttered its Hispanic division in May, has signed Sanchez & Levitan, Miami, Fla., to provide Hispanic market services for Doner's general-market clients. Sanchez & Levitan already is servicing Doner client Jack Eckerd Corp.

Alan Kalter, Doner's exec VP-retail, said the agency eventually may purchase a stake in the Florida shop. "We'll work together a while and see," he said.

Bermudez progeny: The shuttering of Bermudez & Associates, New York and Los Angeles, is bringing about the birth of several smaller shops.

Former Chairman Eduardo Bermudez is consulting for Publispana, Los Angeles, which opened its doors last month. William Peniche, former president of J. Walter Thompson/Mexico, heads the office. Debra Gish, former Bermudez VP-management supervisor, has formed Core Group, Los Angeles. Fernando Tamayo, former Bermudez exec VP-creative services director, has opened a creative boutique in Tarzana, Calif., working with former Bermudez client Disneyland and Kentucky Fried Chicken of Southern California through HDM, Los Angeles.

Coastal shift: Third Coast Marketing, Houston, teamed up with Black Gillock & Langberg, Houston. The Hispanic shop changed its name to Lopez Negrete Communications, and will continue to operate as a minority-controlled agency.

said radio suffers from a higher cost per thousand than Hispanic TV, a criticism the radio reps dismiss.

"The rate question is just a good excuse," said Mr. Caballero. "They compare [Strategy Research Corp.'s] TV numbers with Arbitron's radio numbers and say CPMs for TV are better.

"The fact is, they're not comparing apples and manzanas, but apples and naranjas." Mr. Caballero said a more accurate CPM comparison would be obtained by comparing Arbitron's TV and radio ratings.

Julio Omana, managing director of SBS Network, pointed out that if production costs were included in CPM estimates, TV would not appear as cost-effective.

The rep firms admit the radio industry could do a better job of selling the medium, adding that the keys are improving radio ratings research and the use of effectiveness studies.

"The challenge is to substantiate our portion of the media dollars," said Gene Bryan, VP-national sales manager of Katz Hispanic Radio.

Hispanic agencies have long said the reliability of ratings provided by Arbitron Co. and Birch/Scarborough Research are a serious impediment.

"If our decision were based on numbers only, Spanish radio would probably never be a part of our media plan," said Monica Fragale Gadsby, Hispanic media director, Leo Burnett Co. "[As other Hispanic media measurement improves] it will become increasingly difficult for agencies and advertisers to continue to justify buying radio on a purely qualitative call."

Arbitron defended its service, while Birch said further improvements were in the works, including improving weighting variables and qualitative research.

Mac Tichenor, president of Tichenor Media Systems, is talking with research companies about establishing an independent Spanish-language radio ratings service for the top 10 Hispanic markets.

This service, which could get under way as early as the fall, would track audience ratings, media usage and demographic profiles.

"Something has to be done," he said. "Everyone is clamoring for Advertisers holding back ad dollars await network 'fire sales'

By John McManus

Madison Avenue's top sports media buyers have begun a relished vigil.

"We're looking forward to some real interesting Friday afternoons in the fall," says Larry Novenstern, VP-manager of national sports franchises at BBDO, New York.

Mr. Novenstern is referring to an anticipated return of the Friday afternoon fire sales of network weekend time common during the mid-1980s, when advertisers and their agencies last clearly held the upper hand in the net TV sports poker game.

Excluding the automotive industry, many traditional sports advertisers have chosen to forgo the sports upfront season and keep their money for "opportunistic" buys in the scatter marketplace.

Indeed, the operative word for advertisers is opportunity. As an executive from one of the most ubiquitous advertisers on TV sports advises media sellers, "Any dollar on the table that looks reasonably good, take it, because it sure isn't going to be there tomorrow."

The three major networks last year pocketed $1.8 billion in sports ad revenue. But whether advertisers will help the networks surpass that amount this year remains to be seen.

Indicative of the sagging fourth-quarter TV sports marketplace:

- ABC lowered its asking price 7.7% for 30-second spots on "Monday Night Football" to $240,000 and reduced the number of beer spots in each game from 10 to eight to secure commitments from Anheuser-Busch and Miller Brewing Co.
- Turner Network Television, selling its new National Football League commercial time, has slashed initial 30-second prices from $80,000 to about $50,000.
- CBS has come way down from its asking prices for Major League Baseball playoff and World Series games. League Championship Series prime-time 30-second spots can be had for as low as $115,000, down from $135,000 per unit on NBC last year. CBS is asking $300,000 per World Series unit, down from ABC's 1989 price of $310,000.

"The softness in the sports marketplace is hurting all of the networks, and let me tell you this, it's going to continue," says an executive with one of sports television's top five advertisers. "But we didn't tell the networks to go out there and make those kinds of rights deals."

In the last 30 months, major national and international sports leagues and organizations have extracted more than $8.2 billion from the TV industry for the privilege of carrying sports events.

The networks have attempted to cover the rights fees by passing on costs to advertisers, who have become increasingly hesi-

REVIEWING STAND

Writers speak up for guys in booth

The prototype sports broadcaster has two principal traits: He's a good-natured but rambling chatterbox, and he's not spontaneous enough to utter anything besides cliches—"He did what he had to do"—or I-remember-when stories.

We asked sportswriters to name the play-by-play men and analysts who transcend this image.

Steve Woodward, USA Today: Mr. Woodward chooses ABC's Al Michaels as his favorite announcer.

A. Michaels

"There's some security that viewers get from a sameness in a voice. He doesn't turn on a switch that makes him a football announcer at a football game and another switch that makes him sound like something else at a baseball game or a track meet."

As top analyst, Mr. Woodward selects another ABC property, Dan Dierdorf of the "Monday Night Football" crew.

Mr. Dierdorf "doesn't ever overlook the fact that 'MNF' is entertainment, and that he to some extent is an entertainer," Mr. Woodward says.

Larry Stewart, Los Angeles Times: Mr. Stewart fingers Vin Scully, the longtime Los Angeles Dodgers play-by-play man, as his favorite announcer.

J. Madden

"Over the years he's really remained at the top," Mr. Stewart says.

His favorite analyst is CBS football commentator John Madden.

"He's in a class by himself. Besides being entertaining, he really tells me things I don't know."

Steve Nidetz, Chicago Tribune: After reeling off a litany of favorite past and present announcers, Mr. Nidetz settles on Jack Quinlan, who called Chicago Cubs games in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

"Even with real bad teams on the

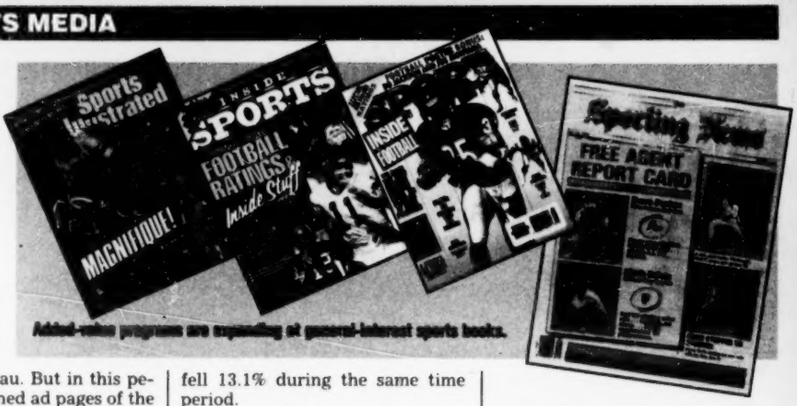
New tricks to escape batting slump

Magazines go after new categories



Added-value programs are expanding at general-interest sports books.

By Scott Donaton

Hammered by deep cuts in automotive and tobacco spending, sports magazines are scrambling to attract new categories. Accomplishing this goal is increasingly crucial as competition becomes more fierce and advertisers tighten their belts.

"In five years, I'd be surprised as heck if there are still two monthlies," says an executive at one sports publication.

Total consumer magazine ad linage fell 3.3% in the first half of 1990, according to Publishers Information Bureau. But in this period, the combined ad pages of the nation's largest general-interest sports titles—Inside Sports, Sport, Sports Illustrated and The Sporting News—dipped 14.5%.

Category leader SI saw its ad pages drop 16.5% through June. Ad pages at Times Mirror's TSN fell 13.1% during the same time period.

Thomas Hickey, SI's ad sales director, calls 1990 "a very tough year."

In a weak ad market, magazines not considered to be core buys are often the first to fold.

"There are too many sports books, and in a soft market you want to concentrate on the leaders," says Jay Schoenfeld, exec VP-media director, Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

Media watchers suggest Sport and Inside Sports increasingly will be slugging it out as the market tightens because the two monthlies are the most similar and don't offer the frequency and cachet of SI or the statistical, hard-core-fan approach of TSN.

The heads of the two magazines say they can coexist, but offer a similar definition of their publications' editorial intent.

"We do in-depth analysis," says Jerry Croft, senior VP-marketing for Century Publishing's Inside Sports. "We have access to people who really know about sports."

"Our position is to let fans know a little more from inside and behind the scenes," says Terry Shiver, president of Petersen Publishing's Sport.

Sport maintains a circulation edge with an 850,000 rate base compared with Inside Sports' 625,000, according to Century. But in ad pages, Inside Sports has passed Sport, Century says.

Of the four leading books, Inside Sports is the only one to gain ad pages this year. Its ad pages totaled 235.2 through June, a 4.8% gain, according to Mr. Croft. In this period, rival Sport's ad pages fell 21.7% to 183.2, according to PIB.

Fueling the shakeout speculation is the drop in tobacco advertising, which has sunk a whopping 34.9% to $15.8 million through June among these books, according to PIB and Inside Sports. The falloff was largely the result of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s decision late last year to cut 1990 magazine spending 25%, a drop of more than $26 million.

Automotive spending also fell 27.5% to $42.1 million through June in these books, PIB and Inside Sports report.

Publishers say they're cautiously optimistic auto spending will rebound in the fourth quarter on the strength of new-car launches and a number of corporate image campaigns expected from Detroit.

But tobacco spending, which in SI, Sport and TSN increased 7.7% from $39.6 million in 1988 to $42.7 million last year, according to PIB, may never return to its former levels.

"Tobacco's gone forever," says Martin Walker, president of Periodical Studies Service, a New York-based magazine consultancy.

"We certainly haven't given up on tobacco or automotive, but we're working very hard on every men's category there is," says Mr. Shiver.

Although magazines have courted new product groups, buyers wonder how these titles can help their clients.

Bob Zach, senior VP-media director, Chiat/Day/Mojo, New Power hitters

Always interested in the home team, fans help push regional sports nets into the picture

By John McManus

George Steinbrenner did at least one thing right.

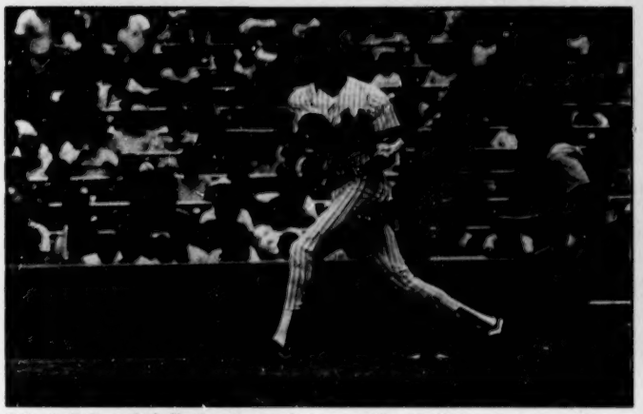
Although he's being relieved of control of the New York Yankees, who have been patsies on the field this year, a rights deal with a regional sports cable network is making the 1990 Yankees a powerhouse at the bank.

Regional sports networks such as Madison Square Garden Network, now in the second year of a 12-year, $500 million pact to televise Bronx Bomber games, are the most recent money machine in the megabucks world of TV sports.

The number of regional sports networks has jumped from about 10 to 33 in five years, and these outfits will collect up to $408 million in subscriber and advertiser revenues this year.

Currently, regional sports networks, which focus their coverage on local team events for subscribing homes in their areas, reach about 30 million homes, with at least one channel in virtually every part of the U.S.

"With the amazing proliferation of viewing options out there, especially the number of nationally telecast baseball games, fans will always be interested in their home team," says Douglas Moss, VP-advertising for MSG Network. "That's why you've seen so many of these operations springing up recently."



Roberto Kelly and his Yankee teammates may not be dazzling opponents on the field, but the team is doing quite well financially.

Not only are the subscriber rolls growing, but so is advertiser interest. According to John Mansell, senior analyst at cable consultant Paul Kagan Associates, advertisers this year will spend about $102.1 million for commercial time on regional sports nets, up 37.4% over last year's $74.3 million and 96.7% over 1988's $51.9 million.

Although Mr. Mansell estimates that advertising represents only between 25% and 35% of total regional sports network revenues, it represents a growing portion of those networks' revenues.

"From an advertising point of view, we've only begun to scratch the surface," says John Severino, president-ceo of Los Angeles-based Prime Ticket Network, the largest regional sports network with 4.1 million subscribers. The percentage of advertising's contribution to Prime Ticket's total revenues rose from 15% to 50% from October 1988 to October 1989, he says.

But the cable networks have had to address several concerns in their quest for programming that will result in more ad dollars.

They risk falling into the trap that plagues the broadcast networks—engaging in bidding wars and winning contracts at prices that revenues might not offset.

MSG Network had to outbid rival SportsChannel New York for the bitterly contested Yankee rights. Despite the cost, an MSG Network spokesman says the station expects Yankee broadcasts to be profitable.

Most regional sports nets are either affiliated or owned-and-operated by one of two national companies, Prime Network or SportsChannel America, which in some areas compete against each other for broadcast rights.

SportsChannel America represents both the national repository for programming for its affiliated channels and the basic, stand-alone programming service for areas without a regional SportsChannel affiliate. The latter entity has not drawn subscribers as expected. But the individual channels have viewerships that are growing, though at different rates.

"Initially, we expected competition in certain markets, but not quite the competition that emerged," says John Mohr, president of the SportsChannel Regional Network. "It's taken a lot of discipline and restraint not to overbid on events."

Still, Mr. Mohr feels that, to Like numerous publications, sports titles also are instituting value-added programs to keep existing business and attract new advertisers.

Earlier this year, SI signed a wide-ranging deal with PepsiCo's Diet Pepsi that included an ad schedule in the magazine, video sponsorship and promotion.

The deal was SI's largest ever and represented a new strategy for Diet Pepsi, which had previously shied away from magazine advertising.

paraphrase the sports cliche, both networks have come to play.

"I don't think you'll see a shakeout. Both teams seem pretty committed to staying in the business," he says.

"I don't see us trying to overtake any of the SportsChannel networks," comments Ed Frazier, president-ceo of Prime Network.

But competition is not just limited to broadcast-rights skirmishes. It also involves a battle for audiences and advertising dollars among broadcast networks, syndication and national cable networks. Perhaps the toughest battle will be between regional sports nets and local broadcast stations, because of their programming's local coverage and comparable spot pricing.

Some industry experts have begun to question whether the sports marketplace can support so many viewing venues. However, media buyers welcome the increased competition among the properties.

"With the interest level assured because of the home team attraction, we see regionals as a great opportunity for leveraging spot dollars vs. broadcast stations that don't have the same compelling original programming," says Howard Nass, senior VP-corporate director of spot broadcasting at Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, New York.

Working against the networks, however, is client and agency reluctance to shift dollars into a medium without solid ratings numbers.

Group W Sports Marketing, which handles national ad sales for 10 regional networks, is working with Nielsen Media Research to try to obtain "unwired network" ratings for a package of weekly football games slated for this fall.

"We're big fans of the concept," says Ron Von Urff, VP-associate media director at J. Walter Thompson USA. "Once they come in with ratings similar to an unwired, we'll be able to make them a part of our national television mix." □ mance, says TSN President-CEO Thomas Osenton, is "understanding why, for example, Coke aligned itself with the NFL. Then we can help them maximize that buy in a traditional way and a non-traditional way, by helping the company develop promotional opportunities to support the buy."

Inside Sports is negotiating a package with Kraft Foods USA but declined to reveal details.

Indicating the maturity of the core marketplace, some of SI's biggest action has come outside its pages.

Backed by Time Warner's deep pockets, SI launched SI Business last year, a six-times-yearly supplement mailed to 500,000 subscribers. Other line extensions, such as Sports Illustrated for Kids, books and videocassettes and a credit card, pulled in revenues of $25 million last year.

Mr. Walker urges the publications not to abandon their mission yet, saying there may be room for everyone in the category.

He blames the sports books' current woes on their inability to market themselves to advertisers.

"I think [sports books] have undermarketed themselves, and they have to convince marketers that they represent an important, relatively affluent market," he says. "There's a lot more money there than people think." □

10 million ways to tap beer drinkers

Execs asked to solve TV sports glut

By Steven W. Colford

Call it the $10 million solution.

If big-name sporting events are losing their luster as an advertiser's shortest distance to males ages 18 to 49, then what media alternatives add efficiency?

That was the question posed to media buyers and agency executives who were asked to spend $10 million for a fictional beer client in whatever manner deemed best to hit that target market.

Mark Goldstein, president of Earle Palmer Brown Cos., Bethesda, Md., wasted no time deciding how he'd use his $10 million.

"One thing that comes to mind right away is that I'd try to buy every stadium and arena scoreboard contract in the U.S.," he says.

"That would go through the $10 million pretty quickly, but it would be worth it. Not only are you reaching the million or so that show up in arenas each year, but every time you're on TV, there's additional exposure."

Mr. Goldstein says he considers the appeal of stadium boards so great that he'd sooner drop his imaginary $10 million there than on the Super Bowl or another televised sporting event.

Five ways to be a sports marketing hero:

CBS/FOX Video Sports has opportunities for you to drive traffic better than Hickious drives golf balls. We can take you far ahead of the field with premium sales and unique cross-promotions. Here's how you can do it:

1 TEAM UP WITH AN ALL-STAR.
CBS/FOX Video Sports has ongoing relationships with the hottest, most established names in sports. We're tied in with the NBA, Major League Baseball, ABC Sports, NBC Sports and CBS Sports, just to name a few.

2 PLAY IN THE MAJOR LEAGUES.
CBS/FOX has already been to the big games with heavy hitters such as Anheuser-Busch, Jeep/Eagle, Sports Illustrated, Mennen, Lincoln-Mercury, Miller and Procter & Gamble.

3 CRUSH YOUR OPPONENT.
Some of our programs have already been utilized to help major corporations get a leg up on their competition. After the Pistons bounced the L.A. Lakers from the '89 NBA Finals, the Greater Detroit Jeep/Eagle Dealers gave away our "Motor City Madness" tape with a test drive.

4 STAR IN THE BIG GAME.
CBS/FOX is at center court for the U.S. Open, the NBA Finals, the World Series and Championship Fights.

5 GO WITH THE WINNER.
CBS/FOX simply has the biggest and best sports catalog in the business. Our team includes Magic Johnson's "Put Magic in Your Game," "The Leonard/Hearns Saga," "The Official 1989 World Series Video," "Monday Night Madness, The Very Best of Monday Night Football," and highlights from three decades of ABC's Wide World of Sports.

$10 million beer question

for example, there are 1.5 million people who see the game in person plus about 150 games on cable and about half the games on local broadcast," he says.

"It's the national game, sometimes with a national TV audience," he continues, "and if the scoreboard is seen five or six times a game . . . you can establish yourself as an important player for beer drinkers based on the repeated exposure, in person and televised."

Taking a more traditional approach was Cathy Farrell, president of Farrell Media, New York, and perhaps best known as the media buyer for George Bush's 1988 presidential campaign.

"If this was $10 million for an account that was on an equal level with the other top beers in sports advertising, then I'd probably put it into late-night programming—NBC-TV's 'Tonight Show,' 'Late Night With David Letterman'—and syndicated sports," Ms. Farrell says.

Ms. Farrell notes about 25% of all beer drinkers consume some 75% of all beer, "and the best place to get to that core is sports, without a doubt, and then prime time."

But if Ms. Farrell's mystery brewery client were not in the league of Anheuser-Busch Cos. or Miller Brewing Co., her strategy would be different.

"If I'm No. 5 in that category, then I'd just add that $10 million to my overall sports buy," she says.

Hal Carlson, media planning supervisor, Martin Agency, Richmond, Va., offers a third view.

"Well, $10 million is nothing," Mr. Carlson says. "So I'd be forced to look elsewhere . . . where there are a number of regional opportunities left."

Mr. Carlson admits finding the alternative buy would involve a "pretty labor-intensive" search but thinks pushing a company's name on a regional scale could do the trick.

> "I think that $10 million could still have a significant presence on cable for something like the Winston Cup NASCAR racing."

"In the Southeast you have something like Atlantic Coast Conference basketball that's available, or Big 10 basketball [in the Midwest]," he says.

Auto racing also stimulates Mr. Carlson's interest.

"I think that $10 million could still have a significant presence on cable for something like the Winston Cup NASCAR racing," he says.

Ed Irons, VP-associate media director at McFarland & Drier, Miami, figures that A-B and Miller have locked up ESPN.

As a result, he'd put his money into alternative events. Mr. Irons developed a multimedia, six-prong strategy:

- $3.7 million into cable. Mr. Irons would put about 24 spots a week for 10 weeks on various cable networks, including TBS, TNT, USA Network and the SportsChannel stations.
- $2 million into network radio. It's "a really efficient way to tie into the men 18-to-34 target with a lot of frequency," Mr. Irons says.
- $2 million to sports anthologies, such as "Wide World of Sports," over a 10-week period. "The most important thing is that we don't need to buy these programs upfront, so they're still available," he says.
- $1 million into syndicated sports programs, such as truck pulls, hydroplane races, NASCAR races, rodeos, pro beach volleyball and off-road trucking.
- $750,000 on televised Hispanic sports programs, game shows and talk shows with on-air contests. "The merchandising allows us to put our products in the shows themselves," explains Mr. Irons.
- $500,000 into print. Mr. Irons would put Sports Illustrated and Rolling Stone on the plan, as well as Penthouse and Playboy for their spring break programs.

Although his $10 million is spent elsewhere, Mr. Irons predicts that by the year 2000, the hottest properties will be pro and college basketball and skiing. □

Opportunity

tant to meet them.

"Overall, I think the networks overestimated the demand side of the equation in their bidding," says Marc Goldstein, senior VP-director of national broadcast programming at Lintas:USA, New York. "Their estimates were colored by the competitive arena in the automotive industry that doesn't exist in other sports categories.

"They also failed to realize that there is a point when they cross a certain price line that forces advertisers to look hard at alternatives," he continues.

"A few years ago, there weren't alternatives that could hold up to what we needed as advertising vehicles. But now there are."

Contributing to the softness is the expiration of long-term advertising agreements.

The networks traditionally forge commitments from major sports advertisers to run the length of their TV contracts. In the last 12 months, an unprecedented number of contracts have expired, forcing the networks to scramble to re-sign major advertisers.

The relative surplus of inventory—"$90 million in brand-new NFL inventory," according to Mr. Novenstern—has allowed advertisers to take a tougher stance on pricing.

The automakers came in quickly and spent heavily to lock up their positions in telecasts. However, network sports power players A-B and Miller have held their ground.

Miller, a long-standing major advertiser on network baseball, has balked on CBS' pricing, and A-B bought only four units per game.

That leaves eight beer commercial units per game—a potential revenue base of $35 million for CBS—going begging for advertisers. The beer companies also succeeded in cutting down their required number of purchases in the National Basketball Association and NFL.

"This upfront has showed a migration out of sports," says Alan Gottesman, an analyst for Paine-Webber. "The pricing is too high. It reminds me of 1984 when daytime went through the roof and [advertisers] moved to cheaper dayparts. Sports sales are under a great deal of pressure since the networks are paying [higher rights fees]."

Mr. Gottesman also notes the two major sports categories are facing increasingly intense ad pressures. Automakers' ad costs are up and business is down. Beer and wine advertising, he says, "could go the way of cigarette [TV] advertising. What happens if you lose that category? You lose an important bidder at the auction and prices go down." □ field, he could bring the team alive and not get carried away," Mr. Nidetz says.

For an analyst, Mr. Nidetz selects Tony Kubek, formerly of NBC and now with Madison Square Garden Network in New York.

"His knowledge of baseball is so good that he doesn't get caught up in telling the old stories over and over again."

Steven Goff, Washington Post: NBC's Marv Albert and ABC's Mr. Michaels tie as Mr. Gofi's best play-by-play announcers.

"They both bring a level of professionalism to the business that is much needed. They're smooth," Mr. Goff says.

His favorite analyst is Dick Vitale of CBS' college basketball team.

"He brings excitement to the game and doesn't take it too seriously."

Prentis Rogers, Atlanta Journal-Constitution: Mr. Rogers selects former NBC play-by-play announcer Curt Gowdy as his favorite.

"I remember his voice being very distinctive, and I just liked the way he called the game. He had an air of excitement in his voice but didn't try to overplay what was happening."

As for an analyst, Mr. Rogers names Mr. Madden.

"He casts an essence of what an analyst is supposed to do—technical observations mixed with humor and an enthusiasm that's very genuine for the sport." □

Drug marketing

free drug samples.

The latest Kennedy inquiry comes just a few months after Rep. John Dingell (D., Mich.), chairman of the House Energy & Commerce Committee, asked the Food & Drug Administration to provide an update on direct-to-consumer advertising of prescription drugs.

Dingell aide Dennis Fitzgibbons said hearings might be held this fall on whether drug companies use "loopholes and inconsistencies in the law" to advertise prescription drugs to consumers.

Rep. Dingell was prompted by a resurgence of consumer advertising, which he considers to be outside FDA guidelines (AA, April 2).

So far, Sen. Kennedy's committee office has been quiet about its plans. Committee spokeswoman Lorrie McHugh said only that the probe is "within the committee's jurisdiction."

She said fall hearings are possible, but the committee hasn't completed its calendar.

"At this point it's difficult to tell what they are probing for and whether any bills will be drafted," said a spokesman for the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association. "They are compiling a very comprehensive look at drug companies' advertising and promotional practices. But they are being very closed about where all this is heading."

A member of the Kennedy committee told the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association in June the committee was concerned about a return to "unsavory" pharmaceutical promotional practices, according to the newsletter F-D-C Reports. Such practices include lavishing gifts on doctors and sending them on junkets.

Executives at medical ad agencies are accusing Congress of seeking an easy publicity target to blame for spiraling healthcare costs.

"It's not clear whether this will develop into anything, but it seems Dingell and Kennedy want to trot out the drug industry as a whipping boy," said William Castagnoli, president of Medicus Intercon International, New York, the nation's leading medical ad agency.

Robert Portman, president of M.E.D. Communications, a Woodbridge, N.J. medical agency, said he's concerned the politicians apparently want to control the flow of information to both physicians and consumers.

"This is a dangerous trend in terms of regulating what we can hear," Mr. Portman said. "It's the same as a ban on liquor or cigarette advertising—should this be the kind of effort with which a legislator concerns himself?"

Like Rep. Dingell, Sen. Kennedy has also asked for and received information from the FDA regarding consumer advertising of prescription drugs. But an FDA official and others said Sen. Kennedy seems particularly interested in the industry's sponsorship of continuing medical education.

Drug companies typically sponsor seminars about new drug therapies, including information about their own drugs, for which physicians get continuing medical education credits. The seminars are usually tied to an academic institution and feature well-known physicians as speakers.

Drug industry sources say because the seminars include information about a drug company's products, Sen. Kennedy apparently considers the seminars inherently biased. □

"everyday low pricing" format 18 months ago, Sears has greatly boosted ad spending, but sales haven't responded.

"The fact that Sears isn't king of the hill anymore is . . . a very hard pill for people at Sears to swallow," said Sid Doolittle, a partner at the retail consultancy McMillan/Doolittle.

Sears' 1990 yearend sales are expected to be about $32 billion, just slightly ahead of last year's sales of $31.6 billion and tied with Wal-Mart Stores. But K mart's sales this year are expected to total $32.5 billion, according to analysts' estimates.

One way for Sears to maintain its No. 1 ranking would be to merge with another retailer. The company disclosed last week that it discussed "certain joint opportunities" with No. 9 retailer Montgomery Ward & Co.

However, statements issued by both companies said those discussions have been terminated.

Crain's Chicago Business reported the discussions almost certainly would have seen a spinoff of the Sears Merchandise Group to a new entity headed by Ward's Chairman Bernard F. Brennan, and had been under way for more than a year.

Although the talks were initiated by Ward's, sources said Sears' management team, led by Chairman Edward Brennan, is facing pressure from outside board members to undertake a dramatic restructuring that would result in a split of the company's retail and financial services operations.

The same sources also said that General Electric Capital Corp., which was a key financial partner in the buyout two years ago of Ward's from Mobil Corp., was a major player in the Sears-Ward's talks. While both companies now say they are committed to remain independent retailers, sources say GECC remains keenly interested in a transaction involving Sears.

Sears' income in the first half of 1990 fell 62.8% to $72.6 million compared with the same period a year earlier.

Sears' Mr. Bozic said the results of the first half compared unfavorably with the previous year's first six months because of last year's heavier sales following the biggest ad blitz in Sears' history for the everyday low price promotion.

"We knew the comparisons for the first half of this year would be difficult, but we said all along we expect things will improve, and they will," Mr. Bozic said. "Our Brand Central and Kids & More power formats are going to be the best in the business."

Sears increased its measured media spending 34% in 1989 to $525 million, primarily to support its everyday low pricing ad blitz. The surge propelled Sears to the No. 4 spot among all U.S. advertisers in 1989 from No. 12 in 1988.

K mart's potential status as the No. 1 retailer "is not something we're terribly concerned about," said Orren Knauer, director of investor relations, K mart. "What we're trying to do is increase our sales in order to increase profits, and being No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is not a corporate goal."

Wal-Mart wouldn't comment on its status among the top three retailers. □

It's Hype, Hype Hooray for new book by Trump

By Jennifer Lawrence

Brace yourselves. The new and improved Donald Trump will make his debut in bookstores nationwide Aug. 15.

That's when Random House unveils "Trump: Surviving at the Top," Mr. Trump's sequel to his 1987 best seller, "The Art of the Deal."

The publisher, sure that the market is ready for more Trump tales at $21.95 a copy, convinced the tycoon to move up the publication date from October and ordered 500,000 copies for the first printing.

Random House has a flexible marketing plan for the book, said Joni Evans, exec VP-publisher of the company's adult trade division. Although $200,000 has been budgeted for a newspaper campaign, it may be tripled or slashed to zero.

"We may spend $600,000 or nothing," Ms. Evans said. "It's totally unpredictable with Donald. Donald works differently from other authors. He has his own sense of rhythm. . . . He understands the art of promotion."

That art will be to maximize free media exposure before committing to buying ad space. Random House's theory is that just about everyone is waiting to hear The Donald's version of his ongoing financial and marital woes.

Though details are secret and literally under guard, Ms. Evans said the book's content is "intimate, realistic, and honest and right on," focusing on "things people haven't heard yet on the banks, Ivana and the divorce. The book is extremely surprising and disarming."

Random House is anticipating a barrage of media attention during the first week.

As the book makes its impact, Random House executives will plot their ad strategy.

"The book is famous before it has appeared," said Peter Osnos, Random House adult trade division associate publisher and Mr. Trump's editor.

"We are planning an ad campaign that will take shape as the book lands in stores. . . . The strongest thing that any ad can do is [say] that the book is here—an announcement ad. What we do [next] will depend on how the book is received," Mr. Osnos said.

Advertising is handled in-house.

Even with a lot of support, the book has "an unfortunate title," said Clive Chajet, chairman-ceo at Lippincott & Margulies, image and identity management consultants.

"To question survival in the title is already a problem, he said."

"We're expecting it to be one of the hottest books of the season," said Donna Passannante, spokeswoman for B. Dalton Bookseller. "We still think that regardless of his troubles, his name is still a big enough draw that people will want to hear what he has to say." □

brand, to help offset the sales declines it was risking in mature categories with the marketing strategy. But Gatorade suffered through soft sales in a cooler-than-normal summer.

"Quaker has a lot to accomplish in the next year," said Timothy Ramey, analyst with County NatWest Securities USA. "I think Quaker is going to have to focus on blocking and tackling, regaining market share and forget about financial performance. They need to get into the trenches with the big guys and slug it out for market share."

Mr. Ramey believes Quaker inevitably will have to restore marketing dollars to compete in those battles for share.

"In fiscal 1990, they tried to moderate spending, but their volumes fell out of bed. At least, they have to reverse this strategy," said Nomi Ghez, a Goldman, Sachs & Co. analyst.

"The problem isn't profit margins but sales," agreed William Leach, VP-analyst with Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette. "Quaker's in sort of a pickle. . . . Overall, their record of the past 10 years looks good, but much of it is window dressing. Good acquisitions like Gatorade have masked a lot of core problems."

But as Quaker starts a new fiscal year, insiders are optimistic Chairman-CEO William Smithburg and Exec VP Philip Marineau have a plan that can improve overall performance and help the company avoid a potential takeover.

Quaker gathered its Chicago-based work force at the Chicago Theater late last month. Employees at that meeting said Mr. Smithburg, Mr. Marineau and other divisional presidents discussed the disappointments of fiscal 1990 and plans for fiscal 1991; those at the meeting described it as "reinvigorating" and "passionate."

"People needed to hear something about how we are going to turn this around," said one employee. "It was good to hear that management is human and shares in the responsibility for what happened last year."

Mr. Smithburg "has acknowledged that he's gotten separated from the business in the past couple of years and plans to get more involved," another source said.

The company is planning to move ahead with Quaker Oven-Stuffs frozen sandwiches, rolling national in September with $22 million in marketing support, and sources hinted the company may introduce new pet food products in the coming year.

Management has listed ready-to-eat and hot cereals, Gatorade, microwave meals, foodservice and international operations as businesses it considers high growth, and it has focused marketing dollars on those areas.

Nevertheless, the ad budget for Gatorade has been cut to less than $30 million, from around $35 million, said sources close to the company. That likely will primarily affect Gatorade Light and Freestyle, flanker products introduced in limited areas this spring.

Some businesses will continue to get strong marketing support. For instance, Quaker last month broke a TV and print campaign for Kibbles'n Bits 'n Bits 'n Bits, its leading dog food. Two spots were produced, instead of the usual one, via J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago.

A source said Quaker has "significantly" increased its ad budget for Rice-A-Roni.

"They have fairly aggressive sales goals and marketing goals, and have made plans to meet those goals," the source said.

Quaker broke a new campaign for Rice-A-Roni last month via Goldberg Moser O'Neill, San Francisco.

Gravy Train dry dog food will get its first substantial ad support in more than a year, sources said. Bayer Bess Vanderwarker, Chicago, handles.

Also, actor Wilford Brimley is expected to return in style this fall for Quaker's signature oatmeal line.

"They are continuing to support their principal cereal brands in a smart and aggressive fashion," said Jim Jordan, chairman of Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, agency for oatmeal and several ready-to-eat cereal products. □

Levi's buttons up and flies right with delightful Spike Lee ads

(Rating: ★ ★ ★ ★)

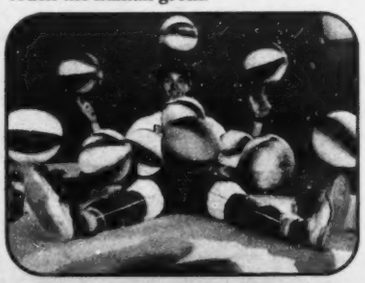
By Bob Garfield

Garfield

Now playing on a screen near you: Spike Lee's "Mo' Better Blues" and Spike Lee's mo' better "Blues."

Using the fabled, but outmoded, "501 Blues" campaign as a point of departure, director Lee and Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, have stuck with the same camera techniques and psychological appeal, but seasoned them with humor, celebrity cachet and much-needed product focus.

The result is a remarkably unified new campaign that combines Bo Jacksonlike marquee value, individualist imagery of the Marlboro Cowboy school and the first unique selling proposition ever to touch the human groin.



Quirky pursuits, like spinning a bunch of basketballs at once, stand for the individualism promised by Levi's in an unusually product-focused 501 campaign.

The result is "Levi's 501 Button-fly Report," the best TV campaign so far this year.

The first nine spots portray young devotees of a particular idiosyncratic activity. There's a guy in Florida who spins nearly a dozen basketballs at a time, two Brooklyn teen-agers who speak fluently backwards, a tour guide at an Atlanta cemetery, a group of Waveland Avenue ballhawks outside Chicago's Wrigley Field and sundry other single-minded icons of iconoclasm.

We see them in their natural habitats, through the quick-cut, hand-held, occasionally b&w cinematic kaleidoscope we've come to expect from Levi's 501. Indeed, the camera angles, editing and general self-consciousness very much recall 501's last seven Leslie Dektor years. But this campaign has two things "501 Blues" never had.

First, there is Spike Lee, the personality—the first celebrity presenter to present from behind the camera. We don't see him, but we hear him banter with his subjects, and his trademark dual attitude of skepticism and wonder is everywhere. If Tom Wolfe is at one pole of the '90s Zeitgeist, Lee is at the other, attracting the young and ardent in large numbers.

His vision here is certainly superb, and so is his sense of detail. In one spot, on Coney Island, one of the backward talkers practices his craft at the snack bar. The counter girl hears the order, checks the menu board behind her, and says, "Ain't nothin' up there that says that." Later, she begins to catch on. When the boy asks for "pupchek," she asks "Ketchup?" Half disgusted with him, half pleased with herself, she fetches it, with just the hint of a sly smile.

A marvelous moment, just as it is marvelous when we meet a little guy who never catches any balls hit out of Wrigley Field because the other kids muscle him away. "Too small," he explains. "Yeah, be knockin' me around in there." But then he gets his first ever (off the bat of Joe Carter of the San Diego Padres. Really.).

There are many delights more, all adding warmth and humor to a framework that, in its last incarnation in the Dektor era, had grown labored verging on self-parody. The stars of these spots, unlike previous 501 "real people" aren't so hip it hurts.

You'd be forgiven for looking at Lee's discoveries—his backward talkers, his 365-day-a-year surfers, his loving Big Brother to several inner-city kids—and concluding the campaign is about dedication.

Look at how each of these adolescent heroes has cut against the grain, devoting countless hours to some esoteric pursuit that defines his very being—definition such as most teen-agers can only yearn for. A new Firebird or $140 Nikes might be objects of high school envy, but FCB has long understood that material emblems are nothing compared with an identifiable persona.

In adolescent psychology, self-image—or, more to the point, satisfaction with the image you project to others—means everything. Thus the influence of these charming ad verite characters. To adults, they are carefree young people with strange notions of how to amuse themselves. To teen-agers, who are never carefree, they are demigods.

Oh, and they wear 501 jeans. With a button fly.

And that, not dedication, not the director cult hero, is what this campaign is about—and what earlier campaigns ignored entirely. While "501 Blues" had deteriorated to where it was an empty celebration of phony individualism, these ads portray bona fide individualism as a showcase for the product's single, bona fide point of distinction. Lee's iconoclasts show up in Button Your Fly T-shirts, they talk about their button flys and they show us their button flys. "Fly buttoned?" Lee asks the cemetery guide. "Fly buttoned," he responds.

USP. Levi's ads gotta have it, and FCB did the right thing. □

Outdoor falloff

10 outdoor ad categories reported slight to significant spending declines in first quarter 1990 over 1989.

The automotive category saw the second-biggest decline, down 30%. Spending declines in that and other categories are attributed to the generally soft ad climate.

The publishing and media category was down 17%; spending by promotion-minded retailers also dipped 17%.

Overall, spending among the top 10 categories dropped 16% to $129 million (see chart on Page 3).

Philip Morris USA, which earlier this year was targeted by anti-tobacco protestors, said it would take steps to ease community concerns over the proliferation of boards. Those steps include voluntarily limiting the number of tobacco boards in certain areas.

A similar policy restricting the number and location of tobacco- and alcohol-related boards also was issued earlier this year by the Outdoor Advertising Association of America.

Even so, whitewashing campaigns and community protests against tobacco and alcohol boards don't appear to be subsiding. Last month in Chicago, community activist Rev. Michael Pfleger led a group that whitewashed 40 outdoor boards.

In addition, federal and local legislation is on the horizon that could restrict advertisers' use of outdoor boards.

In Chicago, for instance, City Council Finance Committee Chairman Edward Burke has opened hearings on his proposed citywide ban of outdoor ads for tobacco products.

On the national level, U.S. Sen. John Chafee (R., R.I.) introduced a bill last April that would prohibit construction of new signs on federal highways, and Rep. John Lewis (D., Ga.) introduced a similar bill earlier.

Even with all these problems, most industry executives predict business will rebound later in the year. Some outdoor companies, like Gannett and Patrick Media Group, said they're stepping up marketing efforts to offset recent declines.

"For the rest of the year, I see the industry doing OK," said Gannett's Mr. Zitz. "The big question in our minds now as an industry is the fourth quarter."

Ron Pancrantz, senior VP-marketing and sales at Patrick Media, said package goods and automotive are coming back and will help strengthen the third and fourth quarters.

Some outdoor companies are targeting local business.

"We're concentrating on local sales in case media buyers on Madison Avenue decide that, because of what's going on with all the outdoor companies, it's not the way to go," said Neal Radding, VP-national sales for Whiteco. Whiteco hopes to tap into co-op promotional budgets by teaming with retailers to run ads for major national brands.

"Sure, [Patrick] is competition, but we need as many mouths out on the street selling this medium as we can."

"The trend is now for large marketers to look at making national programs available to local retailers," said Robert Dragotta, president of National Out-of-Home Media Sales.

Gannett's new Creative Challenge program "dares" ad agencies to come up with great creative for outdoor. Gannett offers prizes to the winning agencies and posts the winning board free in the creator's hometown.

The industry may be aided in the second half by a return to the offensive by Patrick. The No. 1 U.S. outdoor company, with 42,000 boards, recently took itself off the auction block.

"Sure, [Patrick] is competition, but we need as many mouths out on the street selling this medium as we can," said an outdoor executive who asked not to be named. "We're glad to have them back." □

we're not going to roll a Trojan warhorse onto Sixth Avenue and dramatically change all our sports businesses. We're going to reshape them over time, but boxing is where we're most experienced, so that's where our first announcements will be."

The division will also set up a sports management and marketing operation to represent athletes for commercial endorsements, Mr. Abraham said.

"When we see a linkage between any of the athletes we're dealing with and the advertisers in the magazine group, we will create sponsorship opportunities for them," he said.

Further, "we're offering advertisers with an affinity for sports a new playing field," he said. "It might be a pay-per-view sponsorship opportunity, or maybe it will be a home video sponsorship. Ultimately, we may create sports events knowing full well that there's an advertiser who might be interested in an exclusive sponsorship deal."

Time Warner estimates that its sports-related businesses—including Sports Illustrated, HBO Sports, HBO Video and the sports arm of Licensing Corp. of America—amount to about $750 million annually in advertising and subscriber revenue.

"The sports gross national product in this country is between $60 billion and $65 billion," Mr. Abraham said. "Worldwide, the figure rises to about $120 billion. We feel we can make a good business of this, and we'll be competitive."

Mr. Tyson on Sept. 22 will fight the last bout in a three-year, seven-fight series on HBO that brought him $26 million. A similar pay-per-view deal could generate $190 million in revenues.

Cable services now reach about 60% of U.S. households; about 25% of those cable homes have access to pay-per-view.

"The venture makes a lot of sense from the point of view of aggressively going after pay-per-view properties," said Paul Bortz, president of Bortz & Co., a consultancy.

In 1989, two Sugar Ray Leonard fights generated $50 million in pay-per-view revenues. Mr. Tyson's 1988 bout with Michael Spinks to win the undisputed heavyweight title lasted 90 seconds and generated $21 million in pay-per-view revenues. □

Dentsu, Frankel huddle

May mean U.S. promotion link

By Scott Hume and Alison Fahey

Dentsu and Frankel & Co. are holding negotiations that could end the giant Japanese agency's search for a sales promotion partner.

The two agencies "are having discussions regarding the formation of an alliance to service Dentsu's Japanese-based clients in the U.S.," a spokeswoman for Chicago-based Frankel said last week.

She said there have been no discussions about Dentsu possibly acquiring an equity stake in Frankel, the third-largest sales promotion agency in the U.S. with 1989 sales promotion revenues of $23.2 million.

The talks with Frankel culminate months of rumors within the sales promotion field concerning Dentsu's possible interest in acquiring or aligning with a major U.S. shop.

Representatives of Dentsu—the world's largest ad agency with gross income last year of $1.3 billion—have met with several agencies in the U.S. and the U.K., including FKB Group and KLP Group, both based in London, about its desire for partners in sales promotion and direct marketing.

FKB's empire was broken up last week as many of its U.S. sales promotion agencies were either sold to Carlson Marketing Group or back to their management.

A top executive at a shop reportedly on Dentsu's list said the Japanese company is "very conservative. They're going to move slowly, but they're going to be a player in the U.S."

"Dentsu has been and is still looking for a working relationship with a U.S. promotion agency or network," said another agency source once engaged in similar talks with Dentsu executives. "They don't necessarily want to acquire [an agency] but want to associate with or have a trading relationship with someone here."

While Dentsu can tap the promotion serv-

Martha Stewart's magazine project with Time Warner makes its debut in November.

Martha Stewart teams with Time

By Scott Donaton

Time Warner is developing an upscale women's lifestyle/how-to magazine with home entertainment queen Martha Stewart and will publish a first test issue in November, industry sources said.

The media/entertainment giant is said to be using the magazine as a springboard for other projects involving Ms. Stewart, including a line of books, videos and catalogs, and possibly even a TV series.

The test comes during a magazine industry ad page crunch that's hit women's titles particularly hard.

"We and Martha Stewart have basically entered into an agreement to explore a magazine project," said a Time Warner official who asked not to be identified. The official refused to discuss further details and said it's too early to speculate about future projects the company might undertake with Ms. Stewart.

The project is being developed under Time Publishing Ventures, a newly formed division of Time Inc. Magazine Co. overseen by S. Christopher Meigher as president-ceo. Eric Thorkilsen, director of development, is believed to be overseeing the magazine project.

Among the titles being considered:

Fox's early start bogging down

By John McManus

Advertisers are getting uneasy about production delays that may push back the fall debut of some of Fox Broadcasting Co.'s expanded schedule.

Fox wanted to get a strategic jump on the Big 3 TV networks by premiering most of its fall series before the official Sept. 17 season kickoff. The Big 3 are also premiering some series before the season starts but not to the extent Fox planned.

It now appears at least three series—"Babes," "The Simpsons" and "Class of Beverly Hills"—will be delayed until possibly as late as October.

The three shows are part of Fox's Thursday night lineup, when competition from rival networks, particularly NBC, will be especially fierce.

A July 27 Fox memo alerted affiliated stations that the network's plan to get a jump on its rivals "must be constrained by the realities of the production process" and that revisions are required.

"Please bear in mind that premiere dates for all programs may change because of unavoidable production delays," said the memo, written by Preston Padden, Fox's senior VP-affiliate relations.

Advertisers had been warned new episodes of "The Simpsons" would be delayed, but Fox had planned to get "Babes," a new series, on the air by Aug. 23. Industry sources familiar with Fox say production on "Babes" won't even start until Aug. 23.

Officially, the network said it's now shooting for "an early to mid-September premiere." "Class" will premiere Oct. 4, Fox said.

Fox could be forced to air the first new

Gov't readies for cuts

WASHINGTON—The White House told the Federal Trade Commission, Federal Communications Commission and other agencies to prepare contingency plans for a 31% budget cut for fiscal 1991. The plans are to be turned into the Office of Management & Budget by Aug. 27. OMB said the plans would be needed if negotiated budget cuts don't meet Gramm-Rudman Act reduction targets. A 31% cut would mean an FTC budget of about $50 million and about $70 million for the FCC.

Chiat shuffle in N.Y.

Wolf, Perkins assume Newman's titles

By Jon Lafayette

Chiat/Day/Mojo North American Chairman-CEO Bob Wolf traveled to New York last week to find out "what it is we're doing wrong and go fix it." He began with the executive suite.

Mr. Wolf replaced Jane Newman as president-ceo of the New York office, which laid off 30 people earlier this month following a string of account losses.

Mr. Wolf, 48, who was Ms. Newman's predecessor, assumed the ceo title and named Bob Perkins president. Mr. Perkins, 44, continues as chairman of Perkins/-Butler, Chiat's direct marketing unit. Mr. Perkins had been an account director in Chiat's Los Angeles office before co-founding Perkins/Butler two years ago.

Ms. Newman, 42, becomes vice chairman for strategic planning and business development for North America. Exec VP-Worldwide Business Development Don Peppers and his staff will report to Ms. Newman.

Mr. Perkins said his first priority is to meet existing clients and his second is to look for new business. Royal Caribbean Cruise Lines, whose decision to review its $30 million account (AA, July 30) precipitated both the layoffs and the management changes, falls under both categories.

Though Perkins/Butler had done some direct marketing projects for Royal Caribbean, Mr. Perkins said he didn't know details about why the account was in review, "but I can't imagine that it's something that can't be fixed. We're treating them as a new-business prospect."

Observers believe Chiat has little chance to retain the account.

B. Wolf

Chiat lost an ally there earlier this year when Jim Kissel, who had hired the agency, resigned as VP-marketing and sales to start a tour package company.

"When I left at the end of February, there were no problems" with the relationship, Mr. Kissel said.

The review appears to stem from problems with Chiat rather than problems at Royal Caribbean, which competitors agree is in excellent shape.

Sources say Royal Caribbean Exec VP Rod McLeod is unhappy with the continual turnover in Chiat account and creative personnel working on the account.

The latest management changes, however, may provide Chiat with a small opportunity, sources say.

"Perkins is a smart business guy. He's good at talking about a client's business, and its important to Royal Caribbean that their agency understand the travel business," said a former Chiat staffer. "He's also very personable, and you can never say Jane was a people person."

Mr. Wolf denied Ms. Newman is being made a scapegoat for the New York office's recent problems.

"It's a matter of playing on everybody's strengths, and Jane's strength, more than anything else, is her ability to strategically solve advertising problems," he said. "By being caught in a job where she was an administrator, new-business director, personnel manager—all jobs that go with running an office—we weren't tapping her best assets."

Ms. Newman said she expects her new job will allow her the freedom to deal with clients' problems without having to deal with day-to-day responsibilities.

"These moves are designed to strengthen senior management," she said. "I will be freed from the day-to-day running of business, so I can concentrate on strategic insights."

Mr. Wolf added that Tom McElligott "will be devoting more time to New York. We really haven't tapped that asset well enough."

Mr. McElligott has been spending a great deal of time in the agency's Toronto office.

Mr. Wolf himself plans to spend about half his time in New York. □

Sears chief gets ultimatum

Crain News Service

Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s board told Chairman Edward Brennan last week he has six months to post significant gains in the company's flagging retail operations or face a move to oust him.

Members of the Sears board, who spoke only on condition of anonymity, told Crain's Chicago Business the ultimatum was delivered to Mr. Brennan at a tumultuous board meeting Aug. 8.

Sources familiar with the drama unfolding at Sears also said Philip J. Purcell, chairman of the company's Dean Witter Financial Services Group, is slated to assume broadened responsibilities for the company's expansive financial services operations.

Mr. Brennan, 56, last week took on the additional title of chairman of the Sears Merchandise Group in a last-ditch effort to improve retailing results. He replaced Michael Bozic, 49, who was demoted to president of the unit and removed from the company's board.

Sears, Mr. Brennan and Mr. Purcell all declined to comment.

Also at last week's board meeting, Mr. Brennan failed in a move to secure a public statement reaffirming the directors' faith in his ability to turn around the retailer.

A board member suggested if Mr. Brennan isn't able to make "significant" gains, the board may move to reopen talks about selling the merchandise group. □

Lang eyes stake in 'Confetti'

By Scott Donaton

Media entrepreneur Dale Lang is negotiating to buy a stake in Confetti, a struggling group of beauty salon magazines launched last spring.

The talks follow Lang Communications' relaunch of Ms. and Mr. Lang's formation of Star Television Network.

Mr. Lang's involvement with Confetti would put him in competition with Whittle Communications, which plans to launch its own beauty salon magazine next month.

Confetti Publisher Howard Garey confirmed last week he's been holding talks with Lang Communications but wouldn't discuss details.

"Because it's still in negotiations, I don't want to get into that," he said.

Mr. Garey said he expects to make an announcement as early as next week. Mr. Lang couldn't be reached for comment.

Communications Venture Group, a media investment company, launched Confetti with an April/-May issue. Confetti is styled after Whittle's Special Report magazines for doctors' waiting rooms.

D. Lang

Confetti consists of six oversize glossy titles, each devoted to a single topic such as style, home and leisure. The magazines, published every other month, are distributed to about 4,000 beauty salons nationwide.

The magazines were launched amid an ad slump, and Confetti was forced to cut ad rates by as much as 50% after the first two issues. Several months after the launch, Communications Venture Group began looking for a partner.

Mr. Lang has a penchant for buying troubled media properties and trying to revive them. Late last month, he relaunched Ms. as an ad-free "magabook."

Last month, he also announced the formation of Star Television Network, a direct response entertainment network to be launched next month in more than 20 cities.

Media buyers say they don't understand Mr. Lang's recent spate of activity.

"I don't know if Dale's just buying low-cost media [properties] and trying to turn them around or if he has a master plan," said one agency executive who asked not to be identified.

Meanwhile, Whittle's American Style will be launched next month. The every-other-monthly will be distributed in 140,000 beauty salons nationwide. □

Regulate outdoor ads: poll

Most want local control, but balk at defacing 'offensive' boards

By Scott Hume

Consumers are putting outdoor advertising companies on notice that they want a say over the kinds of products advertised in their neighborhoods.

A majority believe regulatory power should reside with local city councils, but a substantial percentage—especially of racial minorities—said citizens are justified in using "any means they can" to force outdoor companies to remove boards the community deems offensive.

GALLUP SURVEY

Most people draw the line at defacing outdoor boards as a protest. But there's strong consumer support for a community's right to regulate the types of outdoor advertising allowed there, according to a national survey conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization.

In New York's Harlem neighborhood, on Chicago's South Side and in inner-city areas in Baltimore and Houston, community activist organizations have been complaining about what they see as an overabundance of outdoor ads for tobacco and alcohol products in low-income neighborhoods.

In some cities, the protest over the outdoor boards has extended to painting over or defacing the ads.

Last month, Gallup polled a nationally projectable sample of 1,000 adults, selected at random, for their opinions about outdoor advertising and these protests. The survey was conducted by telephone; the results have a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%.

Slightly more than one-third (36%) of those polled said they were aware that outdoor boards were being defaced to protest tobacco or alcohol marketers' targeting practices.

But awareness was higher among black respondents (42% aware) and Asians (44%) than whites (36%), and lower among Hispanic respondents (22%).

The total sample was asked which outdoor advertiser came to mind first from among all they had seen in the previous 30 days. Cigarettes were the most often recalled product category: six of the top 30 ads in awareness were for cigarettes in general or for specific brands.

The No. 2 category in recall was restaurants (five of the top 30), including the single best-recalled marketer, McDonald's Corp., followed by beer marketers (four of the top 30)

One-third of the sample said they couldn't recall any outdoor advertiser.

Although only 36% of those polled said they were aware of the defacement protests, all 1,000 respondents were asked how strongly they agreed or disagreed with the action these community groups have taken. One-quarter of the sample said they agreed or strongly agreed with defacing outdoor advertising as a form of protest.

Support for those who deface outdoor boards was significantly stronger among black respondents (44% of whom agreed or strongly agreed with the tactic) and Hispanic respondents (35%) than among whites (24%).

Among respondents ages 18 to 34, support for defacing boards was strongest, 28% agreeing or strongly agreeing, compared with 23% among those ages 35 to 54 and 24% for those ages 55 or older.

Respondents also were asked whether they agreed with this statement: If members of a community find an advertisement offensive, they should use any means they can to cause the advertiser to remove that advertisement.

Of the total sample, 40% said they agreed or strongly agreed with that statement, but majorities of black respondents (54%), Hispanic respondents (52%) and Asian respondents (50%) said they agreed with the right to use "any means" to force removal of an outdoor ad. By comparison, 39% of white respondents agreed or agreed strongly with that right.

But do citizens believe that "any means" includes the illegal action of defacing an outdoor board?

Respondents were asked whether they agreed with this statement: Defacing outdoor boards is against the law and shouldn't be allowed under any circumstances.

A full three-quarters of the sample agreed that illegal defacements shouldn't be tolerated. Majorities of all respondents from all racial, income and age groups agreed that defacing boards was going too far.

By what process, then, should outdoor advertising be regulated in local communities?

Respondents were asked whether they supported this statement: Local city councils should have a committee that reviews advertising in their area for suitability and that can regulate the type of outdoor board advertising shown in their community.

Better than seven of 10 respondents (71%) agreed or strongly agreed that such local control should exist. Agreement extended to 71% of whites polled, 72% of blacks, 61% of Hispanics and 72% of Asians polled in the survey. □

Study sees ad outlay gains

LINCOLNSHIRE, Ill.—Large diversified food companies will boost ad spending 9.3% to $10.1 billion this year, a study by Schonfeld & Associates found.

Eating places will spend $1.5 billion, up 10%, while the miscellaneous amusement and recreational services category will see spending grow 13.7%.

The study estimated advertising expenditures and advertising-to-sales ratios in more than 400 industry sectors.

The data were compiled from a variety of sources, including the 10-K reports of publicly held companies. Estimates and forecasts were developed by using historical data. The annual report includes data about more than 5,700 companies.

Besides advertising-to-sales ratios, the report forecasts 1991 ad spending for each company and industry. The new study also includes sales growth rates.

Other industries with significant ad growth this year include airlines, where ad spending will exceed $2.4 billion, up 8.7%; the hotel industry, with 7.6% ad growth; and hospital and medical service plans, up 12.9%.

Other industries with significant expected ad growth this year include airlines, where ad spending will exceed $2.4 billion, up 8.7%; the hotel industry, with 7.6% ad growth; and hospital and medical service plans, up 12.9%.

Despite industry turmoil, department store chains will spend $4.8 billion, up 5.6%. Variety store chains will show stronger advertising growth of 8.9%.

Many industrial companies will likewise increase their ad budgets, the study found. General Electric Co. will increase ad spending 13% to $562 million. High-tech Gandalf Technologies will increase spending 19.9%, and Medtronic's ad spending will be up 13%.

Among foreign companies, Matsushita Electric Co. will bump up spending 10.7% to $996 million. Honda Motor Co. will also be a heavy spender at $866 million. Volvo will invest $405 million and Burroughs Wellcome Co. will invest $222 million in advertising.

Schonfeld noted results could be affected by financial events such as mergers, acquisitions or divestitures; private ownership; and multi-industry companies reporting only in their primary industry.

Copies of the study are available for $295 by contacting Schonfeld & Associates, 1 Sherwood Drive, 60069. Phone: (708) 948-8080.

New outdoor board plan

WASHINGTON—The Outdoor Advertising Association of America today will announce a new program that identifies outdoor boards within 500 feet of schools, places of worship and hospitals with decals to signal the boards are "off limits" for cigarette and alcohol-related ads. The association in June adopted guidelines encouraging members to voluntarily prohibit such ads on boards in those areas. The association said major outdoor companies including Gannett Outdoor, Patrick Media Group, Lamar Advertising and Penn Advertising have agreed to use the decals.

McD grills chicken

OAK BROOK, Ill.—McDonald's has begun testing a grilled chicken breast sandwich served on a wheat bun in Albany, N.Y.; Knoxville, Tenn.; San Diego; Toledo, Ohio; and the Quad Cities area of Illinois and Iowa. McDonald's is positioning the item as a lower-calorie (less than 300) and lower-fat menu option. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, provides TV and in-store creative; local co-op agencies are placing media. Burger King added the BK Broiler grilled chicken sandwich systemwide this spring; Wendy's will roll its version national this fall.

Surf's Up! for snacks

MINNEAPOLIS—General Mills next month will introduce Surf's Up! fruit snacks in the Midwest and Western states. Tutti Frutti and Sun Splash flavors feature a variety of beach shapes, including sand castles, dune buggies, sunglasses, starfish and boom boxes. A spot, syndicated and cable TV campaign will break this fall via Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. Free standing inserts and other promotions support.

Ad watchdog to aid PR

WASHINGTON—The State Advertising Coalition, formed three years ago by three industry associations to fight off state ad-tax attempts, hired Linda Myers Dove, former assistant press secretary to Maryland Gov. William Schaefer, to monitor state legislative initiatives against public relations. The hiring indicates the Association of National Advertisers and American Advertising Federation agreed to proposals by the American Association of Advertising Agencies to

Marketers on alert

Iraq crisis rattles U.S. consumers' confidence

An Advertising Age roundup

The Middle East crisis brought on by Iraq's invasion of Kuwait is triggering a decline in consumer confidence that marketers fear could descend to alarming levels as they head for the crucial fourth quarter.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Fear of higher prices due to rising energy costs is what's shaking consumer confidence (see Advertising Age*/Gallup Organization poll below).*

Consumers are "shaken, confused and concerned" about the oil crisis though confident in the Bush administration's assertive action, said Gary Stibel, a founding principal of New England Consulting Group.

Some marketers are developing contingency plans to cover "what-if" situations for worse-than-expected or better-than-expected holiday sales, Mr. Stibel said. Companies dependent on fourth-quarter sales may actually boost ad spending (see story below on Eastman Kodak Co.), he predicted, especially if consumer confidence worsens.

See related stories on Pages 38, 39 and 59; see Editorial on Page 46.

The crisis is already having an impact on advertising strategies, particularly at the U.S. oil companies.

Last week, Sun Oil Co. decided to postpone a campaign for its Atlantic gas stations division.

"Certainly they don't want to go ahead and do advertising for Atlantic until they see what the [Mideast] situation is," said Jeff Fine, chairman-chief operating officer at the Bloom Agency, New York, the company's ad agency.

The U.S. Council for Energy Awareness, a Washington lobbying group for the nuclear energy industry, last week added 11 major dailies to its regular weekly schedule of newspaper ads in three papers, said Ed Arduss, VP-advertising.

Consumers already are driving less

By Scott Hume

Consumers have changed their behavior in response to the sudden surge in gas prices, and even more dramatic changes can be expected if gas prices don't come down.

The implications of those changes for the entertainment, restaurant, travel/tourism and retailing industries are dramatic.

What those and other industries rely on is consumers' willingness to use their cars, but an exclusive survey conducted last week for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization shows that the double-digit jump in gas prices following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait is already causing people to cut

Kodak pins hopes on a Star

New 35mm camera line to snap up bigger ad spending

By Alison Fahey

Eastman Kodak Co., in a reversal of its previous marketing strategy, will introduce a new line of low-price 35mm amateur cameras designed to appeal to "the masses."

This move and other fall plans by Kodak mean a boost in fourth-quarter ad spending by the camera marketer.

The new Star line, coming in October, represents Kodak's attempt to hike sales with high-volume, low-price cameras. It replaces the 2 Series, 100 Series and 200 Series.

"We've changed our price strategy to appeal to the masses," said Dan Matthaidess, a Kodak spokesman. "We're broadening our audience and trying to upgrade consumers into 35mm from their older model, non-35mm cameras such as Instamatics."

The Star line will be supported by a $7 million TV and print campaign from Young & Rubicam, New York, and promotional support via Hutchins/Y&R, Rochester, N.Y.

Kodak's latest single-use 35mm camera also will get a fourth-quarter push, backed by new ads from Y&R.

The campaign will boost overall fourth-quarter ad spending for cameras by 15% from the same period in 1989, said Joseph Ganey, Kodak's U.S. marketing manager for cameras.

He added that Kodak's 1990 ad spending for cameras will be up about 35% over 1989 but declined to disclose budget figures.

Kodak spent about $6 million on measured media advertising for cameras during fourth quarter 1989 and $9 million for the year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

NEWS SUMMARY

■ A buying slowdown by consumers in reaction to the Middle East confrontation is becoming the big worry of marketers. 1

■ Eastman Kodak will introduce the Star line of mass-market, low-price 35mm cameras in October with a $7 million media ad campaign. 1

■ An "upfront" market for magazines may emerge this fall, with advertisers offering long-range bulk-buying dollar commitments to multititle publishers. 3

■ Frisbee Flying Dog Treats, shaped like small versions of the disc toy and aerodynamically designed, will be introduced in October by Quaker Oats Co. 3

■ Home video marketers plan to increase ad spending for new releases to stave off slower growth. 3

■ Scali, McCabe, Sloves blamed the loss of Procter & Gamble business on the shop's ties to WPP Group, whose main agencies handle Unilever business. P&G moved Old Spice and Santa Fe brands to Tatham-Laird & Kudner. 4

■ Kellogg and Nabisco settled their legal fight over nutrition claims for shredded wheat but are testing nearly identical shredded wheat products. 6

■ Choice Hotels International, formerly Quality Inns International, is using daredevil Evel Knievel as its latest celebrity to climb out of a suitcase in its ads. 16

■ Creative talent is in short supply as several leading ad agencies seek to fill key creative posts. 37

■ Ed McCabe, creative partner at Beber, Silverstein, McCabe & Partners, said a recession brings out the best in talented adpeople. 38

■ Military recruitment ad spending is expected to face a cut of 10% or more in fiscal 1991 despite the deployment of forces in the Middle East. 39

■ NutraSweet Co.'s introduction of Simple Pleasures frozen dessert with Simplesse fat substitute has been hampered by production problems and an ad delay. 40

■ Magazine circulation figures from the Audit Bureau of Circulations showed only 20 of the 55 leading titles with increases over last year's first half. 42

■ Most Middle East ad agencies, with the exception of those in Kuwait, are doing business as usual despite the tense political and military situation. 59

■ Eastern Europe continues to attract U.S. agencies. Young & Rubicam purchased majority interest in a Prague shop, and Bozell has signed agreements with agencies in Budapest and Warsaw. 61

■ Pepsi-Cola Co. named David Novak exec VP-marketing; he was with PepsiCo's Pizza Hut unit. 65

■ Publisher Mortimer Zuckerman said he's had preliminary discussions about acquiring Memories. 66

McCaffrey deal set

Saatchi decides to finance buyback

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s agreement last week to finance the long-delayed sale of McCaffrey & McCall could set a benchmark for other units interested in buying themselves back from the London-based holding company.

"I'm sure people at all the Saatchi agencies are looking to see how much [McCaffrey] paid," said an executive at a Saatchi agency. "They'll all want at least as good a deal."

This executive speculated that Saatchi preferred to finance the buyback itself rather than reduce the price for the $303 million shop even further.

When negotiations began early last year, Saatchi wanted as much as $40 million. Last November, Saatchi reached an agreement in principle to sell the agency for $20 million to $25 million.

Under last week's agreement, Saatchi will sell the agency to management for less than $20 million, a source close to the deal said. McCaffrey management will pay Saatchi about $2 million now and will pay interest on notes for the balance for several years, the source said.

The deal provides cash-strapped Saatchi with some money now, and a stream of income for the next few years.

Saatchi decided to finance the purchase itself because McCaffrey management couldn't get favorable financing from banks. Financial institutions have become more restrictive in their loans, especially for service businesses such as ad agencies.

Although Saatchi decided to sell the agency for a depressed price and receive payments for an extended period, analysts weren't disappointed.

"Getting rid of non-strategic pieces, where possible, for reasonable prices is good, period," said Greg Ostroff, analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co.

Saatchi Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus has also sold off the company's consulting units at prices mostly below the price Saatchi originally paid for them.

There have been reports that other parts of the company's communications division are up for sale, to third parties or management. But Mr. Louis-Dreyfus has consistently denied the reports.

With its ownership uncertain, McCaffrey—led by Chairman-CEO Robert Cherins—has found competing for new business difficult. The agency has been revamping management, including the hiring last September of John Doig from Ogilvy & Mather as deputy chairman-chief creative officer.

McCaffrey last week also joined the ranks of agencies adopting the British account planning system by hiring Lauren Press as director of strategic planning, from VP-planning director at O&M.

McDonell exits 'Smart'

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Editor in Chief Terry McDonell's departure from Smart casts a shadow of doubt over the fledgling men's magazine, just weeks after it got an infusion of much-needed cash.

Mr. McDonell, 46, was named editor in chief of Hearst Corp.'s Esquire last week. He succeeds Lee Eisenberg, 44, who's moving to London as editor in chief of a U.K. edition of Esquire, scheduled to be launched next March.

"From what I know about Smart, [Mr. McDonell] was the magazine," said Roberta Garfinkle, VP-director of print media at McCann-Erickson Worldwide. "Whether there's a potential to have a magazine without him, I don't know."

Majority owner New American Magazine Co. is "a troubled magazine company and there seems to be a glut of men's magazines right now, so I think there would be difficulties without him," she said.

"Terry conceived of Smart; his stamp was on every article," said Valerie Green, former marketing director at the magazine and now VP-advertising sales and marketing at Spin. "I can't see Smart without Terry there."

T. McDonell

Mr. McDonell founded Smart, positioned against Esquire, in 1988. He sold a majority stake in the magazine to Owen Lipstein, chairman of New American, the following year. Mr. Lipstein sold 50% of his magazine company, including Smart, to Tokyo-based Japanese Independent Communication Co. earlier this month (AA, Aug. 13).

Last week, Mr. Lipstein said he will buy Mr. McDonell's stake in the magazine for an undisclosed amount.

Smart has won critical praise since its launch, but Mr. Lipstein's financial troubles hurt the magazine's reputation with advertisers.

Tension between Messrs. McDonell and Lipstein became apparent earlier this year during their efforts to find an investor for Smart (AA, June 11).

Smart, published 10 times yearly, claims a rate base of 250,000, but its circulation isn't audited.

Both Messrs. Lipstein and McDonell described their parting as "amicable" and both downplayed speculation that Smart can't survive without Mr. McDonell.

"I'm not going to pretend it's good, but we have major financing behind the magazine and we have an editor in mind who we think is terrific," Mr. Lipstein said. He declined to comment further on Mr. McDonell's successor.

Smart's loss could be Esquire's gain. Mr. McDonell's 20-plus years in the magazine business have included stints as founding editor of Outside, managing editor of Rolling Stone and assistant managing editor at Newsweek.

Esquire, a monthly, has a rate base of 700,000. □

PM adds to smaller shops

By Judann Dagnoli

NEW YORK—Philip Morris USA has given new, unspecified cigarette assignments to three small-to-midsize agencies in an attempt to develop more creative advertising.

Philip Morris has assigned three new-product projects to TBWA; two projects to Omon, at least one of which is a new product; and is "very close to an agreement" with Romann & Tannenholz for at least one other project, a Philip Morris source said.

Both TBWA and Omon already handle undisclosed projects on assignments for Philip Morris, awarded earlier this year when the company unexpectedly opened it doors to smaller agencies (AA, Feb. 19).

Philip Morris traditionally relies on Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, and New York agencies Backer Spielvogel Bates and Wells, Rich, Greene for the bulk of its $300 million-plus in cigarette advertising.

The new assignments are said to be in response to the company's frustration over a lack of breakthrough creative ideas.

In addition, the tobacco giant has asked Burnett to help WRG in executing a long-delayed campaign for the $60 million Benson & Hedges account.

The company views Burnett almost as its "house agency," the Philip Morris source said, adding that the request "is not in the nature of an [account] shift."

The move marks the second time Philip Morris has asked other agencies to pitch in on Benson & Hedges. Last October, WRG managed to hold onto the business after the company conducted an unofficial review.

The source said Philip Morris "is committed to giving [WRG]

Newsstand woes grease magazine skid

By Ira Teinowitz

Six of the nation's top 55 magazines failed to make their circulation guarantees for the first half of the year.

Reports to the Audit Bureau of Circulations showed Family Circle, National Enquirer, First for Women, Scholastic, Penthouse and Globe all missed their marks.

In fact, only 20 of the top 55 magazines saw circulation increases from a year earlier.

Among the biggest losers: National Geographic Magazine, down 6%; Sports Illustrated, down 7%; Playboy, down 6.1%; People, down 5.1%; First for Women, down 25%; and Penthouse, down 18.6%.

Conversely, membership titles were some of the biggest winners.

The nation's largest magazine, the American Association of Retired Persons' Modern Maturity, rose 10.4%; the National Education Association's NEA Today gained 9%; and the American Automobile Association's Home & Away rose 6%.

Among the few gainers in general interest magazines: Woman's Day, up 4.8%; Money, up 7.9%; 1,001 Home Ideas up 6%; and Soap Opera Digest, up 15.2%.

Some industry officials blamed newsstand sales, though several magazines also suffered subscription declines. They said the growth in the number of magazines available may have cannibalized some existing titles.

"We don't see a major trend downward on the subscription side, but single-copy sales are primarily an impulse purchase and people seem to be watching their purse strings," said Bob Cohn, senior VP-circulation marketing for the Magazine Publishers of America. "There is also . . . a lot of product and clutter on the newsstand, and some magazines are finding it difficult to get as much display."

Several publishers, however, said there were other factors.

Time, with a 3.1% circulation drop, said it lowered its rate base to 4 million from 4.3 million last year to cut back unprofitable circulation. The magazine raised its subscription rate, dropped direct marketing to less desirable circulation areas, cut off direct response TV and raised the newsstand price to $2.50 from $2.

"We expected to be down 300,000," said Ellen Fairbanks, consumer marketing director. "It didn't happen. Advertisers got a bigger bonus. They won't see a bonus like that again."

Penthouse blamed the economy and also cited debt woes at convenience stores, where most of its single copies are sold. As of June 1, the title's rate base dropped 12.5% to 2 million.

Suppliers reduced shipments to Circle K Corp. and Southland Corp.'s 7-Eleven chains due to financial troubles, said Marcia Orovitz, VP-newsstand circulation for Penthouse parent General Media Co.

Sports Illustrated said its 1990 loss was partially attributable to an unusual 1989.

David Mercado, consumer marketing financial manager, said 1989's figures included the title's 25th anniversary swimsuit issue, which sold nearly 2.5 million single copies (vs. the usual 168,263).

As expected (AA, Aug. 13), First for Women was 30.9% below the title's 4 million rate base as of the beginning of the year. First lowered its rate base 25% to 3 million on April 23 and is pledging to make the base in the second half of the year or give advertisers 200% of any needed make-goods.

Penthouse, which had a 2.25 million rate base before dropping it to 2 million June 1, fell 24.4% below the higher base. The other titles that fell below their bases: Family Circle, 1.7% under its 5.25 million base; National Enquirer 2% below its 4.1 million base; Scholastic 8.9% below its 2,975,000 base; and the Globe 12.3% below its 1.5 million base.

Business Publications Audit of Circulation titles also reported last week but with somewhat more favorable results that may reflect the group's inclusion of unpaid as well as paid circulation. □

THE TOP 200 BRANDS

Automobiles and food pace category spending in Ad Age look at first-quarter 1990 spending

AT&T outspends other big brands

By R. Craig Endicott

If Bo can do it better, so can Ma Bell.

AT&T Co. not only outspent all other brands in major media during the first quarter of 1990 but used the omnipresent Bo Jackson to do it.

Ad spending by the telecommunication giant rose to $103.8 million, up 25.8% from the previous year's first quarter, as it replaced McDonald's Corp. as No. 1.

McDonald's restaurant spending dipped 1.7% to $92.8 million as it slipped to third behind Kellogg brands at $93.6 million, up 4.5%.

Media totals for Advertising Age's quarterly report on the nation's top 200 brands are derived from nine-media composites provided by LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service. They accounted for $3.6 billion in advertising, up 15.6%, while advertising for all other brands (39,000) tracked by LNA dropped 3.6%.

Mr. Jackson, pressed into pushing discount calling for AT&T's "Reach Out America" network TV campaign that broke in late February, was only one of the reasons the AT&T "brand" took off.

AT&T also apologized to the nation with copious ads following its mid-January breakdown in national phone service; it introduced the Universal card in late March on the Academy Awards telecast; it shot comparative salvos at its rivals in an "Aren't you glad you never left?" campaign.

In addition, AT&T set the stage for heavy spending by all long-distance carriers. Earlier this month, US Sprint began challenging AT&T's "Get it in writing" line, saying it will put its customer proposals in writing.

In the first quarter, media spending by No. 57 US Sprint leaped 57.5% to $19.7 million, and No. 73 MCI Communications Corp.'s spending rose 18.5% to $15.7 million. The phone category rose 25.9% to $148.1 million.

Automobiles, with ad volume at $792.1 million, emerged as the spending king among the top 200's 31 categories. Food placed a distant second with $419.1 million.

But there's caution in Motor City, as seen by spending totals of General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp. Their brand lines totaled $409 million, down 4.4%. That left overall 8.9% auto category growth solely with the imports, whose outlays of $383 million were up 31.6%.

Auto category spending levels brought healthy growth to network TV, the dominant medium among the 200 at $1.64 billion, up 26.4%. The networks accounted for 45% of all top 200 ad volume.

But autos, accounting for 34% of all top 200 spending, weren't as good to spot TV, magazines and newspapers—the next three media in total ad volume, respectively.

Autos, the lead category in spot TV and magazines, dropped 8.4% and 10%, respectively, in dollar volume as total spending by the 200 rose 8.1% in spot and dipped a faint 0.6% in magazines. Fourth largest category in newspapers among the 200, autos dropped 7.5% in ad volume. Total 200 spending in the medium slipped 0.5%.

Automotive ad largess went to high-growth media, syndicated TV and cable TV. Syndication rose 72.8% to $197.9 million as the auto category increased 183.9% to $24.7 million. Cable TV rose 33.7% to $109.9 million as auto spending led all other categories with a 28% boost to $18.7 million.

Spending by the 23 food brands on the chart rose 16.7%, with virtually all this dollar growth going to broadcast: Food ad volume hit $242.8 million on network, up 23.2%; $61.8 million on spot, up 26%; and $59.7 million in syndication, up 28.4%.

Restaurants, third largest category at $268.7 million for 10 brands, rose 12.4%, most of its growth in spot TV and syndication. Volume leader network TV's food revenue declined 0.5%, but the nets still accounted for half the dollar volume.

The retail non-food category, fourth largest in 200 ad volume, dictated the fortunes of national newspaper advertising. While the category showed only a 1.5% gain to $257.4 million, retail non-food advertising in newspapers declined 3.6% to $138.4 million, representing 53.7% of all newspaper spending by the 200.

Procter & Gamble Co. and Philip Morris Cos. hold the most brand positions on the list, each claiming 10. P&G's $132 million total for a wide range of brands placed it third behind No. 1 General Motors Corp.'s $211 million from seven brands and Philip Morris Cos.' $206.8 million.

As a brand "parent," P&G moved up from sixth in 1989 as GM and Philip Morris retained their positions.

Among the top 25 brands, the biggest quarterly leaps were by No. 14 Chrysler cars, up from No. 24 a year ago based on its 49.2% advertising boost to $42.4 million. This was largely from new spending on Chrysler New Yorker Fifth Avenue and a hike of $11.6 million on Chrysler passenger cars overall.

Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol line rose to 19th from 27th, based largely on a $6 million hike on Tylenol Extra Strength Caplets and $3 million on Tylenol Cold Medication. Tylenol advanced 31.2% to $34.4 million.

Miller beers, collectively, rose to No. 22 from No. 48 a year ago thanks to new spending behind Miller Genuine Draft ($9 million) vs. a negligible amount in 1989, and Miller Lite ($6 million more). The total Miller brand ad volume of $31.5 million was up 64.8%.

The biggest spending exodus from the top 25 was Ford Motor Co.'s Mercury, now No. 119 with ad volume at $10.6 million, a 62.8% plunge. In '89, it was No. 23.

Philip Morris' Post cereals dropped 26.4% in spending to $25.3 million, falling to No. 35 vs. No. 18 last year.

Ad volume for Marlboro cigarettes, a Philip Morris brand, fell 27.4% to $21 million, dropping it to No. 48 from No. 22 a year ago.

The top 200, accounting for 40.5% of ad spending tracked by LNA for the 39,000 brands it monitored in the quarter, represented the bulk of advertising in network, spot, syndicated and cable TV, and Sunday magazines—all media that show more dramatic growth in the 200 universe than the 39,000. □

What constitutes a brand: Part 2

A "brand" is every product or service marketed under the same name.

For Ad Age's first-quarter brand rankings, the definition of a brand has been expanded to include ad expenditures for all products and services using the same name regardless of Publishers Information Bureau classification.

In the previous report on total 1989 spending by the top 200 brands (AA, May 21), brand totals could come from only one class.

For example, Kraft's cheeses, prepared dinners and salad dressings, fitting in several subclasses, all have been folded into a total to put Kraft foods at No. 10 in the brand ranking. The previous listing separated Kraft products because they were in different subclasses.

This change in methodology shows the power of brand identity, which doesn't necessarily stop at the subclass level.

The definition includes some gray areas. Should the Prudential brand identity extend to Prudential-Bache? For this tabulation, the two are kept separate, mainly because the name and image of the latter are related to financial services; the former name clearly means insurance.

Are Nestle, Nescafe and Nestea one megabrand or three separate brands? We chose three, mainly because Nestle chose to apply hybrid versions of its name in creating brands. □

British promo reign collapses

LONDON—With the failure this month of FKB Group and the takeover earlier this year of KLP Group by Paris-based RSCG Group, the British reign over several top U.S. promotion agencies is coming to an end almost as abruptly as it began.

FKB and KLP arrived on the scene in 1988, gobbling up promotion, direct marketing, graphics and research agencies.

The value of both companies' stock dipped in the wake of lackluster growth and the financial problems of other London-based marketing groups, such as Saatchi & Saatchi Co.

The stock decline made KLP an attractive takeover target, and it was bought by RSCG earlier this year for $54 million (AA, Feb. 5).

FKB was believed to be negotiating an outright acquisition by Carlson Marketing Group, Minneapolis, but industry observers say the deal fell through because Carlson didn't want to shoulder FKB's heavy debt load. Unable to find an interested investor, FKB went into receivership. Carlson then bought a few FKB agencies it wanted; other agencies were sold back to their management. □

Reebok hopes in-store support will pump up sales.

Reebok displays Pump POP

By Gary Levin

Reebok International is playing harder with promotions.

In its largest in-store merchandising effort to date, Reebok hopes to leverage a major part of its new ad campaign with a "pump station" for the Pump shoe line (AA, July 30).

The inflatable shoe line has basketball, tennis, cross-training, aerobics and children's versions. Reebok is spending $1.5 million for in-store support for the TV and print campaign featuring tennis pro Michael Chang and basketball star Dominique Wilkins of the Atlanta Hawks.

Point-of-purchase displays feature a motorized, louvered poster that alternates among photos of Messrs. Chang and Wilkins and an unidentified cross-training weight lifter. A vertical display, fashioned as a gas pump, stocks the Pump lines. The displays will appear in Foot Locker, Lady Foot Locker and J.C. Penney Co. stores among others.

In-store promotions planned for the holiday season include possible sports personality appearances as well as banners and other collateral using the new theme "It's time to play."

Consumers shaken

Houston, shows a cobra labeled "foreign oil" above the headline, "Dangerously unpredictable."

In Minneapolis, a new Metropolitan Transit Commission print ad pictures Iraqi President Saddam Hussein under the headline, "Stop pumping him up."

The ad, from Grant & Palombo, Minneapolis, urges people to use the bus or car pools. Copy, in part, says: "It's about time we showed this guy we don't need his oil."

An Advertising Age industry-by-industry survey indicates advertisers, agencies and the media think the current crisis will greatly affect marketing:

AUTOMOBILES

Political fallout is expected to hit automobile marketing as car sales plummet.

"The industry is in the tank—the whole industry," said Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca, who blamed fear of a recession brought on by the Middle East situation.

Sales of North American-built new cars and trucks during the first 10 days of August plummeted 18.5% compared to the same period in 1989, according to sales figures from manufacturers.

Mr. Iacocca and other top auto executives believe the new crisis will give political impetus to attempts in Congress to mandate higher fuel economy.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

Chrysler and another U.S. automaker, Ford Motor Co., support higher gasoline taxes as an alternative to stricter fuel economy regulations, because they say higher gas prices would provide an incentive for consumers to make fuel economy a higher priority in purchases.

Legislation is pending in both houses of Congress to mandate improved fuel efficiency.

In the short run, domestic companies may need to address consumer perceptions that they still predominantly build gas guzzlers, said Shirley Young, VP-consumer market development at General Motors Corp.

But "Cadillacs today get 24 mpg, which is what subcompacts used to get in the early 1980s," she said.

It's too soon to tell whether there will be a full-scale return to advertising featuring fuel economy ratings.

Chrysler has added a copy line to some of its corporate print ads via Bozell, New York, saying "Chrysler has the highest corporate average fuel economy of any American car company."

Chrysler is considering whether fuel economy should play a more central part in an ad campaign.

Nissan Motor Corp. USA may be the importer best prepared for a gas crunch. This fall, it plans to introduce an all-new Sentra, an entry-level vehicle with the best fuel economy in its fleet.

Toyota Motor Sales USA's new Lexus division has been promoting the fuel efficiency of its flagship LS400 model in print ads since the car was introduced last September. A number of ads from Team One, El Segundo, Calif., claim that "the LS400 is projected to be the only 250-horsepower luxury sedan able to avoid the stigma, as well as the cost, of the U.S. gas guzzler tax."

The U.S. Council for Energy Awareness takes advantage of the crisis to further its agenda. . . .

RESTAURANTS

In the $65 billion quick-service restaurant industry, where nearly half of sales for many top chains come at drive-through windows, an increase in gas prices poses a potentially severe threat.

"We haven't had to boost any prices yet as a result of the oil crisis," said a spokeswoman for Burger King Corp., "and we haven't had reports of traffic declines."

But Burger King and others are watching the numbers for signs of trouble.

"The oil crisis certainly isn't a positive, but right now it's not a major negative," said Ron Paul, president of Technomic Consultants, a restaurant research and consulting company.

"Eating out has become more of a 'nearby' occasion or an 'on the way to another destination' occasion, so there's likely to be less immediate impact," he said.

Rather than drive to restaurants, more consumers might switch to home delivery. But chains that rely on delivery sales, are already feeling the impact of higher gas prices.

"The situation has put some pressure on our costs, but so far it isn't anything that has forced us to take any pricing action," said Mike Raymond, VP-marketing for Domino's Pizza.

One Domino's has already suffered an unexpected side effect. Mr. Raymond said a Domino's franchisee in southern California lost 60 part-time drivers, all U.S. Marines picking up extra money who were shipped out to Saudi Arabia.

"The franchisee took out a classified ad saying, 'World events have forced us to hire more drivers,' " Mr. Raymond said.

RETAILING

Experts say the already-soft retail sales environment may get softer as a result of the crisis.

J.C. Penney Co. is worried after last week reporting a 15% decline in second-quarter earnings, which it attributed to slack consumer demand. Rising gas prices would mean reduced consumer spending power, which would further hurt retailers.

"Looking to the future, one cannot ignore the significant decline in the level of consumer confidence from a year ago," Penney's Chairman William Howell said in a statement. "Adding to the uncertainty of the outlook is the present Mideast crisis and the resulting rising energy prices, which could have a negative effect on consumer spending."

Kurt Barnard, president of Retail Marketing Report, said this couldn't have come at a worse time.

"Back-to-school got off to a sluggish start, and [the oil crisis] is only likely to make it worse," he said. "There's still a possibility that things will improve toward the end of the month, but it doesn't look promising right now."

TRAVEL & TOURISM

Despite higher jet-fuel costs, airlines have temporarily abandoned proposed 5.3% fare hikes to match aggressive discounting by Eastern Airlines and Trans World Airlines.

The skirmish aimed at fall leisure travelers set off an air-fare battle among virtually all major carriers.

Eastern is running ads headlined "Beat the fuel price increase. Lock in fall fares as low as $79." Ogilvy & Mather, New York, is the agency.

TWA is using the headline, "TWA puts a hold on inflation by putting this fall on sale," via Young & Rubicam.

"There will be increased competition for full-fare business travelers. . . . in an environment where corporate travel budgets may be cut back because of a recession," said James O'Donnell, marketing consultant and former Continental Airlines executive.

Surprisingly, cruise ship operators appear to be taking higher fuel prices in stride.

They may respond to higher oil prices by hitting customers with a fuel surcharge, such as the approximately $25 fee tacked on to cruise fares during the oil crisis of the early '70s, said William Kyle, a cruise industry consultant in Woodland Hills, Calif.

At that time, the cruise market didn't sink; it merely flattened out. But a fourfold increase in cruise capacity over the past decade, with more ships on the way, raises the stakes.

Auto travel—either by car, truck or recreational vehicle—accounts for the greatest number of trips 100 miles or more from home, according to the U.S. Travel Data Center, and that's been growing.

"We had seen a stronger auto market the last couple of years in terms of growth and passengers traveling," said Suzanne Cook, the center's executive director.

Although gas prices have jumped, as long as prices stay in a range consumers have seen in the past, their auto travel plans won't change, said Barbara Bauerle, public relations director for the American Automobile Association of Colorado.

"Our surveys show if people are going to travel, they will go ahead with their plans regardless of gas prices," she said. "Even though prices have gone up 12¢ [nationally] since Aug. 1, they're still at 1985 pre-Christmas levels."

But "discretionary purchases and travel are very susceptible to further weaknesses in consumer spending," warned Jim Cammisa, publisher of Travel Industry Indicators, a newsletter.

John Rutherford, director of public relations for the Orlando (Fla.) Convention & Visitor's Bureau, said that "some visitors at the lower end will not be able to make the trip now—they will not be able to afford the extra $50."

Bern Rotman, director of communications for the New York Department of Economic Development, said Middle East events may benefit some during the six-week fall foliage season. Ads will encourage residents to take foliage tours closer to home rather than in New England or neighboring states.

LODGING

Hotel industry officials said they could see few immediate changes coming, though some suggested rising prices could hit them soon.

"We are not frantic, not horrified; but we are concerned," said Ray Lewis, VP-worldwide marketing for Holiday Inns.

He said Holiday Inns will be closely watching gas prices for the next few months with an eye toward evaluating its present mix of business and leisure marketing.

"If there is a full-scale conflict, it would likely result in significantly higher fuel costs, and that could plunge the U.S. and the world into recession," Mr. Lewis said. "If Iraq decides against an invasion [of Saudi Arabia], there is a longer scenario. Gas prices would go higher but not by as much. What will happen depends on how fast they rise and for how long."

Mr. Lewis said a sharp rise would have an immediate effect on leisure travel but a lesser one on business travel.

If there's an economic downturn and gas shortages, Motel 6 expects to see a drop-off in discretionary/leisure travelers but a gain in commercial business travelers.

"The net impact would be even," said Hugh Thrasher, exec VP-marketing and development for Motel 6. "Unfortunately, we would lose some discretionary travelers who can't afford to go see grandmother, but that business would be replaced by the commercial traveler who has to travel but may have to watch expenses even more closely."

MOTION PICTURES

Rising oil prices and gas shortages could increase movie production costs incrementally, but since ticket prices are set by theaters, not the studios, it's unlikely these costs would be passed directly to consumers.

Traditionally, the movie industry has thrived during economic adversity by providing a temporary escape for audiences burdened with financial worries.

But ticket prices have risen in recent years and home video rentals could play a role this time, sources say.

The studios may benefit from people spending vacation time close to home instead of long-distance traveling if airline and gas prices rise significantly.

Variety analyst A.D. Murphy last month revised his summer box office estimate downward, to $1.85 billion for the 15-week summer period, down 9% from 1989's record $2.04 billion summer. But that total would still be the second biggest on record, 9% ahead of 1988.

PACKAGE GOODS

An oil crisis "will have an impact [on food pricing] that's noticeable but not devastating," said Ralph Parlette, agricultural economist with the Food & Drug Administration's economic research service.

Mr. Parlette said the combined costs of processing, delivering and manufacturing food products account for 4.5¢ to 5¢ of every consumer dollar. If oil costs doubled, the rate would rise to 9¢ or 10¢ per consumer dollar going to cover these costs, he said.

As for the major marketers, "We make the kinds of products consumers need through good times and bad," said Procter & Gamble Co. spokeswoman Sydney McHugh.

The nation's soap and detergent marketers appear to be holding the line on price increases, but industry consultant Colin Houston said prices may rise as much as 30% for heavy-duty laundry detergents, light-duty dishwashing liquids and bar soaps.

These products are petrochemical-based and require a high level of energy for production, packaging and transportation, Mr. Houston said.

"Everyone in the industry is uneasy," he said.

Nevertheless, "the overall impact is small," said Bob Murray, corporate communication director for Colgate-Palmolive Co.

Cigarette consumption rises during a recession, said John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities. But should cash become even tighter for consumers, they could change to low-price smokes. He said value-price cigarettes already account for 18% of the tobacco market, up from 11.4% only two years ago.

Nearly one of five adults surveyed (19.4%) said they've already reduced their driving since the Middle East crisis began.

If gas prices stay at the levels they reached in the past two weeks, the determination to cut back on car travel will increase substantially, the survey shows.

GALLUP SURVEY

Amid indications consumers are increasingly pessimistic about the economy and the nation's ability to avoid a recession (see story below), the survey shows how quickly economic reversals can trigger changes in behavior.

Already suffering is non-essential travel for discretionary-spending categories.

The motion picture industry is enjoying robust ticket sales but faces tougher times if gas prices don't decline.

While 12% of those surveyed said they've already cut travel for entertainment, such as going to movies, the theater or sporting events, 38.3% said they expect to cut back in this area over the next few months if gas prices stay high.

The sharpest reduction would come from the entertainment industry's core audience: 46.6% of those ages 18 to 34 said they expect they would cut travel to those destinations.

The $200 billion restaurant industry is at even greater risk.

In last week's poll, 11.3% said they've reduced travel for dining out since the gas price boost. And if prices don't return to their previous levels? Then 42.1% said they would cut travel for that purpose.

Again, expected cutbacks are highest among those ages 18 to 34 (48.3%), the age group on which the restaurant industry most strongly relies for business.

With the summer winding down, the travel and tourism industry enjoyed its heaviest period before the gas crisis hit, and only 8% of the sample said it's reduced vacation travel since the Iraqi invasion.

But if gas prices remain at current levels, the share of respondents expecting to cut back on vacation travel jumped to 39.4%, including at least one-third of all age groups.

Consumers are worried enough by the situation to rethink travel for social outings. Already, 12.4% said they've cut such travel. That more than triples to 42.3% those expecting to cut social travel unless gas prices improve.

Gallup's survey for Ad Age was conducted Aug. 15. A random, national selection of 515 persons ages 18 and older was interviewed by phone. The survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4%. □

Awaiting recession

Consumer pessimism is deepening in the wake of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the resulting oil and gas price increases.

Many consumers see a recession on the horizon, according to the Gallup Organization. Of 1,227 adults polled by phone Aug. 9 to 12, 25% said a recession within the next 12 months is very likely; 40% said it's fairly likely.

Similarly, in a telephone poll of 100 Chicagoans conducted by Leo Shapiro & Associates for Crain's Chicago Business, 81% of those surveyed said recent events, including the Iraqi invasion, the failure of major savings & loans and President Bush's willingness to consider tax increases, make the chances of a recession more likely.

In last week's Gallup poll, 40% of respondents said they're following news of the Middle East very closely and 43% fairly closely. Those numbers are up sharply from a Gallup poll taken Aug. 3 and 4, immediately after the Iraqi invasion, when 18% said they were very closely following the news and 39% fairly closely.

Between those two pollings the average price of a gallon of unleaded gasoline suddenly increased 17.5¢. And consumers said they're being gouged. Nine of 10 consumers (91%) surveyed by Gallup said they believe price increases are the result of oil companies taking advantage of the situation to increase their profits. Only 5% said the increases were the result of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

low-price fax machines and telephone call-forwarding equipment makes working at home now easier for officer employees than it was during the '70s fuel shortage.

But as desirable as "telecommuting" may sound, relatively few workers or companies are prepared to make that leap, cautioned Paul Saffo, a research fellow specializing in information technologies at Institute for the Future, a think tank.

"People aren't going to abandon their cars to their computers in the short term," Mr. Saffo said.

Computer sales could take a hit if businesses and consumers decide to postpone purchases. This could prove troublesome for IBM Corp. and Apple Computer, which are both introducing lower-price machines.

FINANCIAL SERVICES

Financial services companies will feel the pinch of higher fuel prices if corporate profitability suffers.

Cost cutting to meet bottom-line pressures customarily comes right out of the ad budgets of major brokerages and the corporate communications programs of insurance companies.

Bob Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, said that "higher energy costs can work in a lot of ways. While many financial services marketers will suffer from a crimp in corporate profits, you might see some of the companies coming up with new financial products in response to changing investment needs.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

"That might require an intensification of information on those new products, which could mean more advertising."

An executive with one of the nation's largest mutual funds companies said he didn't expect development of many new products.

"We've seen an emphasis in advertising switch to money market funds, and energy and gold funds in the past few days," he said.

"There are already enough products out there to suit investors' needs for a time like this," he said.

American Express Co.'s credit card and travel-related services businesses are sensitive to oil price increases and recessionary trends. But Maureen Bailey, the company's VP-public affairs, said "at this time, the situation has had no impact on our advertising plans."

But if tensions escalate, or the economy falls into a recession, "there will be an effect on our advertising, and we continue to evaluate that situation carefully," she said.

MEDIA

Magazine industry executives agreed on the possible effects of an oil crisis but disagreed how important these might be.

An oil squeeze would be likely to lead to higher ink costs, since ink is an oil byproduct. Such a squeeze also could result in increased distribution costs because of the oil-dependent trucks that deliver magazines to single-copy outlets.

Ink and transportation each represent 5% of publishers' overall manufacturing and distribution costs.

"We don't need any further increases in our costs of goods," said James Guthrie, exec VP-marketing development for the Magazine Publishers of America. "If there is an oil crisis, magazines would have to raise rates to cover these costs."

Mr. Guthrie pointed out that magazines are already facing the likelihood of average 23% increases in second-class postal rates in 1991.

But Reginald Brack, chairman-president-ceo of Time Inc. Magazine Co., said oil and transportation costs "are not gigantic cost centers."

And Thomas Ryder, president of American Express Publishing agreed.

That's "not earth-shattering," he said. "What's of much more concern is the impact on the general economy. If it reduces consumer confidence, it could affect spending, which ultimately has a lot to do with how people advertise."

The MPA's Mr. Guthrie, however, remained confident: "Our feeling at this point is, with multinational support and sanctions on Iraq, it would appear our oil supply can be maintained and none of these scenarios will be played out."

The consensus among network TV executives is it's "too early to tell" what the impacts of the events in the Mideast will be.

But most agency media buyers predict a very soft fourth-quarter "scatter" marketplace, in which advertisers buy remaining available time on a program-by-program basis.

In some years, fourth-quarter scatter sales start as early as mid-August; the current delay might be traced to Mideast concerns.

"You could drive a truck through fourth-quarter in almost every daypart," said one agency media buyer. "Especially hard hit are prime-time and sports, but the networks are negotiable in news, daytime and kids right now, too. You can practically name your price."

Alan Gottesman, media analyst with PaineWebber, noted inflation tends to have a positive effect on advertising. Since it's such a minuscule part of corporate budgets, cost escalations are relatively easily absorbed into the corporate economy.

AD AGENCIES

WPP Group, Saatchi & Saatchi Co. and other U.K. publicly quoted agency stocks continued a decline in value Friday.

WPP's share price fell 22.4% during the previous two weeks; Saatchi's price fell 20.5%; Lowe International, 18.6%; and Aegis Group, the holding company for the French media buying group Carat, 15.3%.

"People's confidence in the stock market has been tested severely by events in the Gulf," said Mark Shepperd, an analyst at London stockbroker UBS Phillips & Drew. "They are particularly worried about highly leveraged companies, and WPP is a very highly leveraged company."

WPP and Saatchi were the hardest hit because of their high level of debt and their big exposure in the U.S., where the dollar is weak and ad spending growth is slowing.

"I think it's a mixture of things —a couple of companies [FKB Group and Yellowhammer] going into receivership, the [sluggish] state of the U.K. advertising market, the depreciating U.S. dollar and concern over [Saatchi's and WPP's] bank debt," said Neil Blackley, an analyst at James Capel & Co.

Warburg Securities said it will today put out a buy recommendation on WPP stock, highlighting the low price and the high earnings-per-share growth of 17% in 1990 and 12% in 1991 that Warburg is forecasting.

"I think it's a fantastic buy right now," said Warburg analyst Lorna Tilbian.

WPP had no comment; Saatchi executives couldn't be reached. □

Iraq ad assault? Shops cry hoax

By Elena Bowes

LONDON—Ad agencies here passed a "taste test" last week and are probably breathing a sigh of relief that they did.

The agencies all refused to take on a big account, allegedly to promote the Iraqi government.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

■ Iraq's invasion of Kuwait raises concern about Christmas buying and fast-food promotions. See Page 38.

Allegedly is right. Several shops suspected—correctly—the "substantial" account, offered by phone and fax to new-business directors at numerous agencies, was a hoax.

After unexpected publicity about the agency search appeared in the Financial Times and the local ad trade press, U.K. humor magazine Punch confessed Aug. 23 to being behind the scheme.

Two free-lance journalists working for Punch approached about a dozen agencies, including Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, Young & Rubicam, J. Walter Thompson Co. and Collett Dickenson Pearce, asking them to create ads for U.K. newspapers giving Iraq's point of view on the Persian Gulf crisis.

The men, calling themselves Stephen Pearce and John Voland, claimed to be British businessmen recently back from Baghdad, where they ran the so-called Pearce Voland media consultancy.

"It was all a hoax," Punch Editor David Thomas said. "We wanted to see how far the agencies would go. We were testing their greed vs. their principles. And I have to say, for whatever reasons, within 24 hours they did all pass the test." He refused to disclose the actual names of the journalists.

Hoaxing is not uncommon in the British press. Every April 1, for instance, newspapers invent news stories, and readers try to guess which are real and which are fake.

Mr. Thomas said Punch planned to prolong the hoax by sending the agencies faxes this week, asking for comment on several creative ideas and saying, "We know you can't take us on, but we'd really respect your views."

Plan for Iraqi advertising in Britain

By Alice Rawsthorn and John Thornhill

A NUMBER of leading London advertising agencies have been approached by a British businessman who says he is preparing an advertising campaign for the Iraqi government.

Mr Stephen Pearce, who claims to be acting as an "intermediary for the Iraqi government ministry in Baghdad",

After articles appeared in the trade press and the Financial Times listing what had been given as the address of the consultancy's London office, TV crews and tabloid newspapers besieged the office, owned by a "friend of a friend" of Mr. Thomas.

Saturn people star in first campaign

By Raymond Serafin and Patricia Strnad

General Motors Corp.'s Saturn subsidiary is planning to break in mid-September a pre-launch campaign that will profile employees, dealers and others connected with Saturn's operation.

This is the first clear sign of how GM is going to advertise its long-awaited "import fighter," which promises to be the biggest new-product launch of the year.

GM is expected to spend $100 million through Saturn's rollout period to the end of 1991, via Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco.

The outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East and subsequent concerns about oil supplies have also drawn attention to Saturn as a new fuel-efficient small car.

The testimonial-like advertising will run on TV and in print. Product-specific advertising will follow, say Saturn dealers familiar with aspects of ad launch plans.

Officials at GM's Saturn Corp. and Riney declined to discuss the campaign.

The TV effort is expected to include "character studies" of people who moved to Spring Hill, Tenn., to start up Saturn's manufacturing facility there, said one source who asked not to be identified. The stories are told not only from the employees' point of view but also that of their families and even a dog, the source said.

Saturn is expected to use the tagline, "A different kind of company. A different kind of

P&G print buys to Saatchi

Procter & Gamble Co. consolidated its $110 million in magazine buying at Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, giving the package-goods giant added clout with publishers.

Saatchi, which already handled the bulk of magazine buying responsibilities for P&G, picked up an estimated $36 million in additional billings from Leo Burnett Co. and Tatham-Laird & Kudner, both Chicago.

Burnett was P&G's agency of record for teen, beauty and fashion magazines; Tatham-Laird had handled buying for men's magazines.

Before the switch, Saatchi had handled buying for general interest and women's service magazines, where P&G spends the biggest chunk of its money. Grey Advertising, New York, retains buying responsibilities for waiting-room media, such as Whittle Communications' Special Reports.

Kellogg sues Iowa

DES MOINES, Iowa—Kellogg on Friday sued Iowa Attorney General Thomas J. Miller in a dispute over the power to regulate advertising. The U.S. District Court suit asked that Mr. Miller be restrained from acting against ads for Kellogg's Bran Flakes, Frosted Flakes and Special K cereals. Kellogg alleges any legal action by the attorney general would be unconstitutional and in violation of federal statutes governing interstate commerce, advertising and food labeling practices. Kellogg and eight attorneys general for two years have been discussing concerns about statements made in various ads for the cereals. "We have felt that their actions were groundless and politically motivated, and the result of a power struggle between the federal and state governments. We refuse to be the pawns in this," said Kellogg Senior VP-Corporate Affairs Joseph Stewart. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles all three cereals. Mr. Miller's office said it will file a response within the next several weeks.

Hoult out at RJR

Search for new marketing exec begins

By Judann Dagnoli

R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s top marketing official resigned abruptly last week, and the company began an outside search for a successor.

Exec VP-Marketing Peter Hoult, 46, declined comment Friday, but he had differences with RJR Chairman-CEO James Johnston, an agency source said.

A company source said the post apparently will be expanded to include sales responsibilities. Senior VP-Marketing David Iauco, 39, will temporarily succeed Mr. Hoult but is considered too young to take the post permanently, sources say. Before taking his current job in August 1989, Mr. Iauco was senior VP at RJR Tobacco Development Co. and worked on the failed Premier "smokeless cigarette."

Mr. Hoult is said to have had close ties with ousted RJR Chairman-President-CEO Edward Horrigan. Mr. Hoult was in the international division for all but two of his 17 years with Reynolds; while in the international division, he reported to Mr. Horrigan.

Analysts and competitors say the rift between Messrs. Hoult and Johnston may have erupted over trade loading. After his appointment last year, Mr. Johnston halted the longtime practice of sending excess cigarette shipments to wholesalers, thereby artificially inflating market share.

As a result, RJR's 1989 share of cigarette volume was 28.6%, down from 31.8% in 1988, while rival Philip Morris USA's share increased to 41.9% from 39.3%, reported Wheat, First Securities analyst John C. Maxwell Jr.

But another agency source said Mr. Hoult was dissatisfied because a promised top corporate slot never materialized.

"When [Mr. Hoult] came from the North American division [in 1988], he had the clear understanding he would be running something within two to five years," the source said. "But he saw the handwriting on the wall and knew it would be a longer haul then he thought. Hoult is not interested in the No. 2 position."

Under Mr. Hoult, RJR developed a number of highly targeted and innovative but controversial cigarette products such as a cigarette for black consumers called Uptown. Other products included Dakota, initially said to be aimed at young women, and a Canadian cigarette called Tempo, described by a competitive source as "for punk rockers."

Uptown was pulled last February before reaching its Philadelphia test market after protests by health officials and religious leaders. At the time, Mr. Hoult said RJR's "intentions in test-marketing Uptown have been misconstrued and misrepresented by the anti-smoking lobby."

An unofficial marketing plan for Dakota, disavowed by RJR, said the cigarette would target "virile females." The brand is now testing in Nashville, Tenn., and Houston as a cigarette for men and women. In a statement last February, Mr. Hoult defended Dakota as "an effort to regain market share lost over the past several years to our competitors."

In December 1988, he oversaw the testing of Vantage Excel 100s, a cigarette that emits less smoke. At the time, he said the product "should relieve some of the uneasiness smokers feel in situations where some people might find cigarette smoke offensive." The product is still in test.

British-born Mr. Hoult joined RJR in 1972 as international market research manager in Geneva and by 1987 had worked his way up to president-ceo of RJR Macdonald, the company's Canadian tobacco subsidiary. He joined the domestic unit in 1988. □

GM to roll credit card

By Raymond Serafin and Kate Fitzgerald

General Motors Corp. is expected to launch a major credit card before yearend, but its timing couldn't be worse, credit card industry executives said.

GM will need to unveil a truly innovative card because it will be entering an already crowded field, said Steve Szekely, VP-credit cards for Payment Systems, a credit card consultancy.

"The big credit card banks like Citicorp, Chase Manhattan and Bank of America aren't going to roll over and play dead here," Mr. Szekely said.

"GM's potential competitors are on alert, thanks to AT&T's credit card launch," he said, "and now they're working to provide the best card enhancements and marketing programs possible to keep a firm grip on their share of the business."

AT&T Co. introduced its Universal card in March.

The card companies already plan to step up the number of enhancements they offer on their cards and will increase the tempo of their advertising before yearend, Mr. Szekely said.

GM is expected to spend heavily to advertise the card and has consulted with its agencies for a new account that could reach $50 million, GM agency sources say.

Major GM shops are Leo Burnett USA, Chicago; D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich.; Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren; and McCann-Erickson Worldwide, Troy.

The automaker has been mulling a move into credit cards for at least several months (AA, April 2). The card is expected to be a revolving credit Visa and MasterCard offering special features and no initial fee, similar to AT&T's Universal.

"GM has listened to preliminary presentations from [its] four key agencies," said Joseph Frohlinger, editor of Frohlinger's Marketing Strategist.

GM agencies contacted last week denied making presentations, but some said they've prepared background information that could be used in a pitch.

The move by GM into credit cards still could be profitable, some credit industry experts say.

"It's a perfectly natural fit for GM, which is already one of the biggest consumer lending institutions in the U.S. through its auto financing operations," Mr. Szekely said.

Sources in the credit card industry say GM currently is looking for a credit card executive to head the operation.

Agency and other sources say Philip Guarascio, GM's executive director of marketing programs and advertising, is helping develop the credit card program. He wasn't available for comment. □

Yellow Pages may fight tax

By Steven W. Colford

The Yellow Pages Publishers Association is considering a legal challenge to a 7% sales tax imposed in New Jersey on advertising in telephone and other consumer and business directories.

The association believes the tax, part of a $2.8 billion revenue package that New Jersey Gov. James Florio maneuvered into place earlier this year, unfairly singles out one medium for discriminatory tax treatment.

"In my personal opinion, we have no choice but to file suit," said Ed Blackman, exec VP at the association. "But that will be for our board to say. But our attorney believes it is an unconstitutional tax ... that discriminates against directories and small advertisers."

Mr. Blackman said the board would meet "soon" to discuss a plan of action.

The ad industry fears any such narrow tax could presage a broader tax on other media or all advertising, and the New Jersey action is being viewed as a harbinger of things to come. Industry officials anticipate a flurry of ad tax initiatives in financially troubled states next year.

The New Jersey tax will force directory sales people to ask advertisers that may have bought space as

Outdoor ads coming down

By Alison Fahey

Outdoor board companies will relocate more than 2,000 tobacco- or alcohol-related ads by mid-September, in compliance with newly adopted industry guidelines.

The action results from the Outdoor Advertising Association of America's new policy, announced in June, to encourage members to voluntarily ban tobacco- or alcohol-related ads on boards located within 500 feet of primary and secondary schools, established places of worship and hospitals.

The group also has asked members to place decals on those boards to signal that they're "off limits" to tobacco- or alcohol-related ads (AA, Aug. 20).

The 5-by-5-inch decal features a symbol of a child and will be posted on the pole or board structure but won't obscure the ad. They're primarily for industry use but will be visible to passers-by.

The relocation process has taken several months because companies first had to identify off-limit boards, notify the advertisers and then fill the void with other advertisers.

Some companies have also been waiting for long-term contracts with tobacco marketers to expire rather than pulling those ads.

Tylenol expands with cold remedies

By Patricia Winters

Tylenol, the longtime leading brand in the analgesics market, is greatly expanding its presence in the growing cold remedy market with a new line of products.

Johnson & Johnson's McNeil Consumer Products Co. is introducing three new cold products under the Tylenol Cold name, targeting Nyquil, Alka-Seltzer Plus and TheraFlu.

TheraFlu, from Sandoz Pharmaceutical Corp., has virtually created a flu segment since its launch last year.

Warner-Lambert Co. also is going after that brand next month by nationally introducing Medi-Flu, a multisymptom flu reliever in liquid and caplet form. Warner-Lambert is the nation's leading producer of the flu vaccine.

Sources say McNeil will spend about $15 million to support the Tylenol Cold line, but it's unclear whether the products will be advertised together or separately.

Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, is handling.

New Tylenol Cold Nighttime, a cherry-flavor liquid, takes on Procter & Gamble Co.'s Nyquil, the perennial No. 1 with its 12% share of the $815 million cold remedy market. The new product replaces the liquid Tylenol Cold that's been on the market for several years.

To challenge Miles Inc.'s Alka-Seltzer Plus, McNeil is rolling out Tylenol Cold in an effervescent tablet. Alka-Seltzer Plus, the No. 2 seller, holds a 9% share of the cold remedy market.

McNeil will tackle TheraFlu, a lemon-flavor powder, with Tylenol Cold & Flu, also a lemon-flavor powder to be mixed with hot water.

Going up against Tylenol will be Warner-Lambert's new Medi-Flu.

All the products are now being shipped to stores, a McNeil spokesman said.

Magazine rates to rise

Likely postal increase spurs hikes of 6% to 9%

By Scott Donaton

Magazine publishers, faced with shrinking ad budgets on one side and rising production and distribution costs on the other, say they will press for sizable ad rate increases for next year.

Media buyers and magazine executives say they expect ad rates to rise 6% to 9%. Some expect increases of as much as 10% or 12%.

Such increases are likely to further dampen the ad page outlook for many publications. But publishers say the higher rates are needed, and they're prepared to lose pages.

"I think our increases will be in double digits, around 10%," said Thomas Ryder, president of American Express Publishing Corp., whose titles include Travel & Leisure. "Publishers have to think in those terms. They have to say we're willing to give up some pages to get our prices right."

"The bottom line is [advertiser] budgets are not going to keep pace with what magazines are asking in increases."

D. Claeys Bahrenburg, president of Hearst Magazines, cited a probable postal rate increase and said his titles will likely boost rates an average 10% to 12%.

Petersen Publishing Co., publisher of 'Teen and a variety of men's titles, will raise rates an average 6.5%, said Peter Clancey, senior VP-national advertising director. Mr. Clancey said advertisers are being asked to pick up only part of the tab and that cover price and subscription rate hikes are also planned.

"We realize it's going to be a tough year and nobody likes rate increases, but I think publishers are showing reasonable restraint in passing those costs along to advertisers," he said. "We have to price to protect our bottom line."

Time Warner is considering hikes of 5% to 9% for its magazines, company executives say. It's not known yet whether ad rates at Time specifically will go

Lever's Webb seizes green issues

David F. Webb, president-ceo of Lever Bros., recently announced the company will use 10 million pounds of recycled plastic annually in packaging liquid laundry products such as Wisk, Surf and Snuggle. The company plans to ask consumers to help by recycling plastic bottles.

Advertising Age Senior Reporter Laurie Freeman interviewed Mr. Webb, 60, about Lever's environmental programs and advertising's role.

ONE ON ONE

Advertising Age: What's Lever's overall green strategy?

Mr. Webb: The environment is probably the No. 1 priority in that we have to find some real and fast solutions. Every piece of our business activity is now geared to play a part in that.

AA: How does Wisk Power Scoop, now in test markets, fit into Lever's environmental strategy?

Mr. Webb: It is part of the total strategy because it's a concentrated detergent. And concentration of product is one of the means by which you can achieve a source reduction in both some of the chemical materials and in the packaging materials. . . .

When we planned Wisk Power Scoop, because obviously that's been in the pipeline for some time, that product had to get its grade points on the environment just as it had to in terms of performance and profit-earning capability. . . .

It is more concentrated than any other detergent [in the U.S.]; at the moment, small is beautiful.

AA: Is Lever importing environmental technologies from overseas?

Mr. Webb: Our whole product planning, product strategy, is conceived on a global basis. . . . The world of science knows no boundaries, so you use that science and that technology.

Harley Davidson revs up for retail

By Kate Fitzgerald

Harley-Davidson will open its first free standing apparel outlet next month, riding the growing trend of biker-inspired fashions.

The pilot store in Kansas City, Mo., is the motorcycle marketer's first foray into a retail shopping mall, where it will offer its own branded apparel for men and women under the name MotorClothes.

If successful, Harley plans to franchise stores nationwide next year.

"Harley apparel has been on a roll for two years, and it's growing like crazy. This is more than a fad," said Karen Davidson, general merchandise coordinator.

The company first introduced the MotorClothes line of leather and denim jackets, pants and accessories in its dealerships in 1988, and last year sold 3 million items, Harley said.

Harley Davidson suits the clothes horses among road hogs.

Sales growth for the apparel is now outpacing that for motorcycles at some dealerships, according to Harley, which reports 3 million MotorClothes items were sold last year.

The revival of Harley's motorcycle business in the past few years coincided with increased interest in motorcycling by non-riders and women. That in turn fueled the growth in the accessories division, Ms. Davidson said.

"People are picking up on the made-in-America spirit Harley offers," she said. "The popularity of the Harley brand seems to be tied to a theme of independence and individuality people are attracted to."

A new TV and print campaign for the MotorClothes line breaks next month via Bellwether Communications, Racine, Wis. The campaign includes ads in major magazines and TV commercials in markets served by major Harley dealers.

Carmichael Lynch, Minneapolis, handles advertising for Harley motorcycles. □

Bounty in most unusual places

Unexpected media hard to measure, often startlingly effective

By Scott Hume

Shave the modern way
Fine for the skin
Druggists have it
Burma-Shave

In the fall of 1925, Allan Odell put up a series of four 36-inch-wide signs bearing that jingle along a road leading out of Minneapolis to promote his brushless shaving cream.

His son later recalled advertising professionals said Mr. Odell's idea wouldn't work. But it did.

It helped sell Burma-Shave first in Minneapolis and then nationwide, as the distinctive ad signs sprouted along highways nearly everywhere.

It also helped change advertising.

The assumption behind the Burma-Shave ads was that people puttering along in their Model T Fords would pay as much attention—maybe more—to the road signs as they did to ads in newspapers, magazines and on the radio.

Despite the tremendous growth of those media in the past 65 years—and TV—the assumption behind the Burma-Shave signs still is held by advertisers: Consumers will look at and remember messages conveyed in unexpected environments.

In the past decade, as traditional media have become increasingly cluttered and expensive, the number of alternative or non-traditional ad media has exploded.

In 1989, the 100 largest advertisers spent $19.2 billion on traditional, measured media advertising. Another $14.9 billion was spent on unmeasured advertising.

The unmeasured category includes such "mainstream" vehicles as sales promotion, direct marketing and point of purchase. But it also includes a growing number of unexpected ad environments. Among them:

- A California company offers ad space on Arm Guard, a sleeve drivers can wear to protect their left arm from sunburn.
- Boudreau/Darque will put your ad in the bottom of golf cups with its Ad-in-the-hole.
- Another company, J'atoo, will reproduce corporate logos or ad themes as removable, waterproof tattoos.
- Perhaps the ultimate in unexpected ad environments, public restrooms offer unused space on walls or stall doors.

Not all the new ad opportunities are un-

Whittle rips 'out-of-step' shops

Non-traditional advertising pioneer looks beyond the home

Christopher Whittle is perhaps the man most responsible for the growing acceptance of non-traditional media.

ONE ON ONE

The 43-year-old chairman of Knoxville, Tenn.-based Whittle Communications rattled the publishing world in the mid-1980s by pioneering new forms of print media.

Now, with 40 various media properties and annual revenues of $230 million, Mr. Whittle is turning his attention to TV. His first foray into the medium was Channel One, the controversial TV network for high school classrooms launched in March. This fall, Whittle Communications will launch Special Reports Television, a TV-magazine project for doctors' waiting rooms that will replace the troubled Special Reports magazines.

In a recent interview with Advertising Age reporter Scott Donaton, Mr. Whittle discusses the future of non-traditional media.

Advertising Age: Special Reports Television marks a shift in strategy for Whittle Communications from print to TV. Why the change?

Mr. Whittle: Underneath everything we do is the concept of targeted, high-impact, proprietary media systems, and Special Reports Television is really just a move from a print execution of that to an electronic execution of that.

AA: Why TV?

Mr. Whittle: There is an audience preference toward it by a pretty significant measure. There's definitely an advertiser preference toward it. You look at spending and it's 6-1 electronic vs. print.

Does that mean print is dead? No.

We're still going to be in it and it'll grow, but it will be, as a percent of our company, less.

AA: Special Reports magazines were criticized for, among other things, their audience-measurement techniques. How essential is audience measurement for attracting and keeping advertisers?

Mr. Whittle: Any time you create really new media you have to create new measurement. You have to then try to find a consensus within the community as to the right measurement.

With Special Reports magazines, we never got that consensus. We are attempting on Special Reports Television to do that by basically going with the gold standard of the old system, which is Nielsen.

AA: Your decision to bypass agency media directors and sell Special Reports directly to clients stirred a lot of controversy. Did that decision cost you any business during renewals?

Mr. Whittle: It's been misreported frequently that that was a decision, so let me clarify that. We sell categories. We do not sell brands.

Agency assignments are made by brand, and it is very difficult for agencies to make category decisions because they don't, in many cases, control the whole category.

That means we have to have client interaction. We have tried to do a better job on Special Reports Television of engaging the agencies and I think we have.

AA: Has the climate changed at ad agencies regarding new media?

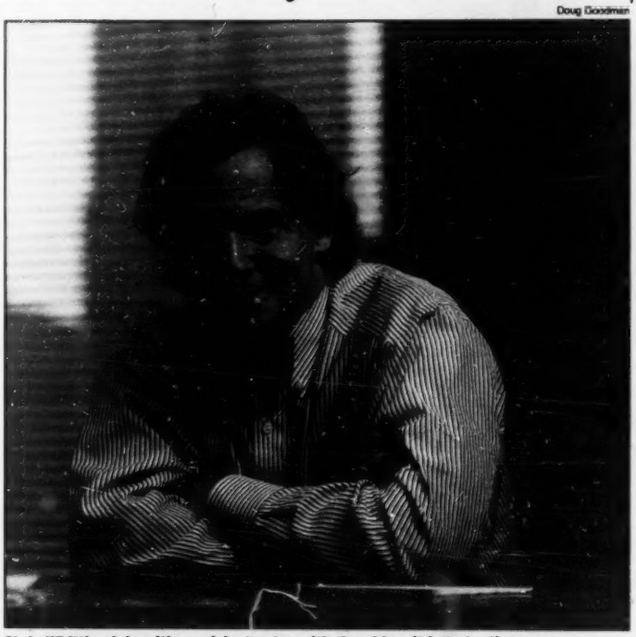
Mr. Whittle: I think there are big differences in agencies and I will group them into two broad categories.

There are agencies out there that have clearly recognized that the old conventional media systems are an aging fleet. . . . They are actively going out and seeking relationships with new media operations and trying to promote those to their clients.

Doug Goodman



Chris Whittle claims it's as risky to stay with the old as it is to try the new.

And there are agencies out there who still believe that alternative media is kind of marginal and that if there's any money left over, maybe they'll play around with it at 2% levels. I think they're out of step with the times and with many of their clients.

AA: You're known for your ability to gain access to senior marketing executives at leading consumer product companies. What's your secret?

Mr. Whittle: There's one reason that a lot of senior marketing executives won't see media people and that is, sometime long ago in their careers, they went, "I've already heard this story and I don't want to hear it again."

There's only one way to achieve access to senior executives and that's with new ideas.

AA: Once you gain access, how do you convince people to take a chance on new media?

Mr. Whittle: There used to be a feeling in American advertising that new was bad and that new meant untried, risky.

I think that is changing and that in fact people now think new is good.

What is the advertising you remember? It tends to be cutting edge. Similarly, why not put your advertising in cutting-edge activity? In fact, it's just as risky to stay with the old as it is to experiment with the new.

AA: Has the debate over Channel One changed your approach?

Mr. Whittle: No. We view criticism as a way to learn and we adapt on the basis of criticism. We're not going to get out of the business of pioneering because we occasionally stir up controversy.

AA: Whittle Communications' focus is on place-based media vehicles. Why?

Mr. Whittle: Home is not what home used to be. . . . Television in 1960 was unconventional media. It was much more advertiser-friendly.

Our view is home-based media has dramatically declined as an environment for sending advertising messages.

Place-based has other interesting advantages. [It] helps you target. If you walk into a gastroenterologist, I know something about you. I know that you have some kind of digestive problem. That's an important piece of data for some marketers.

AA: A growing number of companies have jumped on the new-media bandwagon in recent years. Does that threaten to clutter what were once clutter-free environments?

Mr. Whittle: If you wound up with tons of the same thing in one environment, yes. That's not going to happen. There's not going to be two sets hanging from the ceiling in a classroom. What it really means is that, in place-based media, it's a first-in-wins game.

AA: How will new media fare in the '90s?

Mr. Whittle: I'd say they will probably have triple to quadruple the growth rate of conventional systems.

I don't think there's any question that [TV] networks in the '90s will decline. You couldn't handcuff me into buying that stock.

AA: What can other non-traditional media companies learn from your experience?

Mr. Whittle: I can tell you some things I think new media companies traditionally do wrong. I think they underinvest in talent and that the level of personnel required to develop and execute these concepts is much higher than most people think.

I think our success is directly related to a rather significant investment in a large number of senior players. □

It's tough not to work by the numbers

Agencies grow frustrated by hard-to-quantify ad systems

By Gary Levin

While most ad agencies concede that non-traditional media are becoming more important, few are willing to devote full-time staff to them.

In an informal Advertising Age poll of 70 major U.S. agencies, 63% cite the growing importance of non-traditional media, but only 13% claim some form of "non-traditional media department," usually staffed by a handful of media professionals who spend part of their time on it.

Industry executives believe the reasons are twofold: Agency commissions on alternative media typically aren't big money makers, and many large non-traditional media companies, such as Whittle Communications, frequently deal with clients, not agencies.

As options expand and TV costs soar, however, agencies are being pressured to find more efficient and targeted approaches or risk having clients or media-service companies do it themselves.

Clients are "asking us to evaluate [new media options] and incorporate them into their plans," says Dawn Sibley, exec VP-media director at Ally & Gargano, New York. "But we're doing it, too, because basically we're trying to create a little more impact."

Some agencies have responded to increased client interest in new-media options by creating special departments to evaluate them. They believe such departments give them a competitive edge and help bolster new-business presentations.

Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor late last year created a media-department offshoot known as MediaSPARC (Media Strategic Planning Applications through Research & Creativity). The unit, staffed at least part-time by five employees, screens almost-daily calls from media companies with a new in-store program or wall medium or merchandising idea.

"Initially, we would work as a clearinghouse and [then] latch onto a planning group" for a particularly appropriate client, says Mickey Marks, associate media director, who heads MediaSPARC and supervises media planning for clients Welch's and Okidata.

Mr. Marks believes the unit's existence helps the agency quickly respond to available opportunities and says he can welcome a parade of salesmen who might get lost in other agencies' corridors.

"It's in our benefit to get a recommendation on our client's desk before our competitor gets a recommendation [for the same medium] on their client's desk," Mr. Marks says.

Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising late last year established a "television information and new media" department responsible for analyzing TV and alternative media.

"In an agency that's as large as this one, I think it's a helpful thing to have . . . a standardized place for evaluation," says Erica Gruen, VP-associate director of the department.

"That way, media planners feel someone is looking at the ideas all the time, that there's some comparison made and an estimate of the value of one [new-media vehi-

Execs resort to 'gut feelings'

Despite hunger for data, ad recommendations often guesswork

By Alan Radding

Non-traditional media companies are scrambling to produce almost any numbers they can find —cash register receipts, ski lift tickets, rider counts—to prove audience exposure.

The result, at best, amounts to a good guess, says George Mahrlig, director of media services for Campbell Soup Co.

For some agencies, a good guess is all it takes. In an Advertising Age poll of 70 media directors, 37.1% say they're most likely to recommend a non-traditional media placement "if my gut feeling tells me it will work."

But most advertisers want more than a good guess—and that's where the trouble starts.

About 90% of the poll respondents say measurement and auditing of non-traditional media audiences are unsatisfactory. The same percentage of media directors surveyed also say the burden of improving audience measurement lies with media companies.

"Everybody wants data, but they can't expect the same data that they get from newspapers or magazines," says Robert Kinsey, a consultant at MAK Inc., sales rep for Tribune Co.'s Sports Plus Information Network, a videotex service displayed in 190 airport terminal bars in 25 markets.

MAK collects statistics on the number of patrons in these bars; Belden Associates conducts follow-up studies to determine message recall. Still, the real thrust of MAK's sales pitch is environment, not numbers.

Today's advertisers recognize that the battle for market share is being fought in the supermarket. A captive setting, where more than 66% of all purchase decisions are made.

Now there is a powerful and cost effective alternative media option. MediaOne™...the intrusive advertising display that combines the traditional checkout lane number with a colorful illuminated sales message.

MediaOne is located at the front main aisle (the highest trafficked area of any supermarket), so that shoppers can be repeatedly exposed to your ad message. And for even greater impact MediaOne directs them to the exact aisle where your product is displayed.

Does it work? In independent client research studies, MediaOne significantly increased sales of the items featured. No wonder chains representing over 8,000 supermarkets have agreed to install the MediaOne checkout displays.

Saatchi has helped put a commercial for General Mills' Cheerios onto a videocassette movie and involved Toyota Motor Sales USA's Lexus division as a public TV sponsor.

DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, in January named Wes Dubin, director of national broadcast, to monitor new nonprint vehicles.

"A lot of [alternative media evaluation] is third priority for everybody, so you never get to them," says Michael White, exec VP-media director. "We need somebody who can make it a priority."

Mr. White says keeping up with an ever-growing list of alternative media isn't easy. "It's somewhat difficult but absolutely mandatory."

Nevertheless, many media executives say a separate evaluation department is unnecessary.

"I send [a proposal] over to someone [in a media planning group] who I think has a specific client interest," says Richard Kostyra, exec VP-media services at J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. "They work with the research department in putting together the pros and cons."

least they know we have drinkers," Mr. Kinsey says.

So far, Mr. Kinsey has convinced Seagram Co. and Schenley Industries to test the fledgling network, launched in June. He argues his case to advertisers in terms of point-of-purchase displays in the bar rather than mass-media exposure.

Estimates using whatever is at hand, however, can only take a medium so far.

"It is very difficult to sell a new medium without some kind of audience information," says Helen Giles, VP-out-of-home media at Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich.

Ultimately, agencies and advertisers want more reliable, consistent information that can be independently verified.

"We feel more comfortable when [the Traffic Audit Bureau for Media Measurement] or someone else is there," Mr. Mahrlig says. "It assures us of a reasonable level of accountability."

Following its merger earlier this year with the Out of Home Measurement Bureau, TAB has become the catch-all for non-traditional media auditing, organizing a separate division for just that purpose.

Since then, TAB has received about a dozen inquiries concerning audits for non-traditional media, with four being actively pursued, TAB President Ken Sammon reports. They include in-store companies Actmedia and Adgraphics, vendor of the Shoppers Video network; Coast United, a bench ad company; and SkiView USA.

SkiView, which sells ads on ski lift towers at 190 ski resorts, gets recall numbers from Simmons Marketing Research Bureau. It decided to pursue a TAB audit at the urging of agencies and advertisers.

"I told them: 'Do yourself a favor; go to TAB and get a good third-party audit. That makes everybody feel that much more comfortable,' " recalls Robert Flood, senior VP-director of out-of-home media at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, and a member of TAB's Audit Development Council.

TAB is developing methodology to guide such audits. But arriving at methods acceptable to agencies and media alike is troublesome, says Helene Goldfine, senior VP-marketing at Transportation Displays Inc., which sells transit ads and several non-traditional media, such as ads on supermarket clocks.

Some media companies question the need for extensive research. "The advertiser knows where the product sells: He doesn't need demographics," Mr. Kinsey says. □ the planning group for Nestle or Eastman Kodak Co. or Miller Brewing Co. With a proposal for a new grocery or drugstore medium, media planners for Kraft USA or Warner-Lambert Co. might get the call.

Mr. Kostyra believes agency economics—low commissions and general belt-tightening—make it difficult to justify a separate screening position.

Even if shops do have one, Mr. Kostyra says, "that person is really doing a very general analysis, and with so many [media], it's hard to get at them."

A separate department "doesn't make a great deal of practical sense," says Marcella Rosen, exec VP-managing director of media services at N W Ayer. "I wouldn't put people on staff in this day of trimmer agencies just to evaluate [non-traditional media options]."

Ms. Rosen and top media executives in each of Ayer's offices regularly evaluate and pass along new media ideas that seem most relevant to specific clients.

Instead of being a benefit, Ms. Rosen sees a separate unit as a potential harm because it "absolves everyone else of dealing with . . . new ideas. I don't want that to happen. Everybody is supposed to be alert." □

Non-traditional media vendors' battle for a presence in the grocery store rivals food marketers' fight for shelf facings.

Getting in the retailer's door is "a hard sell," says Bob Polansky, president-ceo of In-Store Advertising, which places electronic signs over supermarket aisles. "It's a conservative industry and [retailers are] reluctant to try new things."

Not only was the process "like shoveling sand against the tide," says another media executive, but retailers demanded a lot before they would consider adding his medium to the mix. "Since we obviously couldn't move ahead without them, we ended up giving them a little more than we had originally intended to," he says.

Contracts between retailers and media companies generally run for three to five years and grant the media company category exclusivity, sparking a race among media companies to be the first in the door at grocery chains.

"The first guy there [with a specific media system] gets all the marbles," Mr. Polansky says.

But as more media companies enter the fray, retailers worry in-store media clutter will scare off loyal patrons.

"There is always a concern that you don't try to put too much advertising in the store," says Ann Maddox, a spokeswoman for Kroger Co. supermarkets. "Everything's taken into consideration, you weigh everything on the table."

Kroger features several different media in its stores in different regions, including Heritage Media Corp.'s POP Radio, In-Store Advertising's electronic signs and Catalina Marketing Corp.'s electronic couponing programs at checkout.

"As more new businesses come around, the retailers are starting to say when [enough] is enough," says Wayne LoCurto, president-ceo of Actmedia, the leading in-store marketing company.

"[Retailers] are definitely concerned about ad clutter," says George Off, exec VP and founder of Catalina.

> "The first guy into the grocery store with a specific media system gets all the marbles."

The simpler the program, he says, the better a vendor's shot at getting the retailer to participate. "If there's work in it for the retailer, they will take a hard look at it."

But retailers aren't without incentives. Typically they receive a guaranteed percentage—sometimes as much as 25%—of ad revenue generated by the medium, or a flat monthly fee, whichever is larger.

For large retail chains such as Kroger, which operates 1,234 supermarkets in 24 states, that could result in some $1 million in added revenues, industry executives say. This revenue-generating potential doesn't go unnoticed in an industry that operates on a tight profit margin.

"The money was definitely a consideration," says a spokesman for a medium-size supermarket chain. "It was tempting, but if we get complaints from consumers, we'd pull the plug on it," he says, referring to a video-based medium currently testing in some of its stores.

But once in-store programs succeed, retailers get hooked on the added revenue, media executives say.

"I know that ad revenue from our system is in [some of our retailers'] budgets for the next several years," says a media executive who asked not to be identified. "They're counting on [the money]."

Another draw is free space or time on in-store media for retailers to promote house brands, chainwide promotions or events. In-Store Advertising gives its retail partners as much as 20% of airtime on electronic signs each month.

Retailers also can have a voice in a medium's final application or form. For instance, In-Store Advertising redesigned its signs to conform to one retailer's specifications.

"We found that no matter how much money we offered the retailers, if the product didn't fit the store decor, they wouldn't take it," Mr. Polansky says.

New in-store media companies also must convince retailers they're in the business for the long haul.

"Retailers have seen so many media companies with innovative ideas end up in a graveyard because they couldn't execute the programs or didn't have enough [financial] backing," says one executive currently trying to sell retailers on his in-store medium. "They were nervous that we were a fly-by-night organization. It took quite some time to convince them otherwise."

But doing so is only the beginning, says one media executive.

"Convincing marketers and agencies [to buy ad space] is no piece of cake either." □

Execs muse over boundless ad possibilities

By Kathy Martin

With network TV audiences eroding and niche marketing all the rage, ad messages are popping up in the most unexpected places—from sidewalks and high-rise elevators to video screens at grocery checkouts and gas pumps. Not even urinals are exempt from advertising.

But are there any unexploited environments left? Advertising Age asked agency media directors to pinpoint the next hot media prospects: Where can advertisers boldly go where no ads have gone before?

Thinking expansively: The Gateway Arch in St. Louis, suggests Robert Flood, director of out-of-home media at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles. It's a perfect spot for banner ads.

Casino slot machines in Las Vegas might also be an opportunity, he says.

"I suppose you could come up with three boxes of Tide or something."

He would also put ads on chairbacks of commuter trains, on stairway risers in transit stations and even on subway tokens.

"I guess advertising, as a rule of thumb, is probably legitimate or acceptable wherever there is commerce," Mr. Flood says.

"What better place to sell pet food than the vet's office or bodybuilding equipment than health clubs?

"It just makes sense."

Double duty: How about using government mailings to get the word out about new legislation and a special on McDonald's Big Macs at the same time, says Alan Johnson, director of media services at Mullen Advertising, Wenham, Mass.

"We spend millions giving our legislators the opportunity to mail stuff to us," he says. "Why shouldn't the government make a little of that money back for us and cut the budget deficit?"

He also suggests mini-ads on postage stamps, or maybe space shuttle sponsorships.

"The shuttle could be painted with the corporate logo, with the sponsor IDs on the astronauts' uniforms," he says.

Fore-get it: Some media directors believe non-traditional media have gone too far. "I guess I'm a Former agency executive Clark Kokich was just looking for a more entrepreneurial job.

But the new VP-marketing and advertising for Sight & Sound Entertainment, Seattle, may have gotten more than he bargained for.

Sight & Sound this fall will launch an in-store video ad vehicle in 700 Sears, Roebuck & Co. stores, marking the first time Sears has ever carried paid advertising inside its outlets.

The venture is full of uncertainties and challenges, including the fact that ad sales so far are painfully slow, Mr. Kokich says.

"We'll go on the air with about one-third of our inventory sold, but we estimate by the end of the year, 60% of our available space will be sold," he says.

Most recently director of client services at Borders, Perrin & Norrander, Seattle, 38-year-old Mr. Kokich took the job at Sight & Sound in May after 12 years in the agency business, which included nine years in various account management and new-business posts at Cole & Weber.

"There are only limited opportunities to break ground at agencies, and I wanted to try something different, something that was highly creative and challenging," he says.

"You don't just make a phone call and explain the deal. It's a lot of back and forth and a lot of negotiation until the client feels sure of what they're doing. It takes patience," he says.

Clark Kokich

But that's something Mr. Kokich has in limited supply.

"I'm sure this program will take off, but I'm impatient to see it happen," he says. □

Selling Smartfood is part fun, part theater

By William Spain

Guerrilla marketing? Seems more like Magilla Gorilla marketing, I sneered when first I heard of Smartfoods' theatrical approach to moving product.

Of course, I had seen their delightfully demented print and transit ads, but I thought costumes and street revues might be going a bit overboard for what is, after all, just popcorn.

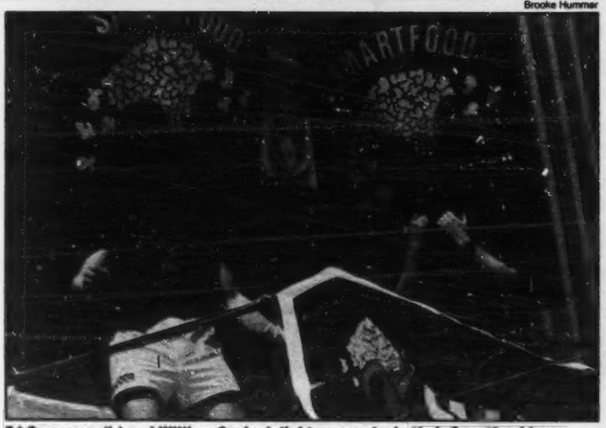
I mean, what kind of idiot would voluntarily don an oversize, black-and-yellow plastic popcorn bag and dance around on top of a truck in a late July inferno to help Frito-Lay hawk their newest snack acquisition?

My editors' kind of idiot.

Thus did I join a Smartfood Marketing Team (a.k a. SMUT) in a pre-noon assault on Chicago.

Ed Creamean, Chicago Smartfood field marketing manager and my temporary commander, boasted of the prowess of his squad, noting they had given away more cases of product—6,315 and counting—than any other. A somewhat bizarre measure of success, but for now that's the Smartfood way.

While we suited up in our bags outside Chicago's city hall, the two simple rules were explained:



Brooke Hummer

Ed Creamean (l.) and William Spain delight passersby in their Smartfood bags.

Each person gets only one bag, and don't stop traffic.

The latter is simple enough; the former is made more difficult by human nature. As one of the SMUTs explained, "It is a pretty messy snack. I have had people come up to me saying they hadn't had any, when the traces were still on their fingers and lips."

Indeed, many people "needed" extra bags for "my boss," or "my kids." One even wanted some for "my attorney."

At our next stop, Madison and LaSalle, in Chicago's financial district, I learned being a SMUT isn't all giving out free cheese popcorn. It also involves a lively public demonstration of one's devotion to the cause: the Smartfood dance. Mostly a free-form, up-and-down-and-side-to-side step, the Smartfood hop is guaranteed to attract attention.

I can't imagine it was an easy decision for Frito-Lay to let SMUTs loose on an unsuspecting public. The possibility for backfire, though relatively remote, does not jibe with a cautious corporate image.

But if the generally amused reaction of Chicagoans to their attention-grabbing antics is any gauge, Smartfoods' future here is in the bag. □ little bit of a contrarian, but I think we need to give the consumer a break. Enough is enough," says Kim Kohler, director of media planning at Tracy-Locke, Dallas.

Mr. Kohler finds ads on golf tee markers particularly disturbing: "OK, you've got a captive environment there that's upscale where you can get your little billboards in, but give the guy a break. He's there to play golf."

A horse is a horse: Then there are those who say you can never have too much advertising.

"I don't think there's any saturation point in the selling environment," says Pete Riordan, out-of-home manager at BBDO Worldwide, New York. "It's one of the places where advertising is least resented, as long as the message is relevant."

Expanding on a Canadian venture in which cows were painted with product information and placed along highway fields, Mr. Riordan suggests targeting affluent consumers with a more upscale beast. "Why let your polo pony go to waste?" □

System grasps for advertiser fuel

By Julie Steenhuysen

Trivision—the company that's bringing TV monitors to Texaco gas pumps—has learned the hard way that it's easier to give away media than to sell it.

After a year of testing, Trivision has convinced only Nestle Foods Corp. and Universal Studios Florida to give the Messenger System a go.

But it was a long road getting there, says Exec VP Gio Tomasini.

Trivision's laser disc point-of-purchase system broadcasts standard 30-second TV commercials over two 20-inch color monitors mounted at each pump island. Audio is connected to a sensor that's triggered when a car enters the station.

Conceived in early 1989 by partners Mr. Tomasini, Exec VP Wesley Arnold and President Don Boyd and backed by an unnamed investor, Trivision's first hurdle was to convince Texaco's Star Enterprise subsidiary to go along for the ride.

A three-month test in Orlando, Fla., won over Texaco, which gets a percentage of ad revenues. But advertisers have been a bit slower in signing on.

Trivision solicited TV commercials from national advertisers selling products in the Texaco outlets. Advertisers including Frito-Lay's Doritos, Eastman Kodak Co.'s Kodacolor Gold film, Veryfine juices and Nestle's Butterfinger and Nestle Crunch candy bars gave Trivision spots to run on the system at no charge. Of those companies, only Nestle has bought ads on the system, which charges $60 a month per location.

Universal, which participated in another free test, signed a two-station, six-month contract in the Orlando market, says Matt Palmer, associate publicity representative.

Universal is "looking for a different ad vehicle for people who come here on vacation," he says. "It's an ideal way to target a captive audience."

Trivision, meanwhile, is continuing to conduct product movement tests and roll out the system. It expects to be in 400 Texaco locations by yearend.

So far, most people consider the system a novelty, Mr. Tomasini says.

But not all of Texaco's customers have appreciated being pitched while pumping gas, says Bob Walden, buyer/merchandiser for the Atlanta market.

Five of Mr. Walden's stations pulled out of the program.

"We wanted it down because of customer complaints," says Mr. Walden.

Mickey Marks, VP-associate media director at Nestle agency Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, says Trivision's system offers a natural synergy with products sold in the Texaco convenience stores. But Trivision may have some trouble expanding beyond those products.

"They're not really targeting anyone in particular," Mr. Marks says.

For Nestle, the buy makes sense because of Trivision's POP advantage, he says.

For Frito and Kodak, the verdict is out.

Frito-Lay ads have run for free on the system in Atlanta, Houston and Orlando, and the company is evaluating Trivision's numbers, it says. Kodak is "waiting for some feedback" from the test, says Mike Siegel, marketing communications coordinator-color film.

"I respect companies who are breaking a new medium and are taking the initiative to fund their own research," he says. □

Unexpected

expected. The non-traditional sector also includes the growing range of in-store media—such as overhead signage and the VideOcart screen on shopping carts—as well as advertising in movie theaters or high school gymnasiums.

But that explosion of opportunities also has created new problems for those companies selling non-traditional media and for agencies and advertisers evaluating the increasing options.

As with traditional media, the key words driving non-traditional media are environment, audience, cost and research.

"You do have to look for alternative ways to communicate a client's message. It's no secret that it's become more difficult to reach consumers," says Chris Vlahos, who has researched non-traditional media as media director at Lord, Sullivan & Yoder, Columbus, Ohio. "There certainly are a lot of new options. But you have to put yourself in the position of the consumer in evaluating them," he says.

"I think we've heard pitches for ads just about anywhere you can name," he says. "I think restroom ads are the ultimate in irritating. There should be some escape from advertising."

The alternative-media companies say they are aware of the potential for backlash against advertising perceived as intrusive. Many of the most successful new ad media have been developed in conjunction with new services.

Checagau Communications has created a vehicle it calls the GuidePoster. Targeted to upscale travelers and tourists, it is a detailed city map and a guide to high-end restaurants. The company has produced a GuidePoster for Chicago, sponsored by Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s Discover Card, is preparing a second, for San Francisco, and is contemplating creating similar city-specific products.

Because GuidePoster provides a service as well as ad space, "we've encountered very little hesitation by potential advertisers," says Checagau partner Robert Gifford.

Many top advertisers who have tested the waters in non-traditional media are impressed with formats available both here and overseas. Colgate-Palmolive Co. uses mobile cinema- trucks that go into villages and run short movies and commercial messages —with success internationally.

"That medium is very powerful," says Clay Timon, VP-worldwide advertising. "We're able to run four-minute, very educational commercials." Samples of Colgate products also are distributed through the trucks.

Many non-traditional media companies agree they must offer more than just additional ad space to avoid the "irritation factor" and to succeed.

"A key element is that our programs are perceived as beneficial," says David Rieff, director of marketing & operations at MarketSource, which offers ad-supported programs at colleges.

One is the Campus Source, a communications center that includes a monthly calendar of on-campus events, an LED message screen and a color, backlit ad.

"Campus Source is a communications medium that also is an ad medium," Mr. Rieff says.

The promise of communicating with an audience not easily reached through traditional media is the lure that has spurred the growth of non-traditional media. MarketSource estimates college students represent $33 billion in discretionary spending, yet have lower than average exposure to many traditional media. As a result, several companies offer ways to put ad messages in front of that audience.

To interest major advertisers, however, a non-traditional media company needs to have the right numbers. "You've got to have a sufficient number of locations to make it worthwhile," Mr. Rieff says, adding his program is on 1,600 campuses.

Liz Conn, associate media director at D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago, contends it still takes audience numbers to attract her clients to a non-traditional medium.

"If there's no research at all to support an ad opportunity, it's at an immediate disadvantage," she says.

"But clients are open-minded about the opportunities. And for every bad idea out there, there's a good one." □

Kids have their day

TV fare slated to fill Spanish-language void

By Christy Fisher

TV programming for Hispanic children, long-ignored by networks, is about to become more choice-driven.

With the exception of a few Spanish-language shows, these kids watch the same sort of English-language fare as other children. Their favorite cartoons are "Beetlejuice," "The Real Ghostbusters" and "Muppet Babies"; favorite prime-time viewing includes "Cosby" and "Full House."

In fact, only seven of the top 25 children's shows are on the Spanish-language networks, Strategy Research Corp. reports. Only "Univision Y Los Ninos"—blocks of second-run cartoons dubbed in Spanish—was created specifically for children.

But this fall, the Hispanic children's market will expand as both Univision Network and Telemundo Group plan to introduce children's programming blocks.

Univision, the leading Spanish-language network, has teamed up with DIC Enterprises, producer of "The Real Ghostbusters," to create "Pepe Plata" and "PlataVision," the first originally produced program for U.S. Hispanic children. Separately, Telemundo, the No. 2 Spanish-language network plans to introduce a weekend block of imported animated programming but has not yet revealed the specific shows.

Univision and DIC's effort is most ambitious. "PlataVision" is a 90-minute, seven-day-a-week programming block that consists of two half-hour animated shows, "COPS" and "Adventures in Plata Hills," and the half-hour live-action comedy/adventure show "Pepe Plata."

Hispanic-American TV actor Simon Maldonado stars as a fictional hit recording star and world's richest teen-ager, Pepe Plata. That character also serves as the host for the entire "PlataVision" block.

"We think this is a breakthrough series," said Andy Heyward, DIC Enterprises president. "No one else is producing programming for Hispanic kids."

Univision expects its network advertising time to be sold out by the show's debut, said Jose Del Cueto, commercial manager for Univision Productions. To date, the program is 80% sold-out, he said. DIC Merchandising handles licensing for "Pepe Plata."

Univision is hoping the children's block brings new advertisers to the market and invigorates spending from existing advertisers.

Charter advertisers include General Mills' cereals; Procter & Gamble Co. for its Crest, Hawaiian Punch, Pringle's and Sunny Delight brands; and Mattel Inc.

Hispanic advertising agencies applaud the new show.

"We're excited about it," said Eva May, management supervisor with Noble & Asociados, which handles the P&G brands. "It represents a new target—one that we were not able to reach with traditional media before."

"It's a good quality program with a lead character that should be a strong draw for Hispanic kids," said Laura Marella, media director for General Mills' agency Casanova Pendrill Publicidad. □

Nielsen L.A. test finds viewers

By Christy Fisher

Preliminary results look promising from Nielsen Media Research's people-meter test measuring TV viewership among Hispanics in Los Angeles.

Hispanics on average watch more TV than non-Hispanics, said Ceril T. Shagrin, senior VP of Nielsen Media Research. Also, the Los Angeles pilot is recording a higher viewership of Spanish-language TV than was being recorded by existing methodology—a Hispanic breakout of the people meter totals for the market.

The data bode well for Spanish-language TV and Hispanic ad agencies, which have been struggling to build their share of advertising dollars.

The latest survey period from June 14 to July 11, which is the first to measure the entire 200 household sample, showed that Hispanics had a higher TV viewership than the market average in all dayparts. In prime time (Monday through Sunday from 8 p.m. to 11 p.m.), 61% of the TVs in Hispanic households were on, compared with a total market average of 54%.

Spanish-language TV stations also were netting higher TV viewership in the test than was being recorded with existing methodology. In prime time, 27.8% of all households were tuned into Hispanic stations, according to the people-meter test, compared with 22% found in the breakout sample for the total market.

When measuring all Hispanics watching TV, Spanish-language TV stations garnered a 51% market share from 9 p.m. to 11 p.m. in the test. This is much higher than the 40% recorded by the breakout sample.

If the test is successful, the Nielsen National Hispanic Television Service could be rolled out nationally in late 1991 or early 1992. □

Univision bounces back

NEW YORK—Univision Network, the No. 1 Spanish-language network, has regained ground lost to rival Telemundo Group.

Telemundo, which scored big in the November and February ratings sweeps, lost 2 share points to Univision in the recently released May ratings period, according to Strategy Research Corp.

Telemundo's 33% share of households viewing Spanish-language TV from Monday through Sunday, 9 a.m. to midnight, also fell a substantial 5 share points from the November 1989 sweep, but was still 1 share point higher than its February 1989 share.

"Telemundo's upward trend has flattened," said Laura Marella, media director for Casanova, Pendrill Publicidad.

Univision has nine of the top 10 shows and 19 of the top 25 shows, SRC reports. Univision's "Sabado Gigante" continues as the top-ranked show against all demographics except children, which rank the show second.

Telemundo, which has a shorter programming schedule than Univision, claims a 38% household share for the times it is on the air. This is flat from the February and November reporting periods but up several points from the reporting period a year ago, the network said.

The ratings numbers, in general, were positive for Spanish TV, Ms. Marella said, particularly when compared with the concurrent audience drop experienced by general-market TV. Spanish-language TV viewing rose from 13% to 48% in all dayparts. □

Five shops bond together

CHICAGO—Hispanic ad agencies are teaming up and branching out.

Five Hispanic shops have affiliated to form Agencias USA, a full service advertising partnership. The five shops—La Creative Boutique, Tarzana, Calif.; Hispanic Advertising & Marketing Services, New York; Montemayor y Asociados, San Antonio; Pantin Partnership, Miami; and Unimar, Chicago—each bring to the partnership a particular area of expertise. They include: promotions, direct mail, special events and creative, plus knowledge of their regional markets.

"We're not merging. We are just working together," said Unimar President Marta Miyares, who is coordinating the effort. Each shop remains independent; the consortium plans to tap each other's expertise for projects and work together as a team to pitch national accounts.

Hispanic shops, such as Publicidad Siboney and Font & Vaamonde, are looking at beefing up their regional capabilities to better serve national clients and to attract more regional business in this fragmented market. □

PRODUCT & ACCOUNT ACTIVITY

Boarding the bus: Greyhound Lines, Dallas, has named Martinez/Siboney as its national Hispanic creative ad agency. Bozell, Irving, Texas, continues to do general market advertising and all media buying.

Bank on a review: Bank One, Texas, is conducting an account review for a Hispanic agency, sources say. Finalists are: Hispano Southwest and Montemayor y Asociados, both San Antonio, Texas, and Martinez/Siboney, Dallas.

Campaigns breaking: Procter & Gamble's Hawaiian Punch is introducing "Punchy" to the U.S. Hispanic market via a 30-second TV spot. Noble & Asociados, Irvine, Calif., is the agency. . . . Domino's Pizza is starting humorous TV, radio and print advertising in California, Florida and the Southwest themed "It's time for Domino's Pizza" via GSD&M, Austin, Texas.

Big picture: Telemundo Group has signed a licensing pact with ITC Domestic Television to broadcast 84 motion pictures dubbed in Spanish, including such hits as "On Golden Pond."

JULY AD RESULTS

Second half looks bad

By Scott Donaton

Any lingering hope of a second-half turnaround has been dashed by magazines' July performance.

Publishers Information Bureau reported that July ad pages for the nation's top consumer magazines fell 5.7% to 10,176.25 from last year, the second worst monthly drop in 1990. That, combined with a 3.3% drop in the first half, left ad pages down 3.6% to 95,623.12 pages for the first seven months of the year.

Among PIB-tracked magazines, 74 of the top 100 magazines, including seven of the top 10, recorded ad page declines for the first seven months.

Ad revenues rose 1.8% to $412.6 million, in July, led by a 38.9% increase to $76.2 million in automotive spending, the top category. But auto spending for the first seven months was off 7.3% to $491.4 million.

Cigarettes/tobacco continues to fall, seeing the biggest decline among all categories, with July revenues down 22.8% to $23.9 million. For the year, spending was down 26.6% to $178.6 million.

Magazines' July performance has publishers admitting there are too many titles and too few ad pages. They say they're bracing for a major shakeout and a slump that could last as long as two years.

McGraw-Hill's Business Week remained the ad page leader among PIB titles despite an 8.8% drop to 2,313.08 pages for the first seven months. Rival Forbes continued to close the gap with 2,083.87 ad pages, an 8.6% increase. Forbes remained one of only a handful of major magazines showing strong gains this year. Fortune, with 1,894.37 ad pages, was off 6.6%.

However, a number of secondary business titles posted impressive results. Entrepreneur carried 1,172.54 ad pages, up 8.4%. Financial World was up 36.9% to 603.65.

Hardest hit by the slump are major weeklies. Time Warner's People, Time and Sports Illustrated posted declines of 9.3%, 6% and 15.4%, respectively.

TV Guide's ad pages fell 11.5% to 1,596.72. Newsweek carried 1,196.09 ad pages, a 9.5% drop, while U.S. News & World Report was off 1.8% with 1,039.58 ad pages. New York Magazine's pages dropped 14.4% to 1,388.76.

The New Yorker, which had been strong since June 1989, saw pages fall 4.8% in July to 112.21. Ad pages for the first seven months totaled 1,155.2, a 3.5% gain.

Good Housekeeping was the only women's service magazine to report a cumulative increase for the first seven months. The Hearst Corp. title carried 942.64 pages, up 7%. Family Circle, last year's ad page leader among the Seven Sisters, saw pages fall 15% to 933.57.

Ladies' Home Journal was off 3.5% with 845.26 ad pages; Woman's Day fell 15.4% to 834.32; Better Homes & Gardens' pages totaled 724.63, down 12.4%; Redbook had 641.9 ad pages, down 1.9%; and McCall's carried 560.33 ad pages, a 12.9% drop.

Titles with strong performances for the first seven months included: Texas Monthly (768.35 ad pages, up 10.4%); Popular Photography (705.28 pages, up 24%); Gourmet (696 pages, up 6%); Vanity Fair (688.24 pages, up 1.1%); Harper's Bazaar (682.54 pages, up 1.5%); and Conde Nast Traveler (576.22 pages, up 16.1%).

Golf may be growing in popularity as a sport, but that hasn't helped the top golf magazines. Golf Digest's ad pages were off 2.6% to 848.18 pages, while Golf Magazine's pages sank 8.6% to 767.14. However, Golf Illustrated's pages rose 10.9% to 365.97.

Among Sunday magazines (tracked separately by PIB), USA Weekend closed in on category leader Parade, with 378.2 ad pages, a 7.4% jump. Parade was off 3.1% through July with 398.44 ad pages. □

Pepsi sips recall win

By Kate Fitzgerald

Pepsi-Cola was the choice of a new generation last month.

And, after months of close competition between the top two cola brands for first place, Coca-Cola dropped to third in Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey of best-recalled advertising.

It was the first time since January that Coca-Cola's advertising wasn't in the first or second slot in the survey.

As in past monthly surveys, Pepsi's popularity among women was apparent, while Coca-Cola was slightly more popular among men. For instance, of people for whom Pepsi came to mind first, 57% were women and 43% were men. Of those who mentioned Coca-Cola first, 53% were men and 47% were women.

GALLUP SURVEY

Chevrolet placed second, up from fourth in June, and Ford slipped to fourth after finishing third for five straight months.

Nike jumped five notches to a fifth-place tie, proving Bo Jackson knows how to make people think of the brand. The athletic footwear marketer tied with McDonald's Corp.

Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser held steady in eighth place, placing behind grocery store ads in general.

General awareness of automobile advertising was high in last month's survey, even before the outbreak of tensions in the Persian Gulf and the resulting fears about oil supplies and prices.

As a category, car ads ranked ninth in consumer awareness, and Toyota scored 10th.

In aided awareness for the soft-drink category, gender differences in perception of various brands continued the pattern set in the overall adWatch numbers.

Pepsi was on top with 40% of aided awareness. Of people for whom Pepsi came to mind first, 52% were women and 48% were men. Coca-Cola was in second place with 35% awareness; 52% of people for whom Coca-Cola first came to mind were men, and 48% were women.

Diet Coke was third, followed by Diet Pepsi and 7UP.

In the pet-food category, Alpo Petfoods' Alpo was first, followed by Ralston Purina Co.'s Purina, Carnation Co.'s Friskies and Quaker Oats Co.'s Kibbles 'n Bits. Purina Puppy Chow was fifth, finishing that high for the first time in several months.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

P&G tests entry in spray cleaners

By Laurie Freeman

Procter & Gamble Co., the household cleaners leader, hopes to broaden its position with a new combination glass/all-purpose cleaner called Cinch.

Cinch was introduced into Arizona test markets this month. The product is billed as being "from the makers of Spic & Span."

TV spots breaking next month via Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York, are themed "Don't clean it twice. Cinch it once."

This isn't P&G's first entry in the spray segment of the $693 million all-purpose cleaner category. Cinch was the name of an all-purpose spray test-marketed in the late 1960s, and in 1988 P&G tested spray versions of Mr. Clean, Spic & Span and Top Job.

This time, P&G is also aiming at the $202 million window cleaner category. Company spokeswoman Jennifer Bailey said Cinch delivers the "filming and streaking control of a glass cleaner" and the "grease-cutting efficiency of an all-purpose spray."

Grocery industry sources say P&G has nearly a 20% share in all-purpose cleaners with Mr. Clean, Spic & Span and Top Job. But Clorox Co.'s Pine-Sol is the top brand with a 10.8% share.

This is P&G's first venture into window cleaners, paced by Drackett Co.'s Windex, the leader with a 40.6% share, and Dow-Brands' Glass Plus, second with a 14.4% share.

Separately, P&G is testing Cascade Gel, a new version of Cascade automatic dishwashing liquid. The product is in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma and Arizona. TV spots support, via Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

The gel formula offers "the same benefits as a liquid but avoids the [ingredient] separation problems" liquid dishwashing detergents sometimes have, Ms. Bailey said.

P&G is already the leader in the $500 million automatic dishwashing detergent category, with a 55% share for Cascade in powder and liquid formulations. □

Pepsi rebuffs Coke at NAD

By Janice Kelly

NEW YORK—Diet Pepsi has notched a victory over Diet Coke in a postscript to one of the cola wars' major ad battles of the year.

Coca-Cola Co. complained to the Council of Better Business Bureaus' National Advertising Division that the "Billy Crystal" and "Ray Charles" TV spots for Diet Pepsi continued to use unsubstantiated taste preference claims.

The complaint came after Pepsi modified the spots last spring following a February complaint to NAD by Coca-Cola. BBDO Worldwide created the spots.

This time around, Coca-Cola argued statements that "Diet Pepsi is better-tasting than Diet Coke" and "Diet Pepsi beats Diet Coke" amounted to a revival of the disputed taste test claims.

When NAD first reviewed Coca-Cola's challenge in April, Pepsi elected not to submit substantiation because it said the claim, "Diet Pepsi—the taste that beats Diet Coke," had been discontinued.

After reviewing Coca-Cola's taste test data and consumer perception studies related to the original and modified ads, NAD ruled the modified spots "contained no unsubstantiated implied claim."

NAD, the self-regulatory unit of the ad industry, reviewed 11 cases in June/July. Seven were closed when claims were modified or discontinued; four were settled when the claims were substantiated.

Claims modified or dropped:

Lewis Galoob Inc. (Micro Machines Highway Warriors, City Scenes toy cars; Towne, Silverstein, Rotter): NAD's Children's Advertising Review Unit questioned TV spots showing the toys moving unaided. CARU felt the visuals "overglamorized the play value" of the toys and inadequately depicted "hands-on" play.

Galoob said the Highway Warriors spot has been discontinued and the City Scenes commercial has been revised according to CARU guidelines.

Nestle Enterprises/Stouffer Foods Corp. (frozen pizza; Della Femina, McNamee, Pittsburgh): McCain Foods challenged Nestle TV spots claiming, "National taste tests prove that Stouffer's makes the best-tasting frozen pizza."

Stouffer submitted taste test results and said that in six geographically dispersed locations, Stouffer's frozen pizzas were preferred. Stouffer's Deluxe varieties and square pizzas weren't included.

NAD ruled the superiority claim was stated in universal terms but the testing was limited. Stouffer agreed to modify the ads.

General Mills (Apple Cinnamon Cheerios; Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising): Responding to a complaint by the Department of Telecommunications at Indiana University, CARU hit a TV spot that aired during kids' programming hours. The commercial didn't include a complete breakfast diet disclosure.

General Mills said the spot, since discontinued, was adult-directed and had inadvertently aired during children's viewing time.

Kop-Coat Inc. (Wolman RainCoat water repellent; in-house): Sterling Drug, on behalf of its Thompson & Formby subsidiary, challenged Kop-Coat's claim, "America's favorite . . . outperforms all-purpose sealers on decks. . . . The only way to be sure that your deck will have a beautiful life."

After examining Kop-Coat's test data, NAD ruled the claims couldn't be substantiated. Kop-Coat agreed to modify the three claims.

Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. (tires; J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit): Michelin Tire Corp. challenged four Goodyear TV spots showing drivers executing accident-avoidance maneuvers in wet weather, with the claims: "One day it could all come down to a few inches. . . . It's good to know you have Goodyear. . . . That's why we say, the best tires in the world have Goodyear written all over them." In addition, the Better Business Bureau of Winston-Salem, N.C., brought to NAD's attention a newspaper ad headlined "The best tires in the world have Goodyear written all over them."

NAD agreed that "best in the world" TV claims weren't substantiated and recommended modification. But NAD ruled the print ad was substantiated because it was presented without reference to specific performance characteristics. Goodyear agreed to modify the commercials.

Sugar Foods Corp. (Sweet 'N Low; The Food Group): NutraSweet Co. challenged a foodservice magazine ad claiming, "30 million people prefer Sweet 'N Low. That's 40% more than Equal. . . . And that's why 86% of all foodservice operators choose [Sweet 'N Low] as their primary sugar substitute." NutraSweet said Sugar Foods based a taste preference claim solely on market share data. NAD concluded that market share data weren't directly relevant and recommended the claim be modified or discontinued. Sugar Foods said the campaign had run its course.

Carnation Co. (Follow-Up formula; Ogilvy & Mather, McCann Direct): Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. challenged magazine and direct mail ads claiming, "If your 6- or 12-month-old baby is still drinking formula, try Carnation Follow-up formula. It means extra nutritional assurance for your baby." Bristol-Myers questioned Carnation's nutritional superiority claim, and Carnation agreed to avoid these claims in the future.

Claims substantiated:

American Cyanamid Co./Lederle Laboratories Division (Centrum Multivitamin/Multimineral Formula; Carrafiello-Diehl & Associates, Irvington, N.Y.): The company substantiated TV and newspaper ads claiming, "More complete than any leading brand."

H.J. Heinz Co./Weight Watchers International (frozen entrees; DDB Needham Worldwide): After examining a challenge by ConAgra Frozen Foods, NAD held that Weight Watchers' claim, "You'll never find butter, tropical oils, chicken fat or added cream in any of our frozen entrees," was substantiated.

Chrysler Corp. (Chrysler New Yorker Fifth Avenue Lease; Bozell, Birmingham, Mich.): Challenged by the Nashville, Tenn., Better Business Bureau for advertising a price of "$339* a month for the luxury car lease without the luxury car price," where the asterisk referred to a monthly payment following a $4,594.60 down payment, Chrysler was able to substantiate the asterisked price. □

Outdoor ads move

advertising companies—Gannett Outdoor, Patrick Media Group and Lamar Advertising—said they will move some 2,000-plus tobacco- or alcohol-related ads (see chart on Page 3) and put decals on some 9,200 structures.

Together, the three companies represent nearly 20% of the nation's 500,000 boards.

"Every board that has tobacco or liquor ads within the 500-foot rule will be moved by Sept. 1," said John Hope, senior VP-public affairs at Gannett Outdoor.

Gannett, which has 30,000 boards in 14 major markets, said it has identified "close to 3,000 [boards] that will require the decal." More than 1,000 of those feature tobacco or liquor ads that have been or will be moved, he said.

Gannett will also move some 800 tobacco or alcohol ads on bus shelters in New York.

Patrick, which operates 41,000 boards, said by mid-September it plans to have relocated more than 1,000 tobacco- or alcohol-related ads. More than 4,000 of its boards will feature the decal.

Lamar said about 2,000 of its boards will soon feature the decal, but Tommy Teepell, VP-marketing, said the company has pinpointed only 50 to 100 tobacco- or alcohol-related ads that need to be moved.

Lamar, with 25,000 boards in more than 30 markets, operates largely in more rural areas.

Whiteco Outdoor and Penn Advertising also said they're abiding by the industry policy but Whiteco won't use the decals. Whiteco's boards are primarily on highways, and it will instead identify boards within the 500-feet range by computer.

The industry has been bracing for financial losses due to the new restrictions. But outdoor companies said they haven't been hurt yet financially by the relocation, and they're quickly replacing vacancies.

Mr. Hope said Gannett hasn't lost any tobacco or liquor business as a result of the relocation process.

"Those locations the tobacco people are willingly giving up are excellent advertising locations," said Lamar's Mr. Teepell. "The tobacco [marketers] are giving other advertisers the front row."

Patrick, which has added playgrounds to the list of off-limits areas, said it's been fielding phone calls from marketers that are looking to snap up the vacancies.

"We're getting calls from toy and cereal [marketers] and those types of companies that advertise on Saturday morning cartoon shows that are interested in those locations," said Mary Ellen Coleman, director of public relations.

Some outdoor companies believe the new policy will give the industry a needed image boost.

"The whole landscape of outdoor advertising will change," said one outdoor executive who asked not to be named. "Once a tobacco or liquor ad comes down today, they will never go up on those [particular] boards again. I don't see that changing . . . ever." □

Lever's Webb

environment became such a priority?

Mr. Webb: Yes. We're using the environmental advantages we can lay our hands on.

AA: What is Lever parent Unilever's environmental advantage? Is Unilever a step ahead of other companies in this area?

Mr. Webb: That's very difficult for me to say because I don't know what the other companies are thinking and doing precisely. On environmental issues, there's a lot of collaboration within the industry. . . .

I don't think within the detergent industry you're getting claims of superiority—"I'm greener than the next chap"—because I don't think in the long run that's in the interests of the consumer.

The consumer is not in a position to judge whether one product is more environmental than another. They can judge whether their clothes are washed better or whether their clothes are softer. . . .

We're talking about an area where the responsibility is very much on the market leaders—ourselves, Procter & Gamble, Colgate-Palmolive. I think the leaders have the means to make changes that really have impact, like using recycled plastic to make new bottles.

AA: How much do consumers understand about environmental issues? How much responsibility do companies have to educate them?

Mr. Webb: First of all, you have a high level of concern. If you use classic market research techniques, you get back very high levels of [consumer concern]. But there is also considerable confusion. . . .

If you take a narrow view of a particular material and say that is biodegradable or can be recycled, you ignore how much energy is consumed in actually manufacturing that product compared with other materials. Paper, wood and that sort of thing, you're cutting down rain forests.

It would be arrogant of anybody to assume they have total answers to these problems. But what you can see are solvable bits of these problems.

AA: Is that why there's hesitation on the part of Lever and other companies to come out with ad campaigns that say these products are environmentally friendly?

Mr. Webb: I can't talk about other companies, I can only guess. My view is the reason is deeper than that. I believe people should be free to choose a product or a container because it does the job they want it to do and because they like the way in which it's presented. . . .

I am not primarily concerned in driving them toward trying to choose a product because it's more environmentally friendly than another product. . . . I want to stay with selling my products for what they do—like cleaning clothes, like providing softness.

"Society is saying, 'No, no, no. You chaps have got to score a bit better [on the environment].' "

When it comes to environmental issues, that's part of the things we have to do which have to match up to society's requirements. . . . Society is saying, "No, no, no. You chaps have got to score a bit better [on the environment]."

That's different from rushing out there saying, "Our Wisk is better for what it does for the environment."

What I am ready to say is yes, you can rest assured that Wisk and Snuggle and all the other brands are doing their bit to help. A consumer shouldn't feel guilty about enjoying, liking a product. I expect that our competitors are aiming to achieve the same benchmark. . . . But that's different from saying, "Please buy this because it is environmentally friendly."

AA: Where do your ad agencies fit into this?

Mr. Webb: We use our advertising agencies to play an important role, like our trade advertising on the environment. If we come to give that same environmental message to consumers, we'll need our agencies to get that message across.

I expect from my agencies an awareness of what is going on so they can begin to suggest things that would help the environment and convince the consumer.

The environment will come up in the setting they will choose in slice-of-life advertising situations. I want them to think in terms of a consumer who's environmentally conscious.

AA: How are you working with retailers to get the word out on Lever's environmental initiatives?

Mr. Webb: The trade is very conscious that the consumer is asking questions about [the environment]. We're making sure our information is available to them.

AA: Is providing information through a "green" seal of approval the best way for retailers to pass along information to consumers?

Mr. Webb: The proliferation of . . . things where you get a brownie point, like the Green Seal—the trouble with that is you're in danger of setting up another authority in a semigovernmental role, which actually isn't answerable to anybody. One begins to have anxiety about how [seal programs] can get all the knowledge and information. It's difficult enough for us in our own industry to find the answers.

AA: Do you expect the U.S. government at some point to step in and regulate environmental claims?

Mr. Webb: I think the federal authorities are being sensibly cautious about this. It's fine to say, "Yes, regulate"; I just don't think you can easily regulate.

My own hope is that self-regulation by responsible industry will set the pattern. If Connecticut passes one rule, New Jersey passes another, New York yet another—how on earth can a plant located in Minneapolis begin to serve economically?

I do expect there to be some more legislation. . . . What I am encouraged by is a cautious approach from the [Environmental Protection Agency]. . . . I think the sort of things that [the Coalition of Northeast Governors], with governors and states working together to come to some sort of coherent framework, is a model that can be followed. □

FOR THE RECORD

ROYAL CARIBBEAN Cruise Lines, Miami, named finalists in its $35 million to $37 million account review. They are incumbent Chiat/Day/Mojo; Geer, DuBois; and Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss, all New York, and the Martin Agency, Richmond, Va. Royal denied rumors that McKinney & Silver, Raleigh, N.C., the cruise line's former agency, is also being considered.

SQUARE D CO., Palatine, Ill., tapped Creswell, Munsell, Fultz & Zirbel, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for the building materials and electronics marketer's consolidated $30 million worldwide account, some parts of which will be handled by other units of Creswell's parent, Young & Rubicam, New York. Advertising had been at Creswell Munsell and eight other shops.

U.S. DEPARTMENT of Justice will drop its antitrust suit against Procter & Gamble Co. and Rhone-Poulenc Rorer after the companies decided not to jointly develop and market prescription and over-the-counter pharmaceutical products. The department's suit filed in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia challenged the arrangement by which P&G would market and distribute Rorer's Maalox OTC stomach remedy and other products.

SEAGRAM BEVERAGE CO., New York, named DDB Needham Worldwide to handle its Soho Natural Soda account, recently inactive. Chiat/Day/Mojo previously handled. As a result, Pepsi-Cola Co., Somers, N.Y., moved its H2Oh! flavored sparkling water account to BBDO Worldwide, New York, Pepsi's flagship shop, from sister Omnicom Group agency DDB Needham.

KOREY, KAY & PARTNERS, New York, formed an executive board following the recent death of co-founder Lois Korey. Board members include Steven R. Fajen, 35, exec VP-director of media and marketing services; Milda Misevicius, 35, exec VP-director of business development; Neil R. Leinwohl, 44, senior VP-creative director; Joe Palladino, 51, senior VP-account director; Michael F. Glavin, 34, senior VP-account director; and David S. Harris, 32, senior VP-director of finance. Mr. Leinwohl was promoted from VP-associate creative director, Mr. Glavin was promoted from VP-account director and Mr. Harris was promoted from VP-director of finance. All are new posts.

CHEMICAL MANUFACTURERS Association, Washington, named Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York, to succeed R.T. Blass, Old Chatham, N.Y. The association is expected to spend $50 million on advertising in the next five years. Separately, Merry Cutler, VP and co-director of account planning, left Chiat after a recent round of layoffs.

SPORTS ILLUSTRATED, New York, next year will launch a spinoff titled Sports Illustrated Classic, with issues in March, June and October. The sports nostalgia title will be distributed to SI's 3.2 million subscribers and on newsstands nationwide. A b&w page is $84,245, and a color page is $130,205. SI is guaranteeing newsstand sales of at least 150,000 copies per issue.

OUTDOOR BOARDS on moving trucks are subject to regulation by the Massachusetts Outdoor Advertising Board, a Suffolk County Superior Court judge in Boston found. Moving Advertising Promotions, Stamford, Conn., was ordered to stop driving its truck-mounted boards in view of public highways. Moving Advertising had contended its truck required no special licensing and was unavailable for comment on the ruling.

MINNESOTA DEPARTMENT of Revenue withdrew proposed sales tax guidelines expanding the state's 6% sales tax to agency collateral services. Industry sources warn the guidelines may be resurrected after Minnesota's Sept. 11 primary, and say the threat of a 1991 effort to tax all agency services remains.

NEW CAMPAIGNS: U.S. Shoe Corp. next month starts a multimillion-dollar print campaign for its Easy Spirit Shockblockers aerobic shoe line. Advertising to Women, New York, is the agency. . . . Public Broadcasting Service next month breaks a $2 million network and cable TV campaign, PBS' first national advertising effort to promote its fall program lineup. Young & Rubicam, New York, handles.

ACCOUNT ACTION: New Line Cinema, Beverly Hills, Calif., indefinitely postponed the review for its estimated $25 million media buying account, now at Independent Media Service, New York. . . . Marion Merrell Dow, Kansas City, Mo., to Lewis & Gace, Fort Lee, N.J., first agency for Nicoderm smoking-cessation nicotine patch, still in clinical trials.

WORTH NOTING: Nabisco Brands has begun rolling out Mini Chips Ahoy with a $3 million TV campaign featuring Atlanta Hawks basketball player Spud Webb. FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, handles. . . . SportsSouth, a regional cable TV network, is set to launch Aug. 29 with 1.2 million subscribers and "a handful of advertisers," including Long John Silver's, said VP-General Manager Blair Schmidt-Fellner. . . . DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, is buying an 80% stake in Opus, Budapest, and will rename the shop DDB Needham Hungary. . . . The number of U.S. TV households is estimated at 93.1 million, up 1.1% from a year ago, Nielsen Media Research reported. . . . McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, bought Rosenberg & Co., Stockholm, for an estimated $17.5 million to $25.5 million.

Saatchi's future: Time on its side

Maurice Saatchi: Wants to be remembered as a brilliant businessman.

Charles Saatchi: More time for his art collection? Could it be used as collateral?

LONDON—It's 1993. Robert Louis-Dreyfus has moved back to his Zurich home, having just finished a three-year stint as chief executive of Saatchi & Saatchi Co.

Mr. Louis-Dreyfus proudly turned back to Charles and Maurice Saatchi a company free of its debt burden but much smaller than the troubled operation he took over in January 1990. Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide is now owned by France's Eurocom.

Charles Saatchi is torn between selling his shares and getting out—so he can spend even more time on his art collection—and making Saatchi reflect his own creative genius again. He thinks about buying back all outstanding shares with his brother, Maurice, to run Saatchi & Saatchi as a private company, thereby getting rid of troublesome shareholders and annoying analysts.

Since no bank is likely to lend the brothers money because of their track record, Charles figures his modern art col-

Qantas' $40M account set for review

By Geoffrey Lee Martin

SYDNEY—Qantas Airways Australia's international airline, plans to call for bids worldwide on its estimated $40 million ad account once Chiat/Day/Mojo's contract expires next May.

The available agency field would be a narrow one. Qantas requires a multinational shop with offices in at least 25 specific cities in the U.S., Europe, Asia and the Pacific as well as Australia—and, of course, no conflicting airline account.

A short list is yet to be chosen, said Ken Boys, media relations manager for Qantas, but Chiat "will definitely" be included in a "normal review."

Qantas is wholly owned by the Australian government but is run by an independent board. Although government units often put new contracts out for bid, it isn't required by law in this case and this agency review isn't considered routine, said one Chiat source in the U.S.

"We've been officially aware of Qantas' intention to put the account into review in the summer of 1991 for several months now," said a Chiat spokesman in New York.

"Qantas is one of our oldest and

McD's sizzles with new ideas

By Scott Hume

McDonald's Corp. is pursuing an aggressive, two-pronged strategy to regain sales momentum.

The No. 1 restaurant chain is opening itself to previously unimaginable changes with what one analyst called "an increased sense of urgency" about its competitive position.

With real per-store sales flat or down for eight straight quarters, according to stock analysts, McDonald's is in the unaccustomed position of looking for ways to grow.

One indication the fast-food giant will consider almost anything in its search for answers: the testing of Golden Arch Cafe, a '50s-style diner that doesn't carry the McDonald's name, opened last month in Hartsville, Tenn.

So too is the near-frantic pace at which it's testing new menu items at McDonald's outlets.

"I think there's a new attitude at McDonald's. They've opened the floodgates to experimentation and [are] determined to be less bureaucratic, less prone to wait five years on new products," said Ron Paul, president of restaurant consultancy Technomic.

"Still, why they want to try a noisy diner concept, I don't know," he said. "It's very strange. It's something you'd have bet they Will 'Memories' live on?

NEW YORK—The end could be near for Diamandis Communications Inc.'s Memories. Mortimer Zuckerman, chairman of U.S. News & World Report and The Atlantic, decided late last week not to buy the news/nostalgia title. A DCI source said parent Hachette had threatened to fold Memories if the deal died; Hachette officials couldn't be reached. Separately, Mr. Zuckerman is developing a monthly family-oriented magazine with the working title of Family Fun, a source familiar with the plans said.

Kellogg sues Texas

DALLAS—Kellogg is suing the Texas attorney general's office, six days after filing suit against Iowa's attorney general. The latest suit, filed in U.S. District Court here, asked that Attorney General Jim Mattox and the Texas health commissioner be restrained from acting against the labeling or distribution of the company's Heartwise cereal. Texas earlier complained that several facets of the original Heartwise package constitute a health claim. The Kellogg suit said the two parties reached agreement on the specifics, but disagreed on whether Kellogg should admit it vio-

Mitsubishi's image is upwardly mobile

By Cleveland Horton

Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America's bid for the big time starts this week with a $120 million brand-building ad campaign designed to promote "the word."

The 1991 model year campaign from the Japanese automobile importer is designed to build awareness of the corporate name while touting individual models.

"People knew about specific Mitsubishi products—they knew about the Eclipse, and they knew about the Galant. But we were always grasping for some overall theme that pulled all of the Mitsubishi products together," said Mike Nash, VP-marketing services.

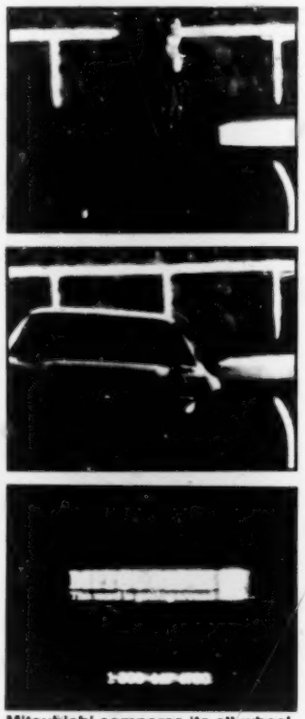
Ads introduce a new tagline, "Mitsubishi—the word is getting around." The approach is an effort to capitalize on the "surge" of accolades various Mitsubishi models have received in the press over the past two years, said Frances Oda, director of advertising.

Mitsubishi cars have appeared on various 10-best lists and won other recognition, such as the Galant earning Motor Trend's Import Car of the Year award in 1989.

Almost all the ads in the new campaign liberally use third-party endorsements—particularly from the automotive buff books. Grey Advertising, New York and Cypress, Calif., handles.

Mitsubishi used "Suddenly the obvious choice" as an umbrella theme in the 1989 model year but stopped using a tagline last year.

The new 3000 GT sports car will be the flagship in Mitsubishi's '91 ad lineup. A 30-second TV spot for the sleek two-seater opens with a shot of a jockey on a galloping racehorse rounding a turn on a turf track. The voice-over says: "Millions of years ago, nature created a vehicle that accelerates, steers and stops with all fours."



Mitsubishi compares its all-wheel-drive 3000 GT to a horse in a new spot from Grey Advertising.

Next, a 3000 GT comes barreling around the same turn. The voice-over continues: "That ingenious concept has now been engineered into a car. Introducing the Mitsubishi 3000 GT with all-wheel drive, all-wheel steering, all-wheel anti-lock brakes and 300 horsepower instead of just one."

Gatefold magazine ads promoting the 3000 GT are already appearing in auto buff books.

The 3000 GT spot will run in rotation with three other :30s separately featuring the Galant sedan, the U.S.-built Eclipse sporty car and the Montero sport utility vehicle.

In an unusual twist, several print ads for those models feature heavily footnoted headlines. But instead of the usual disclaimers, the footnotes appear as part of the regular text and expand on the key word in the head, usually with third-party endorsements.

As Mitsubishi broadens its full line of models, it's appealing to a new type of customer, Mr. Nash said. For example, the average income of a 3000 GT customer is $80,000 or more, while the top-of-the-line Galant model, the VR4, is expected to pull customers from the $75,000 average income bracket.

That's a far cry from the first Mitsubishi models introduced in late 1981, which were mostly low-price, fuel-efficient econo-boxes.

As a whole, the new campaign will present Mitsubishi as an up-and-coming car company, hoping to separate it from the second generation of Japanese imports such as Isuzu, Subaru and Suzuki and vault it into the top tier with Toyota, Honda, Nissan and Mazda.

The ad budget is a 20% hike over 1990's estimated $100 million, and that's part of the strategy to push Mitsubishi past Mazda Motors of America, the No. 4 Japanese importer.

Mitsubishi has narrowed the gap already this year. For the first seven months of 1990, it sold 101,388 cars compared with Mazda's 139,442. In the same period last year, Mitsubishi sold 55,847 cars, compared to Mazda's 134,320.

With the change in Mitsubishi's target customer, media buys for the model '91 effort are designed to reach affluent males. □

Sears trims direct mail

By Kate Fitzgerald

Sears, Roebuck & Co. is cutting its direct marketing budget, a move that's led to layoffs at one agency and is making other agencies nervous.

Rapp Collins Marcoa, Chicago, recently dismissed three or four of its 90 staffers due to Sears' cutbacks, said agency President David L. King.

"The volume of direct marketing programs we work on for Sears has been reduced substantially, and we've had to let people go," he said. "We understand it's affecting several other agencies working on related business as well."

He wouldn't name the agencies.

Rapp Collins handles direct mail campaigns and advertising stuffers in monthly billing statements for Sears.

A source at another agency said Sears had curtailed much of the shop's direct marketing project work for the retailer, but there were no layoffs.

Craig Thomas, president of Stone & Adler, said his agency has experienced no changes in its business with Sears. The shop handles direct marketing for the Shop at Home service and does occasional catalog and stuffer work.

"Direct marketing can be a very uncertain business, so I can't say we don't anticipate any changes, but at this point we've had none," Mr. Thomas said.

Ogilvy & Mather Direct, Sears' largest direct marketing agency, wouldn't comment.

A Sears spokeswoman denied the company's direct marketing programs have been curtailed.

"We have no plans to change our direct marketing budgets for the remainder of the year, although we are always looking at ways to increase our profitability through direct mail and billing statement stuffers," said Kathy Gucfa, public relations spokeswoman for the Sears Merchandise Group.

Sears is considering substituting its monthly billings statement stuffers with a less costly monthly newsletter, but a final decision hasn't been made, she said.

Changes in Sears' ad budget may not be limited to direct marketing.

Even though Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, is Sears' agency of record, Tom Morris, VP-marketing at the merchandise group, has recently held exploratory discussions with other shops. The agencies initiated the discussions.

Mr. Morris met last month with Ketchum Advertising/USA President Robert Kroyer about what Mr. Kroyer called "possible new-business opportunities." Mr. Kroyer said he made the visit on behalf of the agency's Chicago office, Ketchum/Mandabach & Simms. Two other agencies also have been allowed to talk to Sears.

Sears said no review of its main ad agency is in progress.

Retail industry experts say it won't be long before Sears starts to cut its ad budget.

The company as a whole increased measured media spending by 34% to $525 million in 1989 to support its huge "everyday low price" promotion, along with the introduction of national brand names in all departments. Spending was expected to be about the same this year.

The merchandise group's sales have been flat this year. □

Pet food market stays flat

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

Retail dollar sales of pet food increased 4.8% to $6.21 billion i 1989, aided by an upscaling o the product mix.

Unit sales remained relativel flat, with a volume increase in ca food offsetting a volume declin in dog food.

An additional $1 billion in re tail sales is estimated to have bee made through specialty pet shop and veterinary practices, whic would boost total dollar sales t $7.2 billion. The $6.21 billion fig ure and adjusted 1988 figures at tempt to encompass sales throug mass merchandise and discount warehouse store channels, in ad dition to food stores.

Dollar sales increases should continue to outpace volum growth by a significant margi for the foreseeable future as pe food companies are aggressivel "trending up" with higher-pric product lines.

Cat food dollar sales growt outpaced dog food sales gain again, increasing 6.4% to $2.4 billion. Dog food dollar sales wer up 3.8% to $3.63 billion.

In the dog food category, sale in the dry, canned and treat seg ments all grew, while sales in th moist and soft-dry segments fell.

Dog treats gained 9.8% in sale to $450 million, on an estimate sales volume gain of 2% to 3% Much of this growth stemme from new products—Ralsto Purina Co.'s Purina Biscuits an Beggin' Strips did particularl well in their introductory year RJR Nabisco's Milk-Bone lin continues to dominate the seg ment.

Canned dog food had a 7.1% sales gain to $1.06 billion for th year on flat to marginally dow volume. Alpo Petfoods' Alp maintained its No. 1 position, bu Kal Kan Foods is first in overal corporate share with Pedigree an its new Pedigree Select Dinner and Pedigree Choice Cuts.

Dry dog food, up 4.3% to $1.8 billion in sales (on a 1% to 3% vol ume decline), is seeing an increas ing amount of sales though alter native channels such as discoun and feed stores.

Cat food sales volume increase only 1% to 2% last year, but sale gains should continue based o the growing number of cat owned as pets. Dry sales led th category with an increase of 8.6% to $860 million; volume moved u 3% to 4%. Canned cat food gaine 7.1% in sales to $1.35 billion a volume declined modestly.

Purina maintained its lead i the pet food industry with an esti mated 27.1% market share as th company's sales growth kept pac with the industry.

Carnation Co., in the No. 2 po sition, experienced a significan upward move to a 13.9% share i 1989 from 12.7% in 1988. Kal Ka and H.J. Heinz Co. are tied fo third with 12.1% each. Quake Oats Co. saw a sales decline o 10%, with market share droppin to 11% from 12.6%. [ ]

Measuring event sponsorship

I'm always glad to see articles that point out the need for determining value in event marketing programs ("Sports sponsorship value measured," AA, Aug. 6), but unfortunately few have focused on a crucial point. The value of event programs cannot be measured by the same standards or methods applied to other media (i.e., 16 minutes, 36 seconds during the Indy 500 broadcast equals $5.83 million in media value) because events offer different types of marketing value.

Use of inappropriate measurement standards will only perpetuate the problem of companies using event marketing ineffectively. Too many companies treat the sponsorship buy as a passive media investment, rather than what it really is: the admission ticket to a defined target market and an opportunity to run an active, relevant campaign. Widespread use of a media-type valuation system will only prolong this costly misuse of event marketing.

What we've learned is that marketers who sponsor events successfully determine their own value standards. They take a long- and short-term look at their entire marketing plan and see how individual events could help them reach their goals. They measure value by determining how effective an event affiliation can be in contributing to their overall success.

In using event marketing effectively, related promotions, thematic ties, hospitality, sampling, new-business development and distribution drives all can be combined to form a value-added strategy, so that the actual event serves as the focal point for a much more complete marketing effort.

Turf battles no solution

I find Keith Green's advice to creative people to get account people fired ("Account execs alerted," AA, Aug. 13) negative, inappropriate and unprofessional. His notion of supporting departmental "turf battles" in the interest of agency staffing efficiency is patently absurd.

The team spirit of cooperation across departments to reach the right solution in the interest of building both client and agency business should be maintained by all almost without exception. Petty individual and department ax-grinding is unacceptable.

Mr. Green is a perfect candidate for Ketchum's "Outward Bound" program, intended to "marry" account management and creative into a single team.

Finally, I am not "bashing" creative. I offer the same advice to any account person with this point of view about creatives.

Janet V. Falvo
VP-business affairs
Chapman Direct Advertising

As an account exec, I have always believed that if anyone, of any capacity, is not contributing they should be sent packing. I have seen people with the title of creative director or copywriter contribute nothing, much in the same way Mr. Green sees account execs.

In many instances I have rewritten copy and adjusted layouts to accomplish agreed-upon objectives and meet client goals that have probably saved accounts. All account execs have talked their way around sub-par creative.

The name of the game is teamwork. If Mr. Green believes all his headaches lie within his account executives, he is either naive or void of top-notch account people.

Bargain spots

Thanks for your report on my Advertising Age Creative Workshop presentation on regional/local production of TV commercials (AA, Aug. 13). However, your reference to the Honda-on-the-wall commercial was my expensive example of separating from competition. My inexpensive example was the baby-plus-unmounted-Michelin-tire campaign.

Both commercials were shot by Henry Sandbank—but they are many thousands of dollars apart in production cost. The local/regional challenge is to look like the big boys on a bargain-basement production budget.

More advice for GM

Here is my "back-seat driver" advice to help Robert Stempel steer General Motors in the right direction (Automotive Marketing Report, AA, July 23).

Using a big felt marker, write (don't type) your new GM marketing commandment on a 8½- by 11-inch sheet of paper: "From this day on, we will not satisfy consumer expectations. We will surpass them." Don't forget to sign it.

Make 800,000 copies and distribute them to every member of the GM team. Also, give them purse/wallet/poster-size ones. Pins, pens, pencils would be good, too. Tag every free and paid media activity with it.

One last thing: Make sure you stand by your new marketing commandment.

Carrie Nation mentality

After reading Fran Du Melle's recent tirade (Letters, AA, Aug. 6) against Advertising Age's editorial commendation of the Outdoor Advertising Association of America's new code, one has to wonder if singer Janet Jackson's vision of a "rhythm nation" has regressed to "Carrie Nation." Within Du Melle's "moral" arguments against free speech, she reveals an ill-advised political agenda fraught with censorship, intolerance and a degree of paternalism historically confined to an antebellum plantation overseer.

It only follows that professional communicators must now ask Du Melle: Exactly what is it about adult African-Americans, Hispanics and Asians that requires them to be protectively shielded from seeing commercial messages for tobacco products? What is it about adult women that requires society to protectively shield an entire gender from colors, logos, adult models and typeset taglines? And what is so "special" about adult Caucasian males that they—and they alone—are exempt from the anti-smoking brigade's protective custody? The only correct answer is "nothing at all."

It's obvious from Du Melle's letter that voluntary industry actions, such as the OAAA's new code, will always be met with immediate, knee-jerk derision by society's self-appointed "guardians." The last thing anti-smokers want are sound, reasonable industry solutions to the very concerns they themselves raised.

The bottom line, literally, in Du Melle's letter is a call for government censorship of any commercial communication. But even that draconian measure is but a mere pit stop on the anti-smokers' long march toward prohibition. Cooperative industry actions only get in their way.

An outdoor principle

A number of years ago, John Connelly, the president of Donnelly Outdoor Advertising in Boston, told me his firm's guiding principle: "We always follow business, we never precede it." In other words, they sought new billboard locations only in areas that were already commercially developed.

If outdoor companies universally embraced and publicized such a principle, I am certain they would find significantly less public opposition to this much maligned medium.

LAST MINUTE NEWS

Saatchi stock falls

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co.'s share price fell to a new low of 51 pence on Friday when the company announced it wouldn't make the first half of a $12 million dividend payment due Oct. 6 to holders of a $190 million convertible preference share issue. The move wasn't unexpected because Saatchi stopped paying dividends to ordinary shareholders as of the financial year ended Sept. 30, 1989. "The bad news is it alienates shareholders and there was a further fall in the share price from 62 pence," said Mark Shepperd, an analyst at U.K. stockbroker Phillips & Drew. "The good news is that [Saatchi] has saved some money."

Dentsu eyes Ayer

World's largest shop wants minority stake

By Gary Levin and David Kilburn

Dentsu is negotiating to buy a substantial minority stake in N W Ayer, said sources close to the talks.

If a deal is struck, it would instantly make Dentsu a major player in the U.S. agency business while providing Ayer with a big cash infusion.

The two agencies already work together on at least two major accounts. Ayer's Chairman-CEO Jerry Siano has previously said he'd be interested in pooling interests or in a minority sale, provided Ayer management remains in place and the agency remains privately held.

Mr. Siano couldn't be reached at press time.

Sources close to Dentsu confirmed the talks, indicating the Tokyo-based agency giant would pay cash to buy more than 40% of Ayer.

Advertising Age estimates the value of such a deal at $75 million to $100 million, based on industry formulas.

Top Ayer executives deny there's an imminent plan for Dentsu to buy a minority stake; Dentsu declined comment.

"Something like that, in the future, could very well happen, but there's nothing concrete, there are no [acquisition] overtures, there's no letter of intent or anything meaningful right now," said Thomas Maxey, Ayer vice chairman.

If both Collett Dickenson Pearce and Ayer could be added to the Dentsu fold, the communications company would have a broad scope of worldwide holdings.

Dentsu has "made various overtures" about jointly handling more client business, Mr. Maxey said.

"They've talked to us about sharing offices in New Zealand, Australia and Hong Kong" as part of a joint venture, he said.

Ayer has small offices in the region but has focused its international expansion efforts on acquisitions in Canada and Europe.

A source close to Ayer, however, said he didn't believe Ayer has ruled out a much broader financial deal with Dentsu.

"If there was any [interest], I think it's still alive," the source said.

For cash-rich Dentsu, the deal would mean the realization of a global ambition. The agency conglomerate is by far the world's largest with billings of more than $10 billion. But Dentsu is relatively weak in the U.S. and Europe, where its main presence is through its 33% stake in HDM Worldwide.

Dentsu is negotiating with Collett Dickenson Pearce, London, about a European buyout (AA, July 23), and if Ayer also could be added to the Dentsu fold, the communications company would have a broad scope of worldwide agency holdings.

Besides a one-third interest in HDM, Dentsu owns DCA Advertising, a New York agency with billings of $100 million.

Ayer, with 1989 billings of $1.4 billion, generated 61% of its income in the U.S. last

Shugrue on course

Why he thinks the airline will survive

Martin R. Shugrue, 50, the trustee appointed by federal bankruptcy court to run Eastern Airlines, is about to embark on a make-or-break repositioning program to win higher-paying business travelers (see story at right). The carrier's new direction was preceded by an earlier "100 Days" ad campaign, via Ogilvy & Mather, New York, in which Mr. Shugrue appeared as corporate spokesman.

ONE ON ONE

Advertising Age's Southwestern Bureau Chief Jennifer Lawrence talked to Mr. Shugrue in Houston about Eastern advertising and the new plan, which will be officially unveiled at a news conference Sept. 11.

Advertising Age: Why do you think your plan to lure business travelers this fall will work?

Mr. Shugrue: We're going to introduce some new concepts for business fliers, who have told us that in no uncertain terms they are very, very unhappy with the quality of the nation's airline product for them. They're paying four times what everyone else pays and they sit in the center seat in the middle of an economy row.

We're going to add capacity to our airplanes in our first-class cabin to accommodate the people who are paying the business flier fares. We're going to say candidly and directly—fly on Eastern when you pay that kind of fare and you fly first class. When you fly

Eastern sets last-ditch upgrade plan

By Jennifer Lawrence

Eastern Airlines this week unveils a repositioning that could help determine whether the carrier survives.

Under federal bankruptcy protection since March 1989, Eastern will double first-class seating capacity on all planes and offer those seats at unrestricted coach fare prices, said Martin Shugrue, the court appointed trustee who has run the airline since April. Eastern has already priced its coach fares at least 15% lower than competitors.

The move will be accompanied by an overhaul of fleet interiors and an upgrade of in-flight service, at a cost of $8 million to $10 million annually. On average, first-class seats per plane will increase to 24 from 12.

To promote the value-added first-class service, Eastern next week will begin an estimated $20 million TV and print campaign featuring Mr. Shugrue.

"This is Shugrue's acid test," said one airline-industry analyst. "If this doesn't work, Eastern fails."

Eastern's strategy to attract business travelers comes at the end of Mr. Shugrue's self-proclaimed "100 Days," the campaign in which he told consumers Eastern was working on its problems. That advertising, launched in mid-June, set the stage for this critical push to attract the higher-paying business traveler.

This new effort could mark the end of Mr. Shugrue's role as corporate pitchman, as future advertising focuses more on the product.

If successful, the upgrade program will guide the carrier

Future of the 'Post' depends on unions

By Scott Donaton

The New York Post and its unions will be locked in intense negotiations this week that will determine the struggling daily's fate.

Post President-Publisher Peter Kalikow said last week he would have to fold the tabloid unless its unions agreed to $17 million in concessions by Sept. 15.

With the No. 3 daily in the the nation's largest newspaper market on the verge of collapse, officials at the Allied Printing Trades Council, the umbrella organization for the paper's nine unions, said they would try to work with Mr. Kalikow to save the tabloid.

But the Post's largest union, The Newspaper Guild—which represents reporters, editors and ad salespeople—voted last week to reject the management demands, calling them "obscene and degrading."

The move was viewed by both sides as a negotiation tactic designed to force Mr. Kalikow to reduce his demands.

Analysts have been writing the Post's obituary for years, but the current problems combined with the soft New York ad market may finally mean the end.

"New York cannot sustain four newspapers [now], and the local economy doesn't look like it's going to get better quickly," said Andrew Marcus, a media analyst with investment banker Henry Ansbacher Inc.

Mr. Kalikow last week told the unions he would be forced to close the paper if costs were not cut by $27.4 million by Sept. 15. The concessions he wants from the unions include cuts in salary, staff and overtime.

If there's an agreement, the Post may have archrival Daily News to thank.

"We will evaluate if we can help them and will make every effort to do that because they've been a fair and decent management, unlike the group across town," said George McDonald, president of the council, which also is the umbrella group for unions at the Daily News and The New York Times.

The Post could benefit from acrimony between management and unions at the Daily News.

The "group across town" is the management at the Tribune Co.'s Daily News, which has been negotiating with its unions since the beginning of the year.

The war of words heated up last week after the unions sent letters to more than 350 Daily News advertisers and their agencies, asking them for a boycott.

"The hard-line attitude the Daily News is taking with the unions is clearly helping the Post," Mr. Marcus said.

But Mr. Marcus and other media analysts warned the deep cuts would mean only a "temporary fix" for the Post.

Richard Nasti, VP-general manager at the Post, said in a statement last week he was optimistic the newspaper could be saved.

"We believe that given our firm relationship with our unions, we can find the temporary relief that will allow the paper to continue," he said.

But the Post has been practically crippled this year by cuts in advertising.

Ad linage fell 29.7% in the first half of 1990, compared with the a year earlier, Arbitron/LNA Multi-Media Service reported. The year-ago figure includes linage for the short-lived Sunday edition which folded last November after eight months.

The competition didn't fare much better. Ad linage at the Daily News fell 14.7%. Times Mirror Co.'s Newsday and New York Newsday, the latter of which has been trying to make inroads into the New York City market, saw their combined linage dip 11.3%. The Times' linage fell 12.9%.

Meanwhile, Audit Bureau of Circulations reported the Post's circulation was 504,000 for the six months ended March 31, down 5.8% from a year earlier. The Daily News reported an average daily circulation of 1.18 million down 4%.

Mr. Kalikow said last November that the Post had lost $80 million since he bought it from Rupert Murdoch in March 1988. Howard Rubinstein, a spokesman for Mr. Kalikow, wouldn't comment on the Post's losses since then but said, "The paper is bleeding; it's been hit hard financially." □

Defense ad theme shifts

By Janet Meyers

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Department of Defense is deep-sixing its "Opportunity is waiting for you" ad slogan, fearing it might scare off potential military recruits with visions of the parched Saudi Arabian desert.

A substitute theme, "Stand up. Stand out," will begin appearing in the next several weeks in magazine ads for the joint recruiting campaign that encompasses all military branches.

"With what's going on in the Middle East, we decided this message is more appropriate," said Lt. Col. Dave Fredrikson, assistant director of advertising for the joint recruiting command.

This is the first change in military ads brought about by the Middle East crisis. The Armed Forces spend about $200 million a year on advertising, $15 million to $20 million of which is spent by the joint recruiting command.

"Stand up" finished second to "Opportunity" in focus group tests when department recruiters were developing a new joint campaign a year ago.

Grey Advertising, New York, is the agency.

MIDDLE EAST CRISIS

While the print ads' graphics will remain the same, copy will shift its focus to patriotism from the educational benefits of military service.

A half-page spread will appear in the next several weeks in publications ranging from Hot Rod to Parade; TV isn't planned because of budget cutbacks.

Lt. Col. Fredrikson said the conflict hasn't affected enlistments yet.

"The recruiter on the street hasn't seen that much difference," he said. "The applicant is aware of what's going on overseas, but his reason for enlisting is still the same."

The Army plans no changes in its ads, said Lt. Col. Alex Angelle, chief of public affairs at the Army Recruiting Command. Young & Rubicam, New York, handles.

"We thought about making changes, but we decided not to," said Capt. Robert Kelly, director of recruitment advertising for the Navy, whose agency is BBDO Worldwide, New York. Changes couldn't be made soon enough on TV spots slated to break during October sporting events, he said.

The National Guard's advertising won't change, said Doug Laughlin, VP-management supervisor for Bozell, New York, which handles the account. "American at their best," the current theme "seems to fit this occasion pretty well," he said.

The Air Force, also at Bozell, will stick with its longtime "Aim high" theme.

The Marine Corps, which may produce a new spot this fall in its continuing "We're looking for a few good men" campaign, has no plans for change. J. Walter Thompson USA, Atlanta, handles. □

KVIL-AM/FM in Dallas and WGN-AM in Chicago must get a lot of unsolicited resumes.

These two stations were the only ones to receive more than 100 votes in a survey conducted by James H. Duncan Jr., asking 600 radio station managers which stations they admire most.

Despite the advertising community's tendency to send radio dollars to Los Angeles—six of the top 10 billing stations are in Los Angeles—only two Los Angeles stations are among the 10 most admired by station managers.

The ability to pull in ad dollars doesn't seem to factor among station managers. For example, WRBQ-AM/-FM in Tampa, Fla., is the fifth most respected station but No. 26 in billing volume. No. 1-rated KVIL is the 15th largest billing station.

Radio rebuilds its ad base

While Sears and GM flee, medium more viable for others

By Wayne Walley

Item: Burger King Corp. is cooking up a strategy to use more radio advertising in its battle to dent the domination of McDonald's Corp., and could boost spending by 50%.

Item: Volkswagen of America, as a hedge against the increasing cost of TV time, has more than doubled radio spending.

Item: Xerox Corp. will move a radio-only call-in campaign nationwide, after the campaign's successful test in Phoenix.

Item: Anheuser-Busch Cos. called its summer promotion, "Budweiser Rock and Roll Summit," "the largest rock 'n' and roll radio event in Budweiser's 114-year history."

That's all welcome news to local radio stations and national radio networks, smarting from radio advertising cutbacks by such stalwarts as General Motors Corp. and Sears, Roebuck & Co.

With Burger King, Volkswagen, Anheuser-Busch and other marketers planning major radio schedules this year, the outlook in 1990 is for the industry to show the steady growth in ad revenues that characterized the medium during the last decade.

Radio Advertising Bureau estimates 1990 radio ad revenues will top $9 billion for the first time, up 7% from 1989. Last year, radio ad revenues increased 6.6% from 1988 to $8.4 billion.

And many industry watchers believe radio is poised for massive growth in the '90s, with sales of $22 billion predicted by the year 2000. This averages out to a 9% annual increase.

"Radio more than other media has the flexibility, the marketability, the promotability and the price to fit advertisers' needs as a primary or secondary medium," says Tony Miraglia, VP-general manager, CBS Radio Representatives, New York.

Louis Severine, senior VP-director of sales for ABC Radio Networks, says radio has consistently increased revenues every year since the early 1950s.

Although ABC lost GM for the first half of 1990, Mr. Severine says VW, Audi of America, Marriott Corp., B.F. Goodrich, TGI Friday's, USA Network, Whirlpool Corp., NutraSweet Co., Noxell Corp., H.J. Heinz USA and FTD/Florists' Transworld

Why radio? Shops gird for queries

As marketers look for ad alternatives, agencies build some savvy responses

By Laura Loro

Ad agencies, struggling to justify incessantly increasing TV prices to cost-conscious clients, are giving another listen to the thriftier alternative of radio.

"People are examining radio more [now] than in the past five or six years," says Sam Michaelson, VP-radio, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, who founded the agency's radio department in 1976.

Clients are asking questions about radio, she says. "Those questions will turn into dollars."

For example, Florida Citrus Commission, a Saatchi client, used radio to promote grapefruit juice in 35 markets last year. Because of the campaign's success, a similar radio effort will run in October for orange juice in about 25 markets, says Eugene Richmond, director of advertising and promotion.

As a result, Mr. Richmond says the commission will spend $2 million this year on radio—double last year's amount.

Similar increases elsewhere coincide with an improved perception agencies have of radio, leading them to direct dollars earmarked for other media into radio.

"Budgets get tighter, and people look at alternatives," says Denise Beaudoin, broadcast manager at CPM Inc., a media-buying service in Chicago. "Radio is one of those options."

According to Ms. Beaudoin, the Wags chain of Marriott Corp., a CPM client, boosted its portion of dollars allocated to radio from 15% last year to 60% this year. As a result, the TV portion of the budget shrank from 85% to 40%.

> "Radio is expensive for an agency to buy. If you change the commission structure and the vendor does more work, the incentive to use radio is much greater."

CPM also encouraged Quintessence Inc. to enter the radio world this year. The cosmetics company spent an estimated $300,000 in 10 markets to promote its Nouvage nail polish for six weeks.

"We did buy radio on an upfront basis and realized some nice savings," Ms. Beaudoin says.

In addition to satisfying budget-conscious clients, agencies are being encouraged to investigate radio through changes in agency compensation systems and incentive plans based on clients meeting established sales goals.

Many agencies have avoided radio simply because the compensation realized from radio buys under the traditional commission system didn't justify incurring the expenses in evaluating the radio options and placing a buy.

"Radio, despite a low price, is expensive for an agency to buy," says Ralph Guild, chairman of Interep Radio Store. "The commission fee the agency gets vs. the time to execute the buy meant an agency could lose money," he says. "If you change the commission structure and the vendor does more of the work, the incentive to use radio is much greater."

Although agencies see radio in a better light, they realize that their creative output must improve to maintain their clients' interest in the medium.

Observers say good radio spots often are tougher to create than TV, and agencies prefer the more glamorous world of TV.

"Radio is often written by junior copywriters. Senior copywriters and creative directors generally are doing TV and great print," says Harley Flaum, president, Radio Band of America, New York, which creates radio advertising for such clients as Xerox Corp., McDonald's Corp., Sony Corp. of America, and agencies such as W.B. Doner & Co. and Zechman & Associates, both Chicago.

"There is a built-in prejudice in the agency system against good radio creative," he says.

This lack of outstanding creative output stems from a misunderstanding of the medium, says Charlie Breen, exec VP and co-creative director at Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

"They think radio ads should consist of a song or should have an announcer," he says. "People think radio is an information medium when it is really an image medium as well."

Another area where agencies go wrong is by trying to put a TV idea on radio—a concept that doesn't play. Advertising needs to be done just for radio, says Hunter Murtaugh, senior VP-music director, Young & Rubicam, New York.

"What makes a good radio spot is the in-

Delivery Association are in for the first half or full year as new or returning advertisers after at least a year's absence.

Gary Langstaff, exec VP-marketing for Burger King, says the fast-food chain's radio spending in 1990 could increase by as much as 50% to an estimated $36 million. This would represent about 18% of the company's total ad spending.

"There is an option now with radio," Mr. Langstaff said at the Radio Advertising Bureau's workshop this summer. "Segmentation is the marketing of the future, and radio excels in targeting specific consumer segments."

The fast-food chain used a series of radio programs tied to the Fourth of July and Labor Day holiday weekends.

William Gelgota, director of marketing for Volkswagen of America, says the high cost of TV time forced the company to seek other media for its message.

"We used radio sparingly in the third quarter last year, [but] this time we're in all year long," Mr. Gelgota says. "We didn't just double radio spending, but increased it in multiples."

Volkswagen's agency, DDB Needham Worldwide, Detroit, is using a "personal media network" philosophy and suggested radio to add frequency to the automaker's "fahrvergnugen" campaign.

"It's worked well," Mr. Gelgota says. "The creative and the frequency of impressions has even prompted the dealer organization, always strong for TV, to shift some weight to radio, too."

The decision last year to establish a separate creative unit for radio by Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, also underscores what seems to be a new emphasis on radio in the ad community. The agency doubled its radio ad production spending in 1989 and expects to double it again this year.

"Advertisers are not letting agencies ignore radio anymore," says Ralph Guild, chairman of Interep Radio Store.

Mr. Guild says his sales rep company alone could do up to $550 million in business this year, thanks to the addition of new advertisers, including Black & Decker and Walt Disney Co.'s Buena Vista Pictures Marketing, and new business from several New York agencies, including BBDO Worldwide, Foote, Cone & Belding, Lois/GGK and Wells, Rich, Greene.

"Radio has emerged as a medium of interest again to clients," says J. Walter Reed, senior VP-corporate director of spot broadcast for FCB. "Colgate is looking at radio when historically they haven't."

Radio also is expected to play a key role this year in Bertolli's testing of a new olive oil spray and in Miller Brewing Co.'s regional Leinenkugel beer.

Nutri/System Inc., which has enlisted radio personalities across the country in its marketing campaign, will continue to set aside at least 50% of its ad budget for radio. "We make this commitment to radio for one reason only: it works," says James Millard, VP-communications for Nutri/System.

Xerox, as another example, recently completed a radio-only campaign as a test in Phoenix, handled by Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York. Of all the people who called in because of the spot, 25% bought the product, the agency says, adding Xerox plans to expand the campaign nationwide.

Results like this have led Xerox Office Products dealers to increase radio spending from 15% of their total ad expenditures in 1987 to 20% today, while reducing newspaper spending, says Charlie Blackmon, manager-advertising and sales promotion.

But some previous radio stalwarts are taking a leave of absence from the medium.

General Motors will not be using radio to introduce its upcoming Saturn automobile line. It's also bypassed radio for print and TV in the initial phase of a campaign designed to extol GM's improved quality.

And Sears has decided to try other media. Although the company directs a sizable amount of its advertising budget to network radio—it was the largest network radio advertiser in this year's first quarter—it has directed more of its budget into network and cable TV, says Tom Morris, VP-marketing for the Sears Merchandise Group.

"Overall, we're not spending less on advertising; we're just changing our mix of media," Mr. Morris says.

Whether these advertisers will return remains to be seen.

But as Mr. Severine notes, there is growth despite the 25% attrition rate among advertisers in the medium.

Warren Potash, president of the Radio Advertising Bureau, says many advertisers are starting to recognize radio's ability to target audiences, and agencies are being given more incentive to use the medium.

"In TV, they sell target audiences of 18 to 49 or 25 to 54. That's not a demographic, that's a family reunion," Mr. Potash says.

"Advertisers are realizing the efficient way to reach a smaller target is on radio."

"One of the terrific things about radio is it can be highly targeted in terms of stations' formats and in terms of programs," says Mr. Blackmon.

"[Radio] is really a delivery system. We are buying listeners in the most targeted, cost-efficient manner we can," says Ben Bishop, senior VP-management, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago. □

Radio reps take the initiative

One-stop shopping booms

By Laura Loro

Agencies can hardly be faulted for forgoing radio when it comes down to a cost-benefit analysis. It boils down to a clear-cut case of economics.

Up to 60¢ of every $1 in commission paid to an agency for radio spots goes to cover costs incurred in placing those spots. In comparison, labor costs realized in placing TV spots eat up only 10¢ of every $1 in commission, says Ralph Guild, chairman, Interep Radio Store.

To bring these costs more in line and encourage advertisers and agencies to consider radio, radio rep companies are doing more of the labor themselves.

"Reps have more resources now to do one-stop shopping," says Jim Carnegie, editor and publisher of the newsletter Radio Business Report.

With one-stop shopping, an agency can maintain contact with one individual at a rep company who helps the agency coordinate research; determine how much radio to use and what stations to buy; and place buys, even on stations the representative does not rep.

Mr. Guild believes one-stop shopping could make buying radio as profitable for agencies as network TV.

At Interep, which owns six national radio rep companies, reps have gone beyond the traditional route of calling on media buyers and now are dealing more with the planners and account execs, Mr. Guild says.

"The fact is print has been doing this for 50 years," Mr. Guild says.

By providing one-stop services, rep company employees can get into the agency before buyers know about potential deals, Mr. Guild says.

Katz Radio Group has expanded its business and marketing efforts, according to President Ken Swetz. Katz is comprised of six national rep companies, including recently acquired Eastman Radio. Combined annual revenue should top $600 million.

New-business pitches likely will tout the entire radio rep group, rather than a single rep. "We can deliver the total marketplace rather than individual stations," Mr. Swetz says.

"In the past, agency radio buyers would contact stations through their individual reps one at a time and negotiate a schedule. Now you can negotiate with one person" for all stations, says Ken Sacharin, associate media director, Young & Rubicam, San Francisco.

But other agency media executives disagree on whether rep companies are expediting the radio buy.

"Katz may own six rep firms, but you still have an individual from each rep firm. You still have to call six places," says Pat Cuda, senior VP-broadcast director, Ross Roy Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich. "It is still as dispersed as it was."

teresting use of sound perspective —dialogue, colloquial speech— not just an announcer, and actors rather than announcers," Mr. Murtaugh says.

Along with Saatchi & Saatchi and Young & Rubicam, Backer Spielvogel Bates has spun off a separate radio division. It formed a Radio Task Force in May 1989 to underscore the agency's commitment to radio. BSB's $131.6 million in radio billings placed it third among agencies in radio spending last year.

Consolidation intensifies net fight

By Laura Loro

For advertisers in network radio, it's a case of the saying, "The more things change, the more they stay the same."

The recent wave of consolidations among networks has left four major players to fight each other and a surprising number of newcomers for ad dollars.

But advertisers see little change in doing business with these leaner networks, and total ad revenues are expected to continue growing at about the same pace.

Network radio accounted for $427 million of last year's $8.5 billion in total radio advertising revenue, and a 7% increase is expected this year, according to the Radio Network Association.

Radio network ad revenues totaled $202.7 million in the first half of 1990, up 2.6% for the same '89 period.

Sam Michaelson, VP-radio, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, says audience duplication is a concern. But in general, she's pleased with the changes.

Dealing with fewer remaining players—at one time there were 20 radio networks—makes it easier for agencies to negotiate and buy spots, Ms. Michaelson says. Plus, she adds, "the product is still excellent."

Kathy Segal, VP-director of media planning for BBDO, Chicago, describes the post-consolidation state of radio as "business as usual."

Ben Bishop, senior VP-management supervisor, D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Chicago, has had no problems with the network reconfigurations. He notes, however, that the networks will have to keep their listeners for this repackaging to succeed.

Consolidation of networks has created consolidation in programming formats, says Jim Carnegie, editor and publisher of Radio Business Report, an industry newsletter. "We're seeing most of the networks dropping youth programs and repackaging them for the 25-to-54 demo. There is no money in youth programs."

Supporting Mr. Carnegie's claim are recent actions by CBS Radio Networks and Westwood One, parent company of NBC Radio Networks and Mutual Broadcasting System.

CBS combined its CBS RadioRadio and part of the CBS Radio Network to form CBS Spectrum Radio, aimed at the same age group.

"Ad budgets targeting 18-to-34 [-year-olds] were significantly decreased, so it made sense" to create CBS Spectrum, says Robert Kipperman, VP-general manager, CBS Radio Networks.

Aside from mentioning an increase in business-to-business advertising on Spectrum, a network spokesman refused to discuss advertisers gained or lost.

Westwood One merged several non-rated programs into WONE, a RADAR-rated network pitched at 25-to-54-year-olds. Although WONE's programming has attracted listeners, no new advertisers so far have signed up solely because of WONE, says William Battison, president and chief financial officer of Westwood One.

Nicholas Verbitsky, president of Unistar Radio Networks, says the formation of his network, the result of last spring's merger between United Stations Radio Networks and Transtar Radio Networks, "gives us a more diversified product line to sell to advertisers."

In addition to enhancing their chances of survival—"smaller networks merged to put cost structures together and to increase their revenues and margins," says Mr. Battison—consolidations allow the players to sell higher-rated networks at a higher price.

"Networks sell on ratings. Bigger affiliates and better ratings mean more dollars," Mr. Carnegie says.

Ad rates didn't change with the consolidations at ABC Radio Networks. But CBS increased rates an unspecified amount when its Spectrum Radio network debuted in January. Rates went up partly due to increased audience and partly due to less inventory, Mr. Kipperman says.

ABC, which according to RADAR draws 55% of network listeners, reduced the number of its networks from seven to five to be more competitive with TV audience figures.

"A 4 rating on Prime network in AM drive—that's more than 'Good Morning America,'" says Louis Severine, senior VP-director of sales, ABC Radio Networks.

But as the networks consolidate, they will have to fend off smaller players that may capitalize on holes in programming.

For example, Public Interest Affiliates wrested away the National Basketball Association radio contract from ABC last March.

Initially the NBA was concerned about joining forces with a relatively obscure network. But marketing ideas, such as naming the network NBA Radio Network, sealed the deal, says PIA President Brad Saul.

"There will always be room for a little entrepreneur with good programming," says Mr. Battison, who cited other players such as EFM Media and Preview Radio Network. "They are not selling tonnage, they are selling talent and a limited number of advertisers."

Other specialized networks are trying to sell specialized audiences, but they could face an uphill battle.

Imagination Stations, a children's network, was launched on March 31 with an Orlando affiliate. It went national in mid-August with 24-hour programming and had signed on five affiliates at presstime.

But another national children's network, Kidwaves Radio Network, has pushed its debut back from April to October. The format, targeting 2-to-11-year-old listeners, has only one affiliate to date and is trying to sell national advertisers without ratings, which only measure listeners ages 12 and older.

Another niche player, The Nashville Network Radio, a joint venture between Group W and Opryland USA that started in December 1988, ceased its 24-hour live operation in June because it didn't enlist enough affiliates. However, TNNR still offers programs as a syndicator.

One way the larger consolidated networks have kept the smaller players from stealing business from the fringes is to buy them. In June, for example, Unistar bought a 50% stake in the Financial News Network.

These mergers help to increase a network's ad revenues without needing affiliates to clear time for additional network programs.

Radio stations lately have balked at clearing slots for network programs because they can make up to 10 times more on local spot ads than on network placements.

Mr. Carnegie, however, thinks the networks will stay quiet for a year. "They have too much on their plate right now," he comments.

"But how much the greed factor goes into it . . . well, greed and fear can be motivating factors." □

Spectrum, Paul Harvey in catbird seat

By Wayne Walley

CBS Radio's Spectrum network remained the country's most popular radio network, according to RADAR 41, the latest biannual network radio ratings survey. Spectrum's audience, averaging almost 2.8 million listeners ages 12 and older, rose 5% from the winter survey.

Spectrum topped Unistar's Super network with 2.3 million listeners, and ABC Radio's Information network's 2.2 million listeners, according to the research compiled by Statistical Research.

The network rankings, however, could change within the next few weeks as both ABC Radio Networks and Westwood One Cos. will issue updated reports based on the realignment of their respective networks for ad sales for the 1991 broadcast year.

Both companies recently followed CBS and Unistar and restructured networks in an attempt to increase audience size and make network radio easier to buy. (See story on Page S-6.)

While ABC specifically consolidated its seven networks into five, Westwood One is waiting for special SRI tabulations before detailing its network realignment.

In the meantime, Westwood One's networks showed marked improvement in RADAR 41, helping quell rumors the company is shopping its Mutual Broadcasting System and NBC Radio Network.

"The rumors are completely unfounded," says William Battison, president-chief financial officer of Westwood One.

"They are not for sale. We just had one of the best RADAR reports we've had," he says.

Mutual ranked seventh among radio networks with an average quarter-hour audience of almost 1.7 million, an 11.7% increase over the previous survey.

Westwood One wasn't the only company with good news from the latest survey. Of the 17 networks rated in RADAR 41, 11 showed increased audiences.

ABC's FM network, targeting an audience ages 12 to 34, showed the biggest percentage gain, growing 18.2% to almost 1.2 million listeners.

Paul Harvey certainly had a good day. His 8:30 a.m. weekday news show for ABC Radio Networks remained the most-listened-to network radio show with an average audience of 5.6 million. Mr. Harvey's four other radio programs ranked second through fifth.

The biggest loser in the report was Sheridan Broadcasting Network. Its average audience of 411,000 reflected a 19.7% drop in average listenership. □

You Can Never Know Enough.

Upfront sales seen static; nets upbeat

By Wayne Walley

With Labor Day rest and relaxation behind them, radio network executives are getting worked up for the crucial upfront buying season.

The radio upfront season doesn't compare with the fast-paced, short-term feeding frenzy—replete with 3 a.m. sales calls—common to network TV's $4 billion-plus upfront marketplace. But for those in radio, a strong 1991 upfront season could verify the opinion that advertisers are looking at the medium with more interest.

This season's take is expected to total between $175 million and $200 million, roughly the same as last year. The upfront season will account for about 40% of the $457 million expected to be placed in network radio next year, according to Radio Advertising Bureau.

Although the upfront season is predicted to duplicate last year's sales total, most sellers are optimistic about the 1991 season.

"We expect a good upfront," says William Battison, president-chief financial officer for Westwood One. "The idea of an economic recession bodes well for cost-efficient media. Planners and media buyers tend to increase the percentage of spending to network radio because they can get more gross impressions."

A good upfront season also would rescue network radio from what Louis Severine, senior VP-director of sales, ABC Radio Networks, describes as a "horrendous" first half of 1990.

An influx of spending by foreign car companies such as Subaru of America, Audi of America and Volkswagen of America have helped sales in the second half, he says, adding these companies could be big upfront players later this month.

Buyers also foresee heightened interest in the upfront market.

"This is the tightest the third-quarter scatter has been for network radio in eight or nine years," says Liz Russo, VP-radio, Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

Unlike TV, a strong preceding scatter market does not necessarily signal a strong upfront. Regardless, those in radio expect network radio spending for 1991 to increase 5% to 10% over 1990's projected $427 million.

So far Procter & Gamble Co. and Campbell Soup Co. have made upfront deals with ABC, though Mr. Severine declined to discuss specifics.

He says about five accounts were involved in the upfront in the late 1970s, but now almost all network radio buyers want in early.

"The essence is to get more than you paid for with a guaranteed audience," says Sam Michaelson, VP-radio, Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

"You get the same benefits in radio as with TV's upfront: more inventory is available and pricing is lower," Ms. Russo says.

While TV sells as much as 70% to 80% of its commercial inventory in the upfront market, radio networks usually limit sales to less than 50%, according to industry sources.

"The question becomes how much [advertising] do you take on at excellent rates and how much do you pass up, [gambling that demand will remain strong for the following scatter market]," says Dick Siligpini, VP-sales at CBS Radio Networks.

Many wonder what will be the ultimate effect of the radio network industry's consolidation on the upfront market.

ABC Radio Networks, CBS Radio Networks, Unistar and Westwood One, the four major network operations, have all reconfigured networks to create entities with bigger ratings and less inventory.

"If you want to tailor a package and have exclusivity, this year you have to do it earlier," Ms. Russo says. "The only downfall of buying in advance is stations can change formats overnight and change the audience."

Unit rates for the 1991 broadcast year are expected to double, but sellers are quick to point out that buyers will get the same efficiencies because ratings for the new networks also will double.

"What's the difference if the ratings you get are doubled?" asks a network official.

The consolidation of networks for sales purposes also creates another issue: duplication. One network source predicts, "This will be the issue of the upfront."

While some buyers and sellers believe duplication could cause problems, Mr. Battison says it merely gives advertisers more frequency.

"[Network reconfigurations] are a win-win situation," says Ms. Michaelson. "To go from a 0.7 rating to a 1.2 helps give the market a defining edge, and it's a positive thing for clients. Duplicity is the buyer's problem."

"Network radio is buying tonnage and getting a certain audience," says Bart McHugh, senior VP-director of radio and TV programming, DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. "And because of the restructuring you have to pay much closer attention to where you double up." □

Shifting season

Sam Michaelson wants to be upfront: There's no real upfront radio buying season, she says.

The VP-radio at Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York, says she doesn't participate in what is considered the upfront market because her clients buy radio according to their fiscal year. But she does buy radio time in advance for advertisers according to each of their fiscal years.

Others admit the radio upfront season isn't compressed into a specific two- or three-week time period like its television counterpart, but insist it does exist.

Louis Severine, senior VP-director of sales, ABC Radio Networks, says some clients such as Procter & Gamble Co. and Campbell Soup Co. made upfront deals as early as June this year, signaling the start of the selling season. But, he says, most advertisers wait until after Labor Day, and the buying season peaks in November.

Mr. Severine says advertisers buy according to one of several 12-month plans: broadcast year [starting in September], fiscal year [starting in July] or calendar year.

"There's usually a mad rush after Thanksgiving through the end of the year, but the upfront selling season is a long period of time and stretches into January for some clients," he says.

No One Can See The Future, But We Know Where You Can Hear It.

Unlike some radio stations that seem hopelessly entrenched in the past, we've always prided ourselves as being rather forward thinking.

It's always been our belief that radio should be spontaneous. Irreverent. It shouldn't be afraid to take chances.

That's why we've got guys who speak their minds, like Jonathon Brandmeier, Steve and Garry, Kevin Matthews, Chet Coppock, and Ed Tyll. And people like Bob Stroud, Bobby Skafish, and John Fisher who have a real passion for rock and roll, both old and new.

Put them all together and you've got too much entertainment for one radio station. Which is why we have two. The LOOP FM 98 for great rock music, and WLUP AM 1000 for comedy, sports and candid conversation.

So tune in to one or the other. Because if you appreciate radio that leans toward the unpredictable, you have a future with us.

SPEAKING WITH AUTHORITY

Details, details; buyers sound off

By Laura Loro

Advocates of radio advertising want to clear the air among media buyers and planners. The long-standing perception that radio is a difficult, time-consuming medium to plan and purchase is just not true, say those representing radio's interests.

"The fact is that radio has never been easier to buy, due to computerization and consolidation of both reps and networks," says Laurence Norjean, senior VP-sales and marketing of the Radio Advertising Bureau.

"In the past if [agencies] wanted to do a special promotion in more than 20 markets, they had to do it on a market-by-market basis," he says. "Now the reps do it. It's centralized buying, centralized promotion and centralized merchandising."

The manpower and hours required for agencies to put their advertisers on the radio are much less as a result, Mr. Norjean says.

"There are fewer people to negotiate with, and because of the tonnage, they can do better deals," he says, adding that reps also will handle all the paperwork for agencies.

Advertising Age contacted some media directors to see if they are buying what Mr. Norjean and his counterparts are selling.

Dave Capano, senior VP-director of media, BBDO, Atlanta

"From the physical standpoint of gathering information and having it available, yes, it is true.

"It makes the number-crunching easier. The ability to get instantaneous information is an asset.

"But the actual implementation and execution of the buy is as complicated or more complicated than in the past.

"Information is available now so you can trend the information more easily. You can look at more factors to influence your buy. So the actual art of negotiation and execution of the buy is harder than in the past.

"Radio is very labor-intensive. For [BBDO client Delta Air Lines] we do an awful lot of evaluation on a market-by-market basis. We write each market separately —and the historical background of the market. We go into a lot of detail."

Pat Cuda, senior VP-broadcast director, Ross Roy Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich.

"Computerization makes the job of buying radio easier. It is not as manual as it used to be.

"We have the capability to instantly get rankings and audience segmentation. You can pull whatever you want right from the screen. And you can trend from [previous ratings] books.

"With the new wave of network radio [consolidations], it doesn't take as many spots. They've combined [their networks] to give you a better number in terms of audience delivery. It takes using, say, five networks rather than seven or eight to get the same reach.

"But I have said to the radio representative world that they are their own worst enemy.

"They are relentless in telling me 'I am the best.' The driving force behind the sales world is commission. This is tunnel vision.

"I say, take a deep breath, step back and really analyze the best buy for the client. Be client-driven for once."

Ken Sacharin, associate media director, Young & Rubicam, San Francisco

"I would concur with [Mr. Norjean's statement].

"We've seen a greater and greater use of unwired radio network buys. It takes out a lot of administrative hassle.

"We work out what stations are appropriate for our client. [The rep] helps us out with the legwork and merchandising requirements. They do the notification of stations and all the administrative work that goes along with a buy."

Jill Ditton, VP-associate media director, Tucker Wayne/Luckie & Co., Atlanta

"Physically it is easier to orde —one phone call, one tape, on invoice. But it doesn't make an difference to me in planning it.

"Planning radio is a difficul process on the accounts I wor on [American Cyanamid pesti cides]. We still have to do it on county-by-county basis."

Ratings slugfest can't produce winner

Arbitron, Birch/Scarborough each keep loyalists

By Anne Moncreiff Arrarte

In the scientific world of audience measurement and research, agency media buyers are using a very unscientific method to select their sources of radio data: personal preference.

Arbitron Co. and Birch/Scarborough-VNU have clashed over methodology, response rates and extra services to win the lion's share of the radio ratings market. But this battle has not produced a clear-cut winner, and until one of the two offers substantive qualitative data, the agency community will continue to vacillate between the two sources.

Joshua Ostroff, VP-manager of media resources, Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, switched back to Arbitron last year after three years with Birch. He says his main complaint with Birch is its numbers fluctuate too much from book to book.

"It is a question of lesser evils," he says. "Arbitron may not be technically superior, but the universe they measure exhibits fewer inexplicable variations between books."

Jon Swallen, VP-associate director of media research, Ogilvy & Mather, New York, switched from Arbitron to Birch in mid-1987 primarily because he felt that Arbitron's diary method is more likely to be affected by a response bias.

"Some comparisons we did led us to believe that Arbitron was overstating in older demographic groups and understating in younger ones," he says.

Still, O&M buys both services. "We use Birch as our primary source, but we think it is important to have two services for the checks and balances they provide," Mr. Swallen says.

Arbitron, which has been measuring radio listening since 1966, uses a seven-day diary system.

Rob Porazinski

The method inherently provides lower reponse rates (45.6%). But its proponents say it allows for a more accurate seven-day cume, or total audience, because it uses seven days of information.

Birch, which has a 60% response rate, performs one-day telephone interviews and uses a mathematical formula to arrive at its seven-day cume, a method some media buyers question. But Birch's person-to-person interviewing means it can collect some basic qualitative data for clients that Arbitron does not offer.

Birch, which broke into the business in 1980, was purchased in 1987 by VNU, United Dutch Publishing, and merged with Scarborough. On Aug. 31, Birch claimed it surpassed Arbitron to be the leader in market monitoring with more than 265 markets measured.

Each company has one-upped the other in various areas.

Arbitron is actively working to increase response rates and, specifically, to improve their ethnic market measurements—an area in which Birch's phone-call methodology has been more successful.

For example, an ad hoc group of Spanish-language radio executives and agency and client media buyers endorsed Birch as the primary provider of data on Spanish-language listening levels. However, mirroring the general market, many agency media buyers continue to use both sources when evaluating Spanish-language radio stations.

Birch, meanwhile, has rolled out an annual County Coverage book to compete with a similar Arbitron product.

And to assist Birch subscribers, Scarborough expanded the number of markets it serves from 11 to 50. According to Birch/Scarborough President Bill Livek, Scarborough plans on entering another 50 markets and creating a faster data delivery service for clients.

Birch/Scarborough also r

Country exploding out of its shell

Experts look at future of top formats—with some surprising conclusions

By Alicia Lasek

The war being waged on the radio dial is not one of attrition but one of addition, judging from the number of attempts to launch new programming niches.

Although the introduction of new formats seemingly would entice new listeners, to some extent fragmentation inevitably has an impact on the tried-and-true formats. Advertising Age asked industry insiders to look at the future of eight fundamental radio formats.

Classical

Classical may soon abandon commercial radio airwaves and be found only on compact discs, public radio and cable audio, say Messrs. Douglas and Shane.

Mr. Douglas says classical listeners make the greatest demand for music presented without announcers or commercials, and they can get this from cable audio.

Mr. Shane says radio will have problems pleasing the broad range of classical listeners' tastes. As a result, he predicts classical aficionados will stick to CDs.

"The way advertisers are going to have to reach the classical audience is through support of local arts groups," he adds.

But Mr. Parikhal thinks classical has strong growth potential, as aging baby-boomers look for an alternative to rock.

Cable audio is no threat to the format, he says.

"If you are so serious about music that you'd figure out what was on each channel, you're much more likely to make tapes."

And advertisers should take a second look at classical stations, he says.

"I wouldn't get caught in the stereotype that all people who listen to classical belong to country clubs."

"The black economy in America is greater than the [gross national product] of Canada," Mr. Douglas says. "And when people start to adjust to that, they'll start to understand that there is a real market there that can be exploited."

Yet Mr. Shane sees one problem that's stopped many advertisers from going into urban contemporary. "There's still a lot of prejudice in the white [advertising] community about urban radio," he says.

"The black economy in America is greater than the [GNP] of Canada. And when people start to adjust to that, they'll start to understand that there is a real market there that can be exploited."—Dwight Douglas However, Ms. Chambers predicts the format and its image are not likely to change. She notes that buyers see classical listeners as a very select, older group.

Urban contemporary

The urban audience outlook is thumbs-up, say the experts.

They see growth coming from Hispanics crossing over into urban contemporary listening and in new stations that are catering to an older black demographic.

But Ms. Chambers warns buyers to look carefully at an urban contemporary station's demographics.

"Some urbans tend to be very young, and if they go the direction of rap, they lose everyone over the age of 20."

The insiders think the format does offer a lot more advertising potential than is being realized.

Adult contemporary

The consultants generally see bright things ahead for those airing this format.

"I think adult contemporary is here forever in one form or another, until this generation goes to the grave," Mr. Parikhal says.

However, they also think adult contemporary must address several challenges.

Mr. Douglas predicts the top stations will stand out because of their marketing, not their music.

"Your marketing has to be really understandable, because as [adult contemporary stations] researched their music they all came up with the same songs," he says.

Another concern is that the aging listenership will fragment into several categories in the same 35-to-49 age cell, forcing advertisers to buy other formats to complete their coverage.

"Being able to take a rock station and an adult contemporary station makes more sense," says Mr. Douglas. "You're covering a wider, broader spectrum."

Mr. Nielsen adds, "The advertiser really has a 25-to-54 age cell that is not only represented with [contemporary hit radio and album oriented rock] stations, but with a lot of adult contemporary stations."

This fragmentation already is taking place, says Ms. Chambers.

"There might be as many as eight ACs in a market, but they'll all have something a little bit different about them."

Mr. Parikhal cautions advertisers to be especially careful about ad placement practices by many adult contemporary stations.

"[These stations] often run as many as seven commercials back-to-back," he says. "You don't have to be Einstein to know that if you're listening, by the time you hear the fifth commercial, you're out of there."

Contemporary hit radio

The experts see contemporary hit radio evolving in different ways.

Mr. Shane feels the format faces three problems: demographics, as the post-baby-boom "birth dearth" reduces the format's target listenership; music, in that contemporary hit radio "has always been an artist-driven format, and right now, we have such disposable artists"; and the lack of a mass culture, as the diverse tastes of today's youths preclude a pop star from capturing an entire generation the way the Beatles did in the mid-1960s.

Mr. Parikhal raises two additional factors working against contemporary hit radio: competition from MTV and a Top 40 market that is becoming increasingly polarized between heavy metal and rap.

But Mr. Douglas and Mr. Parikhal chide companies for ignoring contemporary hit radio's audience.

"Buyers must realize that there is an incredible amount of money being spent—and influenced spending—between ages 2 and 18," Mr. Douglas says.

"The idea that all contemporary hit radio listeners do is buy bubble gum is corporate irresponsibility," Mr. Parikhal states.

Some insiders also say contemporary hit radio's demographics go beyond teens. Musical tastes don't change overnight, Mr. Bolinger says.

"There are people really at any age from 12 until 44 who are potential listeners to CHR," he says. Mr. Douglas notes that many contemporary hit radio stations fare well among 25-plus listeners.

News/talk

Again, the insiders disagree on this format's viability.

Some feel listeners always will have a need for news/talk information.

Country is "the only music being produced for adults. Paula Abdul [and] MC Hammer [are] not really making music for adults. Neil Diamond and Lionel Richie haven't made records in four years."—Ed Shane "News/talk has always been a mainstay in our country, and as our groups mature they will all gravitate toward a news/talk station," Ms. Chambers says.

Mr. Parikhal adds that news/talk listeners pay attention during commercials, "and I think that's a seriously underestimated value."

On the other hand, Mr. Shane says many news/talk stations are choosing the worse of two fates. One choice is to bring in younger listeners by catering to their interests. The other is "to be the most boring, non-related service on the band. And news/talk has chosen to be the most boring, non-related service on the band," he says.

Mr. Parikhal admits "news/talk is suffering a creative vacuum that needs to be filled."

Some news/talk programmers realize that what worked before won't work again.

Mr. Nadel notes the increased competition from cable TV news stations and other radio station newscasts has made the all-news radio station of 10 or 15 years ago obsolete. The solution is to offer better sound quality and other types of programming, such as sports event broadcasts.

Album oriented rock

The experts like the prospects for this format.

"People are trying to say its going to go away or its going to die, but it is a very strong format," Mr. Douglas says.

Some insiders think advertisers might not recognize the demographics of this listenership.

"Advertisers think album-oriented-rock listeners are all 19-year-old headbangers, but they're not. They're listening to hard rock or AOR in their Lexus."

He notes that men over 35 comprised 20% of the buyers of the Future of radio formats latest release from heavy metal band Guns N' Roses.

"I know there are some 35-year-old men in three-piece suits that still listen to AOR—though not openly," says Ms. Chambers.

However, station managers should be ready to fine-tune their niche, and advertisers should recognize these moves.

AOR stations "are running out of audience if they stay in the 18-to-34" category, Mr. Shane says. "So they have had to grow up with their audiences—and suddenly they become adult contemporary," adding that classic rock fares "awfully well."

B. Chambers

"[Stations] are going to have to decide: Are you going to be the No. 1 station for 18-to-34-year-old adults or are you going to be No. 1 in 25 to 54 and not compete with 18-to-34 stations?" Mr. Douglas says.

Country

In the experts' opinion, the aging population makes this format a future winner.

Country is "the only music being produced for adults," Mr. Shane says. "Think about it. Paula Abdul is not really making music for adults. MC Hammer is not really making music for adults. Neil Diamond and Lionel Richie haven't made records in four years."

As a result, advertisers have a potentially hot property on their hands.

"As America becomes grayer, country radio has an amazingly great future in terms of its viability to the advertisers," Mr. Douglas says.

Mr. Shane notes that while listening to a Houston country station one morning, he heard commercials from a Cadillac dealer and Mercedes-Benz. "I think advertisers hold the stigma that country [listeners are] these hicks who come in from the outlands who try to get free hats at the promotions," he says.

The reality, according to Mr. Sherman, is "there's not a stereotypical country listener any longer."

Mr. Parikhal says newer artists like Dwight Yoakum and k.d. lang have helped attract younger listeners while maintaining country's true sound.

Although Mr. Parikhal is upbeat on country, he points out its creative center, Nashville, is both geographically and culturally distant from the nation's growing urban areas, and today's Asian and Latin American immigrants have their own music and are less likely to tune in to country.

Oldies

It may be an oldie, but it's still a goodie, the experts say.

"Some of the popular, syndicated shows, on the weekend, for example, are oldies shows. 'It's Saturday night, let's listen to the oldies. Roll the carpet back, take our shoes off and do a little sock hop,' " Mr. Douglas says.

Ms. Chambers considers oldies a must-buy to reach 25-to-54-year-olds. The format "seems to have found a niche in every market," she says.

But some warn advertisers the format can work only as part of a package buy with other formats.

Mr. Douglas foresees fragmentation of the format into pre-Beatles, post-Beatles or '70s categories. As a result of this fragmentation, shares and cumulative ratings of these stations will decrease.

However, these stations' listenerships remain loyal to their stations, Mr. Douglas says.

Adds Mr. Shane, "If you can be everybody's No. 2 station, you have a really good audience." □

PEOPLE TO WATCH

Jim Thompson tried on a new hat late last year.

A 20-year TV veteran, Mr. Thompson turned off the four TV monitors in his office at KYW-TV, Philadelphia, where he was VP-general manager. Then he put on a baseball cap bearing the call letters KYW-AM and switched his radio on to WMMR-FM, the Philadelphia all-news and rock stations, respectively, that were now under his wing as the new president of Group W Radio.

In the short time he's spent in the post, Mr. Thompson, 43, has worked on selling ad time on his company's 20 radio stations, including 11 purchased last December for $360 million.

Mr. Thompson says he jumped at the Group W Radio post because he believes in the medium's immediacy. "There's more upside to radio right now, because TV's so caught up in fragmentation," he says.

Previously, advertisers wouldn't look past the glamor of TV and try other media. But today agencies and advertisers are accepting what radio can do, especially in light of today's uncertain economy. "They're starting to appreciate its value more," he observes.

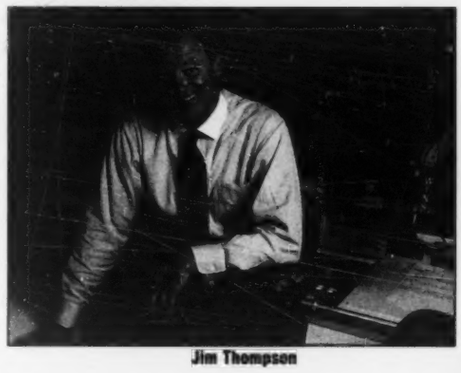
Mr. Thompson won't hesitate to go beyond tried-and-true tactics to sell advertisers on radio.

"I don't want to worry about [things like] 'Will this work?' or 'It's never been done before.' That's baloney," he says.

"Radio is a fun business. We'll have a few failures. But if we're not failing, we're not living on the edge."

One of Mr. Thompson's first moves was to institute an incentive program for new advertisers on Group W Radio's 20 stations. The first 20 companies that place $35,000 schedules at each station for the first quarter of 1991 will each win a trip for two to Super Bowl XXV in Tampa next January and a seven-day luxury cruise to Key West, Fla., and Cozumel, Mexico.

Mr. Thompson says 100 packages already have been sold; most of them to local advertisers. Half of this group is companies that have not used radio, and the others haven't used the medium for at least a year.



Jim Thompson

"That's $3.5 million in radio that wasn't there before," he says.

When not engineering such deals for the benefit of his company, Mr. Thompson is working to spark advertisers' interest in radio in general.

"I thought I could really affect change" as both a businessman and a community servant, he adds. "I respected the opportunity to have immediate input."

Mr. Thompson says Group W Radio will allocate $1 million over the next decade to seed and sponsor research to show radio advertising's effectiveness. The network will also establish a Radio Creative Fund, which will award $50,000 annually for creative excellence in radio advertising execution and results.

This fund hopefully will spur improved creative output, which Mr. Thompson sees as one of the problems with radio advertising.

"Doing radio commercials is one of the last places to have fun," he notes.

The company hopes to have the radio people meter within five years when the technology will be more affordable, he says.

Arbitron also is contemplating hooking up with a qualitative researcher.

"We are still in the initial stages" of considering such a move, Mr. Chasin says. "Qualitative is definitely the way of the future, although it is not the way of the present."

But agencies, fed up with paying for two services and an additional qualitative service, want this information soon.

"With an agency's increasingly tight financial resources, we cannot justify constantly re-evaluting numbers," Mr. Ostroff says. □

REVIEWING STAND

Top jocks schtick it to each other

By Joe Garofoli

It sounds like a simple idea. Call up controversial disc jockeys across the nation, such as those who run "morning zoo" shows, and find out who their favorite jocks are.

But uncovering who this breed of animal respects is easier said than done.

"Believe me, I'm not being arrogant. We're really funny," says Tom Griswold, WFBQ-FM, who's half of Indianapolis' top-rated Bob and Tom morning show.

Says veteran Gary Dee, who last appeared on WWWE, Cleveland: "Gary Dee creates an atomic bomb in any market he goes into."

One of his alleged explosions cost WWWE $8,000 in a fine levied last fall by the Federal Communications Commission for comments made by Mr. Dee that the commission said were "clearly capable of a specific sexual meaning."

Other jocks feel that stating an opinion isn't worth the effort.

Radio's reigning bad boy, Howard Stern of WXRK-FM in New York, didn't respond to repeated calls.

"Howard gets so many calls for interviews that he only responds to the ones he wants to," says an assistant to his agent. Adds a station employee, "He would say he has no peers."

And a management-type for WLUP's Jonathon Brandmeier in Chicago comments, "I don't think we want to do the story. If it was a feature on just us, OK. But you want to know who his three favorite DJs are? I think we'll pass."

Still, several jocks offered their selections of disc jockeys they think take the zookeeper genre a step beyond the pale—and even more views of Mr. Stern.

"[Mr. Stern] gets you listening, but it would be an effort for me to tune in every day," says Steve Hansen, part of the Jimmy and Steve morning show on WMYG-FM, Pittsburgh. "I don't hear any great comedic spark there."

"He's the most overrated DJ in the country," Mr. Griswold says. "He gives the rest of us in the business a bad name."

Mr. Dee begs to differ. He calls Mr. Stern "a creative volcano with a brilliant, Lenny Bruce-type mind."

Mark Thompson and Brian Phelps, KLOS-FM, Los Angeles, dragged out a few blasts from the past as some of their favorites.

Mr. Thompson remembers hearing John "Records" Landecker on WLS in Chicago in the mid-'70s. Topping Mr. Phelps' list are Larry Lujack, another WLS personality from that era, and Spike O'Dell of WGN in Chicago—who was known as "Spike at the Mike" in Davenport, Iowa, from 1978 to 1987.

Don Geronimo, WAVA-FM, Washington, says Mr. Brandmeier is his favorite; also on his list: Scott Shannon, KROQ-FM, Los Angeles; and WLUP-AM's Steve Dahl and Garry Meier.

That Mr. Geronimo's favorites often are at the center of a controversy comes as no surprise; Mr. Geronimo and his partner, Mike O'Meara, were suspended in May for criticizing their station on the air.

The Dahl-Meier team is one of Mr. Griswold's favorites, too. "There's nobody in the whole country doing what they're doing," he says.

Mr. Griswold also likes Michael Feldman, host of "Whad'ya Know?" the syndicated National Public Radio program. He says Mr. Feldman "has a good, dry wit. He's really funny."

Don Imus, at the all-sports station WFAN, New York, was also among those touted.

Mr. Dee calls Mr. Imus "a master of preparation. He'd stay up all night [preparing] for a three-minute bit." Mr. Imus also was one of the early idols of Doug "The Greaseman" Tracht of WWDC-FM, Washington.

Mr. Hansen happens to admire "The Greaseman."

"He can do some of the most amazing things with his voice that I've ever heard," Mr. Hansen says.

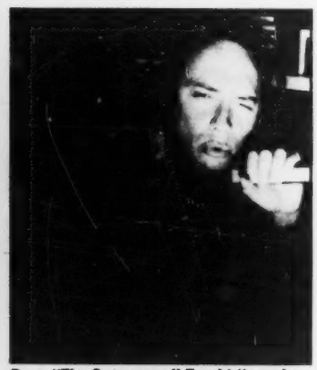
Although most of the jocks selected are known for their schtick, one was chosen for his mastery of music. Mr. Phelps calls Steve Downes, KLOS' nighttime personality, "a straight-ahead DJ, in terms of song to song."

Another perspective comes from Patty McEntee, director of public relations for Media in Morality, a New York organization that's backed the FCC in skirmishes with radio stations and often works to muzzle the morning zookeepers.

Ms. McEntee deferred when asked for her three favorite radio personalities.

"I don't think I could name any. I don't listen to the radio much, except when I'm driving. Then I listen to cassettes." □

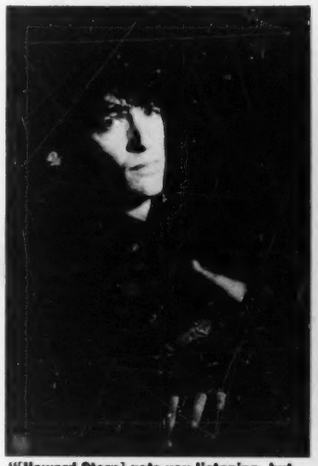
Joe Garofoli is a reporter for the Milwaukee Journal.



Doug "The Greaseman" Tracht "can do some of the most amazing thin[illegible]th his voice that I've ever heard," [illegible]says fellow disc jockey Steve Hansen.

Jonathon Brandmeier's agents say he'll participate in stories that are "a feature on just us." Otherwise, "we'll pass."

WFAN's Don Imus is "a master of preparation. He'd stay up all night [preparing] for a three-minute bit," says Gary Dee.



"[Howard Stern] gets you listening, but it would be an effort for me to tune in every day," says Steve Hansen. Adds Tom Griswold: "He's the most overrated DJ in the country."

"There's nobody in the whole country doing what [Steve Dahl (above) and Garry Meier are] doing," claims Tom Griswold.

OUT OF LEFT FIELD

'Stayin' Alive' days gone, still Disco Dave calls for new formats

By Wayne Walley

"I don't miss radio a bit. Too many politics," says Dave Rapaport.

But in the late 1970s, as general manager of New York's WKTU-FM (now known as WXRK-FM), Mr. Rapaport turned the radio world on its ear by creating two formats.

First came the "mellow sound" soft-rock format, with its feather-light songs and hushed on-air personalities. This invention earned Mr. Rapaport the moniker "Champagne Dave."

Doug Goodman

Radio programming innovator Dave Rapaport sees little forward progress these days.

Then in 1978, as the movie "Saturday Night Fever" popularized the disco craze, Mr. Rapaport dared to turn the station into a dance club of the airwaves. This new format brought him a new nickname: "Disco Dave."

A rebel of sorts who still rides a motorcycle to work, Disco Dave was not one to endear himself to the radio powers-that-be of that era, despite what proved to be a magic programming touch.

"Somebody asked me what it meant to have an 11 share in the market, [and] I said, 'It means 89% of the people aren't listening.' My boss didn't like that too much."

By introducing disco to the airwaves, Mr. Rapaport did two things that might not be possible today: wake up listeners and do well with a new format.

Mr. Rapaport believes new formats still can flourish.

"The public is always ready for something new. You have to find a hole in the market and fill it," he says.

"The problem is there are few innovators and many copiers. The only risk-takers are the ones with economic problems.

"It helps, too, if [a radio station] is with a smaller company without a 'group program director,' whatever that is," Mr. Rapaport says.

He says he admires WHTZ-FM, a New York-area station that created the "Morning Zoo" format—now copied by stations everywhere with their own versions of wisecracking, irreverent air personalities.

"We tried to do a good morning show back in the 1970s, but it costs money," Mr. Rapaport says.

He says radio stations could save some money by eschewing big-budget promotional and advertising campaigns that herald changes in station formats.

"I remember we had a meeting on Friday with a deadline of 6 p.m. Monday to make the change to disco," Mr. Rapaport says. "I gave somebody an American Express card and a list of records to buy. At 6 p.m. [Monday] we made the change without any warning. The phone lines were jammed. We couldn't call out for four days.

"We made the change on July 18. When the book came out in December, we had gone from a 1.5 or 1.6 to an 11 share. Word-of-mouth," he says, "is the best advertising."

Today, at age 55, Mr. Rapaport is VP-media director for CSI International, one of the nation's leading barter companies. In exchange for ad time on radio stations or other valuable commodities, the company offers stations anything from hotel rooms to airline tickets.

"There's no publicity, and no one knows who you are but your banker," he snickers. □

WORLD BRANDS

Multinational shops, clients

Who has what accounts where

For the sixth annual Advertising Age World Brands report, the following criteria were used:

- Accounts must be served in at least four countries as of June 30, 1990.
- The combined client business must total at least $5 million.

The report is divided into two sections.

Those agencies listing offices in 39 or more countries overseas —13 of the 26 agencies surveyed—are included in the first section. McCann-Erickson Worldwide's chart, due to its size, is listed out of alphabetical order at the end of the first section.

Eastern European offices are listed under Europe.

Next challenge: Re-regulation

1992 adding up to tough ad restrictions

By Laurel Wentz

As the 12 European Community nations seek common ground for setting rules that will govern a unified European market, industry officals grappling with tough issues can best describe the difficulties with anecdotes.

One favorite of Angela Mills, special issues and European affairs director for the U.K. Advertising Association, goes like this: In the U.K., everything is allowed if not specifically forbidden. In Germany, everything is forbidden if not specifically allowed. In Italy, everything is allowed, even if forbidden, and in Belgium, nobody knows what's forbidden.

With only 27 months until the single European market is official in December 1992, marketers are increasingly alarmed at the growing trend toward re-regulation rather than deregulation.

"Progress toward harmonization is most likely to follow the 'lowest common denominator' pattern, with substantially negative results for the advertising business," Ms. Mills said. "The consensus always goes toward heavy restriction."

Need to harmonize

Advertisers agree that harmonizing incompatible and conflicting local rules—which often hamper pan-European marketing and advertising—is necessary. But they feel the EC is picking the most restrictive standards.

"There are a number of developments internationally in which we can see a trend toward the very strongest type of ban," said Paul Curtis, executive director of International Distillers & Vintners and chairman of the U.K. Advertising Association's working party on alcohol advertising.

"Progress toward harmonization is most likely to follow the 'lowest common denominator' pattern, with substantially negative results for the advertising business. The consensus always goes toward heavy restriction."

For example, a draft directive limiting tobacco advertising to package shots—showing only photographs or illustrations of the products—was strengthened into a total ban by the European Parliament, rejected by the European Commission on technical grounds and is now deadlocked at the Council of Ministers. A revised text calling for a total ban is likely soon.

EC-wide directives tend to incorporate the most restrictive national regulations in areas such as alcohol advertising, pharmaceutical advertising, health claims in food advertising, financial services advertising and data protection rules affecting direct marketing.

"They end up harmonizing the restrictions instead of harmonizing the freedoms," Ms. Mills said.

While EC legislators debate the issues, member countries have continued to pass increasingly restrictive national laws, hoping they will become the EC-wide standard.

Total bans

France has approved a draft law that would ban tobacco advertising and severely restrict alcohol advertising (AA, July 2). In Spain, the government last month drafted a bill that would ban all tobacco advertising on radio except from 10 p.m. to 8 a.m. (AA, Sept. 3). Greece in 1987 banned toy advertising.

"If three [EC] countries have an alcohol advertising ban, there is very strong pressure from those countries to have very severe restrictions on alcohol advertising" at the EC level, Ms. Mills said. "I'm not saying they don't have the right to do it in their own countries, but those strict rules should not end up being the [European] common denominator."

EC laws take precedence over national ones, but when setting new rules for areas such as alcohol and tobacco advertising, the EC considers existing national laws.

In 1985, the EC drew up nearly 300 measures necessary for removing technical, tax and physical barriers to trade between members. About 60% of these have been adopted by the Council of Ministers.

The legislative process starts when the European Commission, the body proposing all legislation, adopts a text for a directive. This goes to the Council of Ministers, which seeks the European Parliament's opinion.

"If three [EC] countries have an alcohol advertising ban, there is very strong pressure from those countries to have very severe restrictions on alcohol advertising" at the EC level.

Angela Mills, special issues and European affairs director, U.K. Advertising Association

The directive then goes back to the commission as a proposed revised text, including the opinion of the council. If acceptable, it goes back to the European Parliament for a second reading. At that stage, the Parliament can adopt, reject or amend the council's opinion. Then it returns to the council, which has three months to adopt the directive.

To facilitate the legislative process for measures deemed essential, the EC no longer requires a unanimous vote from the decision-making Council of Ministers. Now, each country still has only one minister, who receives a weighted number of votes based on population, ranging from two for Luxembourg to 10 each for West Germany, the U.K., France and Italy.

Controversial legislation has a better chance of passing, since only 54 votes rather than all 80 are needed for passage. Currently, the U.K., West Germany and the Netherlands have a blocking minority on the tobacco advertising legislation, now deadlocked. It's likely to be redrawn in a more restrictive form.

"The fear is that the longer you have a stalemate, the Kronenbourg faces tight restrictions as 1992 approaches. Young & Rubicam, Paris, created this ad, headlined, "Let's share our differences."

European Commission will withdraw the proposal and come back with a total ban," Ms. Mills said.

Lobbying groups form

To fight restrictive proposals and gain access to EC legislators, marketers are forming Europewide lobbying associations.

"The European Commission is not interested in discussing with individual companies their problems, but they [will talk] with trade associations at the European level," said Tony Coad, London managing director of NDL International, a data base company, and chairman of the public affairs task force of the Brussels-based European Direct Marketing Association.

Il n'y a pas que les belles images publicitaires qui donnent envie de boire de l'alcool.
SACHONS INTERDIRE LA PUBLICITE AVEC MODERATION.

McCann-Erickson, Paris, created this ad opposing the draft law against alcohol advertising. It reads: "It's not just pretty ads that make you want to drink alcohol."

get marketing impossible.

Toy companies are forming the Toy Manufacturers of Europe this month in Brussels to gather information and make recommendations to the European Commission, even though no toy advertising legislation has been proposed yet.

"The first stage is to compare what's happening [in different countries] and see how we can contribute to harmonization," said Jean Paul Charpentier, the general manager of Lego France, who will be the group's chairman.

Toy restrictions

Local restrictions for toy advertising vary greatly, Mr. Charpentier said.

In France, ads aimed at children aren't allowed to use famous people to recommend a product or children to name a brand or even wear colors associated with the brand. In Denmark, ads can't feature figures or dolls that are characters in children's TV shows.

"It is very difficult for manufacturers to have a spot that can be distributed throughout Europe," Mr. Charpentier said. Other directives are making their way through numerous committees and bureaucrats at the European Commission and the Council of Ministers. Among them:

"The European Commission is not interested in discussing with individual companies their problems. . . ."

Tony Coad, chairman, public affairs task force, European Direct Marketing Association

- A draft directive on pharmaceutical advertising, which would restrict, among other things, promotion of ethical drugs even to doctors, has been sent to the European Parliament for an opinion.

New restrictions could be added, though no one knows what they might be.

"That's one of the things we worry about," Ms. Mills said. "Although the current draft is not overly restrictive, it's still got to pass the European Parliament."

- A preliminary text of a food claims directive will be presented to an EC advisory committee Sept. 17. Food marketers object to the proposed directive because it bans all claims unless specifically allowed in the directive. At the moment, the working document defines and restricts claims such as the food product is natural, new, superior or award-winning.

The directive would prohibit claims linking health and nutrition with a brand. It would also define and restrict the use of claims that a food is alcohol-free or has a high or low content of certain nutrients or energy. Unless authorized by EC legislation, claims that "knock" other foods, claims that everyday foods can't supply adequate nutrition, claims that a foodstuff has acquired extra nutritive value from additives like vitamins and claims that any particular foodstuff meets full nutritional and energy needs could be prohibited.

"Consumers are looking for different things, like low-fat or natural foods, so claims become quite important," said Valerie Saint, head of legal services at Unilever's Birds Eye Wall's Ltd., marketer of frozen foods and ice cream.

If the directive passes, brands such as H.J.

Heinz Co.'s Weight Watchers and Unilever's Healthy Options frozen meals, which are sold as healthy, low-calorie foods, probably couldn't be positioned as such in advertising. Even Healthy Options' on-pack panel linking the brand with healthy, low-fat eating would be disallowed.

■ The EC hasn't proposed restrictions on alcohol advertising yet. It is closely watching the Council of Europe, a parallel and sometimes rival body of 21 European countries scheduled to debate a total alcohol ban during its Parliamentary Assembly Oct. 4.

Regulations passed by the Council of Europe are generally considered less of a threat than EC legislation because they're only binding for those nations that sign them.

Many countries plan to limit tobacco advertising. Collett Dickenson Pearce, London, created the humorous Gallaher Tobacco ads.

Member states that disagree with a Council of Europe convention can simply ignore regulations by refusing to sign. However, advertisers are concerned that a Council of Europe ban would encourage the EC to propose a similar ban.

"We're looking for a responsible approach to the abuse of alcohol," said International Distillers' Mr. Curtis. "We believe the Council of Europe proposal will go well beyond that, and we're very concerned [that] that and the French move [to severely restrict alcohol advertising will encourage] a possible EC draft directive."

■ An EC move to permit comparative advertising, currently banned in most EC countries, is a rare bright spot for advertisers. A formal proposal allowing ads to make direct comparisons is expected by yearend.

■ The European Commission is considering a labeling system to identify environmentally safe products. Separately, several countries have adopted codes to regulate claims. In the U.K. code adopted in June, for example, advertisers can't claim a product is environmentally friendly if it lacks one harmful ingredient but contains others, and they must take into account the full life cycle of the product from manufacture through disposal when promoting a product as environmentally friendly.

Lego and other toy marketers are bracing for regulations by forming industry groups. WCRS Mathews Marcantonio, London, handles.

■ A draft directive on data protection—modeled on existing West German legislation—severely restricts the collection and use of information about individuals. If passed, direct marketing, credit cards and other financial services will suffer.

Direct marketing companies would be barred from obtaining enough information to target prospects and be forced to use mass mailings, NDL International's Mr. Coad he said. Credit card companies and banks would be banned from transferring information from an EC nation to a country, such as the U.S., that has lower standards of data

World ad spending: outlook dim

Middle East trouble adds to uncertainty

An Advertising Age roundup

The ad world is sluggish.

Recessions in Brazil and Australia, soft Canadian and U.K. markets, and jitters in Hong Kong about 1997 darken hopes of ad spending growth, according to Advertising Age's most recent survey.

And the Middle East crisis has made forecasting even harder.

"This Mideast thing has created uncertainty for the economies of many countries," said Robert Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York.

Earlier this year, Mr. Coen predicted U.S. ad spending would grow 5.3%, including inflation, but he now expects less growth.

"In the U.S., economists are modifying the economic picture," he said. "Instead of the gradual improvement we were due for, we're not going to be able to count on that. It's now apparent that the country is moving a lot slower than it had been thought."

The following estimates compiled by Advertising Age express ad spending growth figures—where available—based on local currencies and in real terms, meaning inflation has been filtered out.

Europe

Saatchi & Saatchi Co., London, has downgraded its forecast for ad spending growth in Europe in 1990 to 10.2% from 11.5%. (Saatchi's pan-European figures haven't been adjusted for inflation.)

The downgrade is based on poor performance in the U.K., Norway, the Netherlands and Turkey, which Saatchi calls "the four worst performing markets in the world."

The company's latest twice-yearly Advertising Expenditure Forecasts was published in July.

U.K. research group Market Penetration Services predicts an increase in U.K. ad spending of only 3.1% a year in real terms until 1992.

The West German ad trade organization, ZAW, expects 3% to 4% real growth for 1990, following 6% growth for 1989.

Industry sources say the opening of East Germany may have considerable influence on West German ad spending for the rest of this year. But ad spending by West German marketers in East Germany is cannibalizing budgets originally targeting West Germany.

"For . . . consumer companies, the main target of the marketing and sales managers is East Germany," said Bernd Michael, ceo of Grey Gruppe Deutschland, Duesseldorf.

The Saatchi report claims growth in Europe, where ad spending averaged an 11% increase since 1981, lives on despite the poor performance in certain countries due to the deregulation of TV.

Most countries are now allowing private TV channels to compete with state-owned channels, and dozens of satellite-delivered channels have been launched.

In Spain, total ad spending for the first half increased 15.5% in real terms. Despite the government's current restrictive monetary policies, ad spending for the entire year is expected to grow 15% in real terms.

Two new national private TV channels, Antena 3 and Telecinco, ended state-run network TVE's monopoly and increased ad time.

Growth is expected to continue in Italy and France, due to the development of private TV and increased TV ad time in recent years, McCann's Mr. Coen said.

"Italy picked up a few years ago and is still going," he said.

In Mr. Coen's June report, he predicted Italian ad spending would increase 9.2% combined with a 6.1% inflation rate. For France, he expected 11% growth and a 3.3% inflation rate.

Asia/Pacific

The Australian ad industry is having its worst year in more than a decade.

Spending has dropped, major agencies are shedding up to 10% of staff and debt collectors are hard at work for agencies.

"There's no question there's been a tendency for payment to be a little late," says Malcolm Spry, chairman of HDM Mattingly, Sydney. "We now employ full-time credit-control people in both Sydney and Melbourne."

Best estimates are that real ad spending growth will fall this year between 1% to 2%.

"The dollars just aren't there," said Kate Henley, executive director of the Australian Association of National Advertisers. "Spending is very flat, a slightly negative growth rate."

After 0% real growth in the first half of 1990, Hong Kong ad spending is looking up in the second half, with a 5% real gain expected.

The first half's poor performance could be traced to the Tiananmen Square massacre in Beijing in June 1989, agency sources say. Hong Kong will be returned to China in 1997.

"After June 4 [1989], most agencies received calls from clients requesting cutbacks on ad spending," said Kim Walker, managing director of Backer Spielvogel Bates, Hong Kong.

The looming November ban on TV tobacco advertising won't help ad spending.

"You have a total cigarette ad budget of $50 million in Hong Kong, which is going to be impossible to replace in new media," Mr. Walker said.

After real ad spending growth of 23.6% last year, Taiwan is also cooling off.

Plunges in real estate values and the stock market have caused product sales to soften and the ad industry to see "some slowdown," said Andy Lai, general manager of Leo Burnett Co., Taipei.

After growth slowed to 10.1% in the first half of 1990, the second half's increase is expected to only be 5.5%. For all of 1990, 7% real growth is expected.

Japan's growth is slowing but still strong. Total ad spending is expected to increase 6.5% to 7.5% this year, according to estimates by Dentsu, Tokyo. However, this is much lower than 1989, when spending grew 14.8%.

Increased spending comes from new-product launches by home electronics and automobile companies, increased competition in several consumer goods categories and more spending by financial institutions.

It remains to be seen how Japan, so dependent on foreign oil, will fare as a result of the Middle East crisis, McCann's Mr. Coen said.

Americas

In Canada, ad spending is expected to remain stagnant for the rest of 1990, with 0% growth predicted after inflation. For the past 18 months, real ad spending growth has been limited to about 1%, industry sources say.

Canadian ad spending may even decrease next year. A 7% federal goods and services tax will be introduced in January.

"I think we're starting to see a softening this year, and 1991 will be worse," said Kathie Shearer, senior VP-national media director at McCann-Erickson, Toronto. "No one is quite sure what will happen to prices as a result of the new tax."

With lower inflation, Brazil's ad spending actually appears to be entering a recession. Ad spending came in fits and starts during the first half but is expected to fall off significantly from now on, sources say.

Since March, when President Fernando Collor announced his strict anti-inflation plan, magazine ad pages have fallen sharply as big advertisers cut spending.

"We'll have negative growth compared to last year. Money will be short," said Roberto Duailibi, partner in Duailibi, Petit, Zaragoza, Sao Paulo. He forecasts a 20% drop from last year's $2.7 billion ad spending. ☐

Vacationers turning to TV

By Wayne Walley

NEW YORK—Summer vacationers like to watch TV, and they watch it in places that Nielsen Media Research doesn't measure, a study sponsored by ABC-TV found.

More than 79 million Americans vacation away from home during the summer. In a telephone survey of 1,003 adults ages 18 and older, 77% of those who vacationed away from home in June and July watched TV an average of three hours a day while on vacation. The survey conducted July 30 to Aug. 6 by Bruskin Associates is the latest study in which the network has participated to determine how many people are watching TV away from home.

"The goal and objective is to gain insight into who's watching what, when and where. Eventually, we hope out-of-home viewing is measured and made a part of the ratings system," said Richard Montesano, VP-market research for ABC Television Network Group.

People who go away from home on summer vacations are a desirable advertiser audience, the survey found. Those people are more likely to be adults 18 to 49 with college or graduate school education, and employed in professional or managerial positions with incomes of more than $50,000 a year.

"Eventually, we hope out-of-home viewing is measured and made a part of the ratings system."

The nationwide telephone survey found that 43% of those interviewed had taken or would take a vacation away from home this summer. Of the summer vacationers, 92% have access to a TV away from home, the survey found.

Those who said they watched TV away from home were almost exclusively in locations not measured by Nielsen, including hotel/motel rooms, second vacation homes and condominiums, bars, restaurants and parks.

The survey's margin of error was plus or minus 3%.

Most advertisers acknowledge the existence of out-of-home viewing, and say they're willing to pay premiums for certain programs and sporting events because of this unmeasured audience.

However, the media buying community argues that adding unmeasured out-of-home viewing to the ratings is a way for the networks to increase prices.

Mr. Montesano said this attitude camouflages the issue.

"How do we really know people are watching out of their homes unless we do this?" he said. "Maybe more younger men are watching football out-of-home, and that isn't reflected in the network ratings. So an advertiser ends up buying other media and spending more money to reach young men when [it] might already have them in football. Knowing the entire audience can help both sides." ☐

Timon out as Colgate ad chief

Ad department revamped; centralized functions scrapped

By Laurie Freeman

Clay Timon, VP-director of worldwide advertising for Colgate-Palmolive Co., abruptly left the company last week because of "deep philosophical differences in Colgate's ad strategy."

Mr. Timon, 46, is credited with developing Colgate's global advertising strategy and establishing the company's partnership with two worldwide agencies, FCB/Leber Katz Partners and Young & Rubicam.

Ariel Allen, the company's VP-creative services, also was reassigned to an undisclosed position as Colgate said it was restructuring its advertising department.

Mr. Timon's exit, company insiders say, was due to differences between him and William S. Shanahan, Colgate's senior exec VP-chief operating officer. Both the company and Mr. Timon said the departure was mutually agreed upon.

At this time, supervision of Colgate's $450 million in worldwide advertising business is in the hands of the company's top management, regional management and product managers, a company spokesman said.

Sources close to the company say they fear Colgate's relationship with its agencies will deteriorate without a central person to handle routine, daily tasks.

"It could be that within a year, Colgate may return to its old ways of having agencies pitch against each other and agencies being brought in on special projects," said a company executive who requested anonymity. "No one knows what direction the company should go in."

"There will be no change in our global

Eurocom threatens HDM partnership

By Jon Lafayette and Laurel Wentz

French communications giant Eurocom could pull out of HDM if its demands for a larger stake of the $2.6 billion joint venture agency network aren't met.

Friction between Young & Rubicam and Eurocom has been reported almost since the joint venture—with third partner Dentsu—was assembled in 1987, and late last week a French daily newspaper reported Eurocom was negotiating to buy back its European holdings in HDM.

Le Figaro said Eurocom offered its two partners a total of about $50 million for its interest in HDM offices across Europe, but Dentsu and Y&R wanted close to $120 million. In response to the story, Eurocom denied that "any agreement to dismantle the HDM network has been finally adopted at this time."

Officially, the HDM partners expressed hope that the network's operations would continue.

"I don't think we want to get out" of HDM, a Eurocom spokeswoman in Paris said. "We have an agreement to agree that things must be done differently. Voila."

The Eurocom statement explained the discussions as redefining "the international equilibrium of this network."

"What we're not discussing is shutting down the agencies," said R. John Cooper, exec VP-general counsel of Young & Rubicam in New York. "All that we're discussing is the ownership issue and potential realignment of that ownership."

Y&R is developing contingency plans for operating HDM in the event of a Eurocom pullout, a Y&R source said.

Eurocom already owns a 51% interest in

Sears shuffles execs

CHICAGO—Sears, Roebuck & Co. Chairman Ed Brennan realigned management of the corporate and merchandise groups. Matthew A. Howard was named senior VP-marketing from senior exec VP, succeeding Thomas E. Morris, 43, who resigned as VP-marketing. Eric D. Saunders, 48, was named VP-home fashions group from senior exec VP, succeeding VP-Home Fashions Group Jerry A. Hand, 50, who resigned. Under the restructuring, officers in charge of the six merchandise categories report to President-Retail Laurence E. Cudmore, 54; previously, they reported to Messrs. Howard and Saunders. Mr. Brennan said the restructuring is "part of an ongoing companywide effort to reduce expenses."

Saatchi nixes buybacks

NEW YORK—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. Chief Executive Robert Louis-Dreyfus last week rejected buyback bids from two subsidiaries, Yankelovich Clancy Shulman, Westport, Conn., and Siegel & Gale here. Yankelovich Chairman Kevin Clancy said that after a meeting last week, "It's clear to us we would not be able to make an offer so good [Mr. Louis-Dreyfus] would let us go." Mr. Clancy said the research company's management has been seeking a buyout for more than a year. Separately, Alan Siegel, chairman of design company Siegel & Gale, said Mr. Louis-Dreyfus initiated the buyout talks but rejected an offer for less money than Saatchi paid for the agency. Mr. Siegel said he

MCI connects review

$51M account may be split; WRG pitches

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Wells, Rich, Greene might be able to hang onto at least some of MCI Communications Corp.'s $51 million ad account, which could be broken into two parts after a review.

MCI decided to place the account up for review "just to look and see whether there are additional minds and tools available to use in the marketplace," Senior VP Judy Ranzer said last week.

She said the company has been focusing on increasing both residential and business customers, and suggested MCI might consider assigning a different agency to each segment, as it did in the mid-1980s.

"The two parts of our business are important to us, and we will be looking closely at both parts," Ms. Ranzer said. "It used to be you either dealt primarily in the consumer segment or the business segment. Now we compete in all segments at the same time."

She also praised WRG, which has handled the account since 1987, and didn't rule out the possibility the agency could hang onto a piece of the business when the review winds up in early November.

WRG will participate in the review along with Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston; and Grey Advertising and Levine, Huntley, Schmidt & Beaver, both New York, sources said. Grey owns a majority stake in Levine Huntley.

WRG executives contended recent changes at MCI played a role in deciding to review the account.

"There's new management at the company," said a WRG executive. "They didn't pick us, and they want to see what's out there."

Earlier this year, MCI Senior VP-Corporate Affairs Howard Crane, who handled advertising, became president of the Pacific division. Responsibility for advertising was shifted to Daniel Akerson, exec VP-chief financial officer, and Kevin Sharer, exec VP-sales and marketing, who joined MCI from General Electric Co.

"Those guys have never worked with an agency before," an agency source said. "But they know that AT&T has a slew of agencies and will want to know why they've been working with only one."

While there's been some turnover on the client side, WRG has had nearly constant turnover on its side of the account, agency sources said.

"AT&T has a slew of agencies, and [MCI's new management] will want to know why they've been working with only one."

Both MCI and AT&T have been gaining share at the expense of US Sprint and have taken to sniping at one another in their advertising, some of which has led to legal action.

On Oct. 10, 1989, MCI filed suit in U.S. District Court in Washington, charging AT&T with "falsely and deceptively" representing MCI's services in ads. It was prompted by a letter AT&T sent Oct. 3, to CBS in which AT&T called MCI ads "false and misleading."

Attached to MCI's suit were several examples of AT&T print and TV ads created by N W Ayer, New York, that MCI found objectionable. One print ad claimed "other long-distance companies take up to 30% longer than AT&T to set up the average call." TV spots showed people were dissatisfied at not getting the savings they thought they would get from AT&T competitors.

The ads claimed "Every week, over 100,000 customers switch to MCI." AT&T responded with a counterclaim Oct. 26, charging MCI "has falsely and deceptively advertised and promoted its services."

MCI has a 12% share of the $55 billion long-distance market, compared with 70% for AT&T and 8% for Sprint.

The review comes at a difficult time for WRG.

The agency has been struggling to save Philip Morris Cos.' $80 million Benson & Hedges account and only recently got its first campaign for Continental Airlines approved, seven months after being hired for the $40 million to $50 million account.

In addition, WRG is now in the final throes of a review for a project from Chase Manhattan Corp. and is still getting used to the departure of founder Mary Wells Lawrence.

In March, Mrs. Lawrence turned over her chairman-ceo title to Kenneth Olshan and sold a large minority stake in the company to Paris-based BDDP Holdings.

But the agency appears to be finally putting out a fire at Philip Morris, which had been unhappy at WRG's inability to put together a campaign for Benson & Hedges.

WRG had kept Benson & Hedges in January after a review, but a campaign originally scheduled to break this fall has been pushed back until next year.

In the meantime, Philip Morris is introducing a denicotinized version of the brand, which will be backed by advertising from Leo Burnett USA, Chicago (AA Sept. 10). Sources say Burnett has also executed a campaign for the main Benson & Hedges brand.

A Philip Morris executive denied that, however. □

Pier 1 hunts new agency

By Christy Fisher and Jennifer Lawrence

Pier 1 Imports last week dismissed the Richards Group, Dallas, and put part of its estimated $26 million account in review.

The decorative home furnishings chain is inviting agencies to pitch the broadcast portion of its account, which may or may not include media buying. Print work, and possibly media buying, will move in-house.

Pier 1 wants to expand its media mix and "create more awareness," said John Himelfarb, VP-director of marketing.

In the past, the chain has relied on ads in newspapers and Sunday supplements with some national magazine advertising. It also tested TV spots in the summer of 1989, its first such effort in more than 10 years.

The Richards Group, Pier 1's agency since 1985, hasn't been invited to pitch but will continue to do work through the end of the year.

The agency created the specialty retailer's "A place to discover" campaign, which helped position Pier 1 as a serious retailer of contemporary home furnishings, rather than the funky knickknack store of the '60s and '70s.

"The Richards Group has served us well for five years. They helped us with our image, a campaign that has been one of the best for many, many years," Mr. Himelfarb said. "There is no animosity [between Pier 1 and the agency]. We just wanted to look at new things—new ideas and new creative."

"In today's [retail] environment, if things aren't broke they will be. We need to take a fresh approach. . . ."

"In today's [retail] environment, if things aren't broke they will be," he said. "We need to take a fresh approach to the ways we have been doing things in the past."

The company is moving the print portion of the account and possibly media buying in-house for more control, flexibility and cost savings, he said.

The change comes as Pier 1, which has 531 stores in 43 states and Canada, continues to expand aggressively. It plans to have 1,000 stores by the year 2000.

Pier 1 recently reported its eighth consecutive year of record sales. Sales jumped 25% to $516.9 million for the fiscal year ended March 3. Earnings rose 17% to $25.3 million.

However, Pier 1, like most retailers, has begun to feel the effect of the Mideast crisis. Sales for the second quarter, ended Sept. 1, were below expectations, the company reported, with August sales down 7% to 8% from the same period a year ago.

Stan Richards, principal at the Richards Group, stressed the parting was amicable and Pier 1 had no reservations about the agency's work. He cited economics as the reason for the move.

Mr. Himelfarb denied the moves were to cut costs.

Mr. Richards doesn't anticipate any layoffs from the account loss. He said he hoped to reassign agency staffers to other acounts at the shop, which is estimated to have billed $130 million last year. □

Joseph Cece: TV Guide is "significantly more profitable" now.

Cece hits stride at 'TV Guide'

Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. stunned the publishing world in August 1988 with the news that it would acquire Walter Annenberg's Triangle Publications, including crown jewel TV Guide, for a record $3 billion.

In the two years since, TV Guide has been battling increased competition, ad page declines and a falloff in circulation. The weekly is now going on the offensive—expanding the number of cable system-specific editions, creating "themed" packages for advertisers and, perhaps the most challenging move of all, planning to test a larger-size edition.

Hopes fade for profitable 1990 at 'USA Today'

By Janet Meyers

USA Today's high hopes of having its first profitable year in 1990 appear to have been dashed by the industrywide ad sales slump.

Through Sept. 7, the national daily's ad pages were off 8.5%, to 2,312, vs. the same period a year ago. Ad revenue was up 2% for the period, while circulation has increased 4.5% to 1.82 million. How USA Today fares in the crucial fourth quarter will determine whether it can break even for the year.

"We're still hoping for profitability," said Tom Curley, USA Today president. "This is about as difficult a time to predict what will happen as any I've ever seen, between world events and the economy."

Red ink has been on the decline for USA Today, which lost $4.5 million in 1989, down 82% from $25 million in 1988. At the start of 1990, analysts anticipated the paper could post a profit of close to $2 million this year. That was before the bottom fell out of the newspaper ad market.

C. Black

Mr. Curley said USA Today's ad sales were "reasonably firm through April," but pages and revenue fell from May through early August. Ad pages bounced back in August, said Publisher Cathie Black, when the daily carried seven more ad pages than in August 1989.

Though usually an optimist, Ms. Black isn't counting on a turnaround for the rest of the year. Having a strong fourth quarter "is somewhat unlikely," she said.

Mr. Curley, more positive in his outlook, still believes the fourth quarter could put USA Today in the TV scatter prices down

But 4th-quarter weakness may not signal trend

By Wayne Walley

The Big 3 TV networks are slashing prices for selected prime-time inventory to try to get the market for fourth-quarter scatter sales moving.

Some ad units in prime time and sports were selling last week for as much as 30% below prices paid in upfront sales in what could be a one-time-only set of circumstances, media buyers say.

"Unless the economy goes to hell in a hand basket, this will just be a fourth-quarter phenomenon," a high-ranking network executive said. "Buyers might be licking their lips, but all the networks are well-sold in the first quarter. What has happened is some advertisers have delayed spending, or they are hesitant to get in during the fourth quarter."

While some buyers are snapping up what they believe to be opportunistic buys, others are waiting, not sure the market has reached bottom.

"This is a waiting game," said Bart McHugh, senior VP-director of national radio/TV programming for DDB Needham Worldwide, New York. "There does not seem to be the tightness we've experienced the last three or four quarters, and we are watching the market day to day."

A number of factors led to the soft market. But many industry experts specifically cited the ratings guarantee issue that surfaced during the upfront selling season.

The Big 3 adopted a uniform viewer-counting plan, devised by NBC, that would reduce their liability for make-goods to advertisers.

"The big players, like General Foods, Procter & Gamble, Bristol-Myers and others, looked at other opportunities in syndication and cable with ratings guarantees, or

Adults favor classic 'toons in their ads

By Kate Fitzgerald

When it comes to using licensed characters in ads appealing to adults, the hare beats the turtle.

A survey conducted for Advertising Age by the Gallup Organization showed adults favor classic animated characters.

GALLUP SURVEY

Bugs Bunny topped the list of most popular characters, and he came in first again when top-of-mind recall was measured. The Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles were the least favorite cartoon or animated characters.

Marketing spending in support of both Bugs and the Turtles has been heavy this year.

Warner Bros. and its LCA Entertainment licensing arm developed tie-ins with dozens of companies that spent an estimated $100 million on programs supporting Bugs' 50th birthday this year.

When the 1,000 adults were asked to name the first ads that came to mind among those featuring cartoon/licensed characters, the winner was Holiday Inns. The lodging chain ran a summerlong promotion tied to Bugs' birthday with network TV support.

In popularity, Bugs finished ahead of Walt Disney Co.'s Mickey Mouse, who celebrated his 60th birthday in 1988 with a marketing blitz. Warner's Road Runner was third, followed by Disney's Donald Duck and United Feature Syndicate's Garfield the Cat. Fox Broadcasting

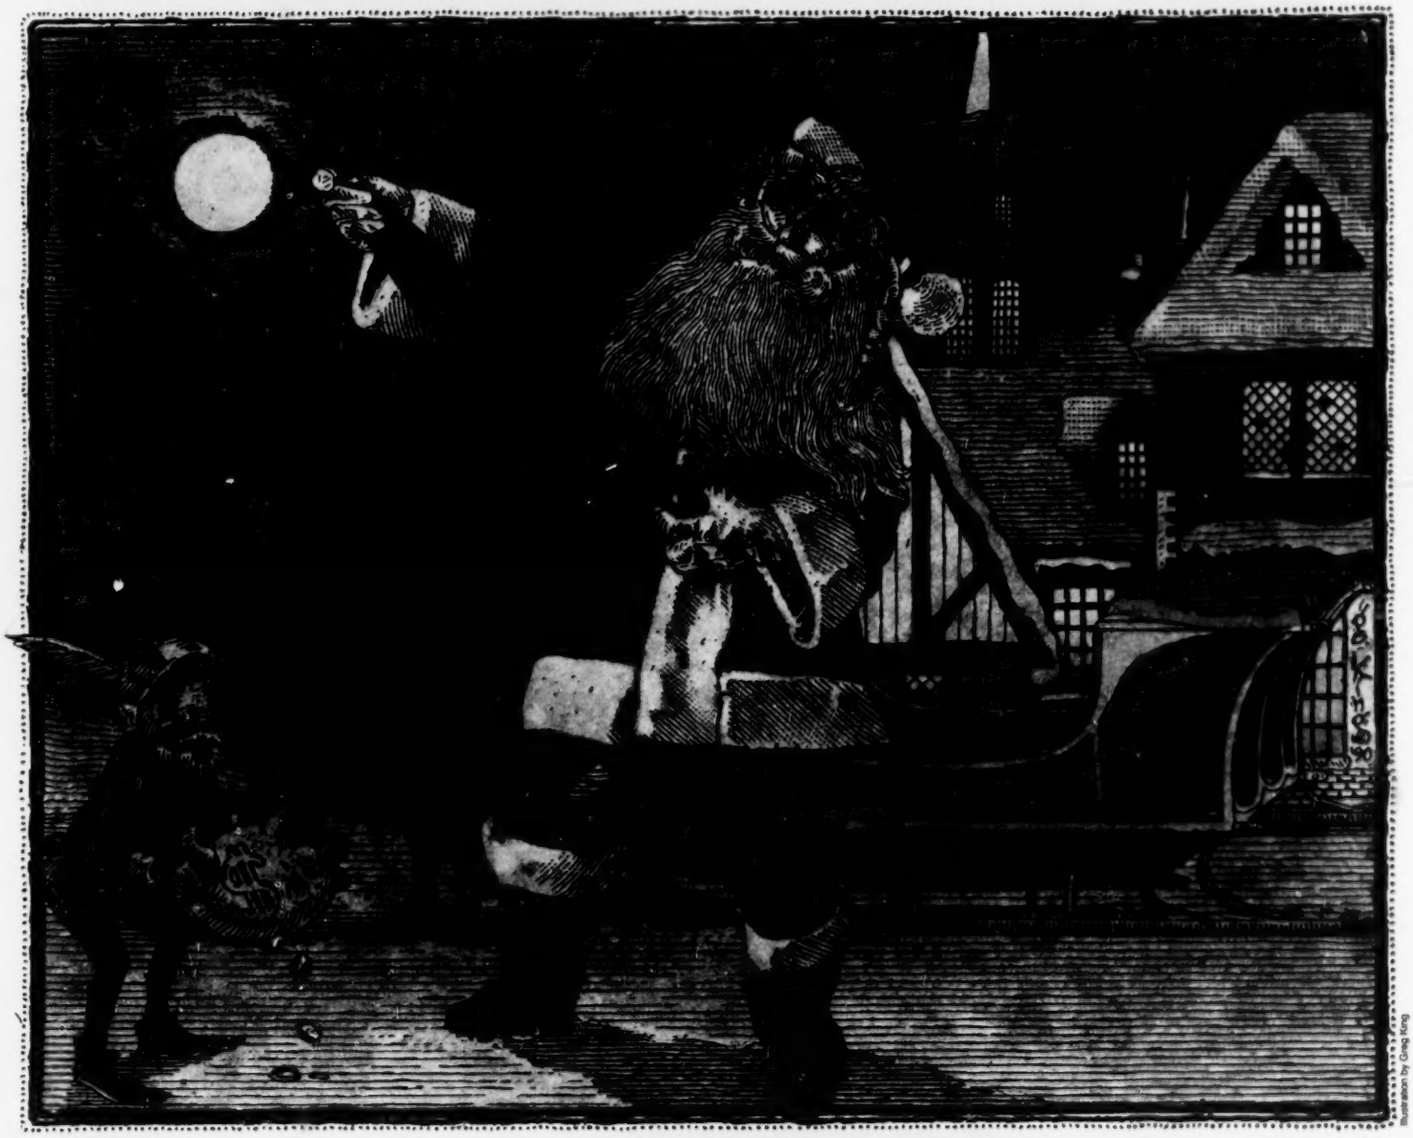
Countdown to Christmas



Grinch is back; Santa tightens belt

By Adrienne Ward

Even as it confronts a boycott led by Operation PUSH, Nike continues telling consumers to "Just do it." The problem is, most people aren't listening—not to Nike, not to anyone.

Instead of just doing it, consumers have adopted an attitude for the fourth quarter that's more along the lines of "Don't do it."

Don't eat out as much.

Don't take that big vacation.

Don't buy as many Christmas gifts.

Fears of fighting in the Middle East and uncertainty about the economy are making consumers and marketers alike extremely cautious about Christmas.

In an Advertising Age/Gallup Organization poll of 1,000 adults, 70% of respondents say it's likely the U.S. will enter a recession within the next six months. (See chart on Page S-8.)

If that happens, most respondents say they will cut back on travel, dining out, going to the movies, buying major appliances and—what could be worse?—gift giving.

"Consumers are very uncertain," says David Stewart, a professor of marketing at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles. "At this point people are taking a wait-and-see attitude."

He predicts consumers will trade down in many categories throughout the fourth quarter. "But if we're celebrating a military victory," he says, "things could go the other way."

"The consumer mindset right now is 'Don't do it.' Everybody's cautious," says John Byington, president of the NPD Group's Syndicated Services division. He predicts categories that rely heavily on fourth-quarter sales—toys, apparel, consumer electronics and sporting goods—will remain flat or decrease slightly.

"The country's at risk. There's a guilt thing about frivolous spending," adds Allan Mottus, a cosmetics industry consultant.

"Plus, people feel poorer. Their real estate values have gone down the drain, stock portfolios are suffering. . . . Luxury items across the board are going to be hurt," he says.

Others say that rather than cutting back too

Retail

Sales gains of 4% 'likely' as many go easy on gift buying

By Alison Fahey

"It's probably the most unpredictable I've ever seen it," says one economist, referring to the retail industry's fourth-quarter sales outlook.

That sentiment from Bob Salerno, a partner at Coopers & Lybrand, is being echoed throughout the retail industry.

Kurt Barnard, publisher of Retail Marketing Report, says the fourth quarter is likely to be considerably affected by the turmoil in the Middle East, "which comes on the heels of a great deal of consumer conservatism and frugality."

According to the Ad Age/Gallup poll, 61% of survey respondents say they will pull in the reins on gift giving if the U.S. falls into a recession.

Holiday sales will be up 4% to 6% vs. the same period last year, Mr. Salerno says, although "4% is more likely." In 1989, fourth-quarter retail sales were up about 5% over those of 1988.

Rosalind Wells, chief economist for National Retail Federation, is projecting fourth-quarter retail sales gains of 5%. She previously had predicted gains of 5.5%.

"Originally, I figured we'd have a better Christmas this year than last because in 1989 we had the industry turmoil with the bankruptcies like Campeau," she says. "As this year shaped up, the economy wasn't great, but it was holding up.

"Now I think we're headed into, if we're not already in, a recession. Unemployment is up, inflation is up and real income will be down. . . . We don't have the makings for a very good Christmas," she says.

Carl Steidtmann, VP-chief economist, Management Horizons, is more optimistic, forecasting a "fair" holiday selling season for retailers, with sales gains of about 6% over last year.

Industry observers point to soft goods such as apparel as a potential savior for retailers this Christmas. But poor sales of durables, such as home appliances, should offset some apparel gains.

The Ad Age/Gallup poll indicates 65% of consumers surveyed say they will reduce spending on appliances in a recession.

While the jury is out on retail sales performance, many observers agree retailers' profits could be up from last Christmas if they avoid the price slashing that cut into their companies' bottom lines last year.

"Retailers have held off on buying and have [reduced] their inventories," Mr. Salerno says. "Their profits will be up even if their sales aren't that much."

However, with consumer confidence on the wane, retailers could be forced once again to offer store-wide bargains.

The problem now, Mr. Barnard says, is that "we have a situation which compels consumers to pay more money at the gas pump and, come October and November, on heating, etc., and that means less money left for discretionary spending for Christmas."

The Ad Age/Gallup survey revealed some good news for department stores: 41% of respondents say they will do most of their holiday shopping there. Only 8% say they will favor specialty stores; 22% will shop at discounters; 13% will frequent mass-market merchants; 8% will use catalog retailers; 6% don't know; and 2% did not answer. □

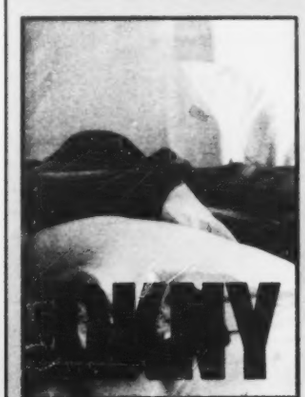
WHAT'S IN



Consumers pay a price when slipping into DKNY jeans.

- Wearing it on their sleeves: Not only do consumers want their MTV, they want to wear it, too. So do fans of Paramount, Harley-Davidson, Hanna-Barbera and Disney's Minnie Mouse as branded fashion takes off.
- The Limited: Looks like more Un-limited growth for Leslie Wexner's chain of specialty stores.
- Inching toward the top: Wal-Mart Stores is poised to take over the No. 1 spot in retail.
- Smarter than ever: Revamped, restocked and redesigned, J.C. Penney Co. has reinvented itself for the better.
- Cheaper by design: The champions of haute couture are coming down a few notches with secondary lines. DKNY, Emporio Armani and Mr. Beene from Geoffrey Beene are allegedly affordable. But when a wool jacket and skirt can cost $1,000, retailers are wondering how affordable this clothing really is.
- Patriotic dressing: Fashion collections from Americans like Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, Donna Karan and other made-in-the-USA designers are as popular as ever.
- Thrown away in the USA: When Wal-Mart started its "green" marketing push, competitors followed fast.
- These boots were made for walking: Low-heeled, thigh-high boots are making strides.
- Faux furs: Fake, colorful furs are filling fashion ads and women's closets.
- A spirited return: Let's see what kind of life Susie Tompkins breathes into Esprit.
- Accountability at the top: Sears gives Edward Brennan the go-ahead to fix what his merchandise head Michael Bozic couldn't. Can he do it?

WHAT'S OUT

- On the other hand: Former wunderkind Michael Bozic begins climbing down the giant's beanstalk.
- Surviving at the bottom: Robert Campeau, the Donald Trump of retail, is climbing down the Campeau ladder.
- Minding the store: Merger mania cools off as retailers try to fix the problems within their four walls.
- Too much hype: Hypermarkets are too big, too far away and too pricy.
- Pad fad: Fashion retailers are swapping big, bulky shoulder pads for more feminine, rounded ones.
- Oversized is overdone: Big, baggy, boxy women's clothes are getting outnumbered by a more feminine, tailored look.

Sobering thoughts about holiday sales

By Patricia Winters

There's a wives' tale that when the economy takes a downturn, consumers drown their woes in liquor.

Unfortunately for the liquor industry, it's just a wives' tale.

"I wish [it] were true," says ck Shea, director of external afrs for Heublein Inc., the nn's No. 2 liquor company. "Hisy doesn't show that the [liquor] dustry takes a nose dive in ressions. Nor does it show that peoe went crazy and drank more, spite what we like to think."

As the threat of recession looms over the fourth quarter, industry marketers are cautious about the outlook for liquor sales.

"The economy is slowing, and it will definitely affect holiday liquor sales," says Ernest Capria, director of marketing services at Carillon Importers, marketer of Absolut vodka and other superpremium brands.

The timing couldn't be worse for the industry: Some distilled spirits realize 25% to 40% of annual sales in the fourth quarter.

The Ad Age/Gallup poll had some good news and some bad news for liquor marketers.

Of those surveyed, 25% say they would continue to buy preferred brands if the U.S. were to enter a recession within the next few months. Only 9% say they would switch to less-expensive products.

The bad news: 18% say they would quit purchasing alcoholic beverages altogether in the event of a recession, and 39% say the question is "not applicable."

Mr. Capria says superpremium brands, such as Absolut vodka and Chivas Regal scotch, will continue to garner sales from image-conscious and affluent consumers who are more resistant to a recession than other consumers.

Also helping the superpremium category is the prospect of consumers trading up in liquor because they're cutting back on other, more pricy luxury items.

"People have found that if you can't buy that new car or that washing machine, [they] tend to reward themselves by eating or drinking better, and they may upgrade a bit," says John C. Maxwell Jr., beverage analyst with Wheat, First Securities.

During tough economic times, other consumers switch to lower-price brands such as Glenmore Distilleries' Skol vodka.

Glenmore, which markets primarily low- and value-price brands, is already benefiting from a slow economy, says Bruce McDonnell, VP-marketing. Its case volume increased 4% for the year ended June 30.

The segment of the market that has no cause for celebration is the middle tier, which analysts say suffers as consumers either trade up to an "affordable luxury" in the premium and superpremium market or trade down for price.

Making matters worse is that mid-price brands already have been hit hard by the industry's decade-long decline.

"The place I wouldn't want to be is in the middle," says Mr. McDonnell.

A decline in mid-price brands could hurt overall ad expenditures, analysts say. While the mid-price brands don't get the kind of high-test ad support allotted to premium and superpremium brands, the profits from those often foot marketing expenses for a company's entire brand portfolio. □

Toys

The 'have-not' toymakers may take it on the chin

By Kate Fitzgerald

Only a handful of toy marketers will rejoice this Christmas if widespread predictions of a gloomy toy-selling season prove correct.

The weakening economy plus an overemphasis on the videogame segment and the red-hot Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles have created havoc for the majority of toy marketers.

The winners will be few this fourth quarter, which traditionally accounts for 60% of toy marketers' annual sales. Nintendo, Sega and other videogame software marketers will rack up big sales.

Another sure winner is Playmates Inc., whose lean, green creatures from the sewer continue to snare profits as the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles craze enters its third year.

Less-fortunate rivals with action figures whose popularity has waned, such as Hasbro Inc.'s G.I. Joe, Kenner's Ghostbusters characters and Starting Lineup sports heroes, will limp through another season with lackluster sales.

Overall, toy industry sales are expected to remain flat for the year, hovering around $13 billion, with an additional $3.5 billion in videogame sales.

"It's going to be one of the worst years in recent history for toy sales," says Allen Bohbot, president of Bohbot Communications, the New York-based media buying agency specializing in toy advertising. "There's just nothing really hot out there, except for videogames and the Turtles."

Despite that gloomy picture, certain marketers such as Mattel Inc. and Tyco Toys are anticipating stronger sales, thanks to surprising strength in the girls' segment.

Tyco Toys has stolen the spotlight among marketers targeting girls this Christmas, building on the surprisingly strong performance of its Oopsie-Daisy doll. When the season is over, it expects to post a 17% sales increase over last year to $450 million.

"We're definitely the exception to the rule for most marketers in the toy industry this year, because we didn't even try to fight the war in the boys' action figure area," says Jim Alley, senior VP-marketing at Tyco.

This year Mattel, Hasbro and Tonka copied Tyco's strategy, bringing out additional baby dolls with special features such as crawling, crying and "wetting" their diapers, but Tyco still has the lead in the baby doll niche.

"It's pretty clear, even looking at the competition, that we made a good move last year. We saw openings in the girls' toy area nobody else was exploiting," Mr. Alley says.

Tyco's lead item this Christmas is My Pretty Ballerina, which comes equipped with music the doll "dances" to. Support includes a $5 million network and national spot TV campaign via Bozell, New York.

Tyco's competition in the doll niche includes Mattel's perennially popular Barbie, along with its new baby doll line called the Magic Nursery; Hasbro's Baby Uh-Oh; and Tonka's Hush Little Baby.

"There's competition but we're not worried, because we already have a lot of momentum in the doll area—at least for this year," Mr. Alley says. □

WHAT'S IN

■ Sewer savvy: Fresh from the sewers, the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles continue their awesome sales. Action figures, accessories, vehicles and licensed merchandise—all will sizzle this Christmas.

■ Hands-on: Hand-held videogames—Nintendo's Game Boy, Acclaim and Tiger Electronics—offer alternatives for videogame fans who want something portable and more affordable. Watch for more expensive Game Boy models to land under the Christmas tree and competitors' less expensive versions to be stuffed into stockings.

■ Nintendo software: If they've got a Nintendo Entertainment System, they simply want more, more, more software to go with it. Pricy new cartridges ranging from $25 to $50 will top the lists of most videogame fans, with movie-inspired titles such as Acclaim's new "Narc" and "Total Recall" titles fanning the fever.

Boys—Turtles; girls—baby dolls such as Tonka Products' Hush Little Baby.

■ Licensed characters: Hanna-Barbera's Jetsons and Flintstones characters are experiencing a new wave of popularity among both kids and plenty of adults, driving sales of everything from T-shirts to plush toys. Disney pals such as Peter Pan and Ariel ("The Little Mermaid") also are in demand.

■ Baby boom: Little girls are clamoring loudly for baby dolls this year, especially if they didn't get Tyco's Oopsie-Daisy last year. This year the crawling, crying baby's back, with competition.

WHAT'S OUT

■ Dick Tracy: The hero who told us "I'm on my way" is on his way out fast, after licensed merchandise enjoyed fleeting popularity around the June release of the Warner Bros. film.

■ No fun in the playhouse: Pee-Wee Herman, the man who brought us lines like, "I know you are, but what am I?" has faded. Hey Vern, It's Ernest! and Ed Grimley dolls also have plummeted.

Pee-Wee doll says: "Aargh." Now, so does its marketer.

■ Not a bumper crop: When Coleco went bankrupt, Hasbro bought Cabbage Patch Kids, the line of homely dolls that was a major hit in the mid-1980s. Despite attempts to bring back the fad, it's history. □

Cosmetics & toiletries

Gift-with-purchase likely to provide holiday cheer

By Adrienne Ward

Americans will likely put their best face forward for Christmas this year.

The fragrance and cosmetics industry is expected to post slight increases for the holidays despite consumer caution, industry insiders say.

"I think it will be a good Christmas for cosmetics and fragrances," says Susan Babinsky, manager-consumer products consulting practice for Kline & Co. "Consumers have concerns regarding the economy and the Middle East—they are cautious. But this may mean good news for cosmetics and fragrances. People will hold off on buying a VCR, but fragrances are an affordable luxury item and good for gift giving."

The Ad Age/Gallup poll backs this assertion. In the event the U.S. enters a recession, one-fourth of those surveyed say they would trade down to less-expensive cosmetics and toiletries, while 45% say they would continue to purchase their preferred brands.

However, Diana Temple, VP at Solomon Bros., says consumer caution could hurt upper-end fragrances. When retailers mark down apparel, which they already are doing, sales of fragrances in stores suffer, she says.

"Value will be very important this Christmas; the more consumers can get for their money, the better. If they can get a sweater for $20 at markdown, they may decide on that rather than a fragrance."

To that end, Annette Green, executive director of Fragrance Foundation, advises marketers to emphasize value and quality in their holiday marketing efforts. She says gifts-with-purchase will be important selling tools for fragrances, and that classic scents like Chanel No. 5 will be especially strong.

"It's going to be tough no matter how you cut it. Consumers are going to be careful," she says. "But unless they're on the bread line, Americans buy Christmas gifts."

While some marketers will be forced to cut ad spending, others are moving in the other direction.

Josef Schreick, VP-marketing and creative services at Aramis, says the division of Estee Lauder Inc. is increasing its fourth-quarter ad-promotion budget 35% over the same period last year.

At Chanel, the fourth quarter ad budget is about 30% higher than last year's, according to Steve Kaputo, executive director of marketing services.

Chanel reallocated its 1990 budget to heavy up in the crucial fourth quarter. A new spot for Chanel No. 5, created in-house, will air frequently in 20 major markets throughout the holiday season. Media was bought by DDB Needham Worldwide, New York.

"Life goes on, holidays still happen, businesses still run. The world doesn't come to a stop," Ms. Babinsky says. "Given that, there is a good opportunity for this business to perhaps flourish to a certain degree." □

Automotive

Carmakers stuck in low gear

By Raymond Serafin

For auto marketers, the question of a recession isn't whether there will be one but, rather, how long it will continue.

"We've been in a recession for a year in housing and new cars," says Chairman Lee Iacocca of Chrysler Corp.

Mr. Iacocca predicts "slow movement for another six to 12 months for sure" in the automotive industry.

For the first seven months of 1990, car and light-truck sales were off 3.3% compared with the same period in 1989, to just under 8.5 million. And 1989 itself was a less-than-banner year, as total calendar-year sales fell 5.9% from 1988—a decline of more than 900,000 vehicles.

The oil crunch that has shaken consumer confidence has only added to the industry's problems. About 20% of consumers polled in an earlier Ad Age/Gallup survey say they are reducing their driving since the Middle East crisis began. If gas prices keep climbing, an even greater number say they will cut back on non-essential travel.

Industry reports say North American manufacturers have scaled back third-quarter production plans from their earlier targets, indicating industry officials are pessimistic about any recovery in the fourth quarter.

The sales slump has put downward pressure on ad budgets, but competitive realities have kept auto companies from decreasing their spending, resulting in an overall flat trend expected to continue through yearend.

"I don't see any more pulling in [of ad budgets], just a general uneasiness," says Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of Lintas: Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., agency for GM's Chevrolet division, GMAC finance subsidiary, Delco Electronics and AC-Delco. "I've heard nothing in conversation with clients that they're going to hold back as a result of the current situation."

Thomas Wagner, VP-general manager of Ford Motor Co.'s Ford division, says he hasn't downgraded expectations for fourth-quarter sales, although he says Ford dealers report shoppers have been expressing concern about the general economy.

Ross Roberts, VP-general manager of Ford's Lincoln-Mercury division, says the division isn't changing any fourth-quarter marketing strategies as a result of consumer fears. "There's no point in retrenching at this point. We're going forward with our initial plans," Mr. Roberts says.

He and others who market luxury cars fear they will be the first hit by a downturn if the stock market continues to falter, causing potential luxury-car buyers to postpone purchases.

"In a normal kind of recessionary cycle, the luxury segment doesn't go down as fast," says John Grettenberger, VP-general manager of GM's Cadillac division. "Normally, the guy working to meet a car payment is the first to feel it—when he gets laid off, or his friend gets laid off, or orders are down at the factory."

Slow sales mean marketers will face continued pressure from dealers to prop up sales with consumer incentives, such as low interest rates and rebates. □

Consumer electronics

Wary of a power crunch

By Ira Teinowitz

Consumer electronics companies wish they could rewind the tape back to last year.

After experiencing record sales in 1989, electronics marketers already were eyeing 1990 warily. Recent concerns about consumer purchasing ability have only heightened their uncertainty about fourth-quarter sales, which account for roughly 40% of annual sales.

The Electronics Industries Association as early as January predicted flat sales of VCRs and only slight growth in TVs. Although projection TV unit sales are up an estimated 7.5% and camcorders are expected to post double-digit growth over last year, this year's first-half results prompted concern even before the recent energy price increases.

"We have seen a softening in the color TV market," says Tom Lauterback, VP-communications for the association.

Mr. Lauterback says the group now believes the electronics industry may not hit last year's sales of 21.7 million TV sets and that VCRs will remain flat.

Yet he and some other industry sources suggest the industry may be "recession proof."

They say consumers who cut back on outside entertainment spending stay home and watch TV or listen to music, which may lead them to upgrade their equipment.

If the economic situation in the U.S. worsens during the fourth quarter, consumers will be staying home. For example, the Ad Age/Gallup poll shows 57% of those surveyed will cut back on going to the movies.

"I could paint a scenario where fuel prices keep them home and focus their attention on inadequacies in their systems," Mr. Lauterback says.

James Harper, manager-PR for Thomson Consumer Electronics, marketer of RCA and GE brands, says his company still foresees gains in most categories.

High prices gnaw at Arby's exec

Larry Krueger has guided restaurant chains through many tough fourth quarters during more than 20 years in the business.

Recently named exec VP-marketing for the Arby's Franchise Association, the marketing arm of Arby's, Mr. Krueger, 51, had served since 1980 as the chain's senior VP-marketing. Prior to that, he held the VP-marketing posts at Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp. and Burger King Corp.

Chicago Bureau Chief Scott Hume spoke to him recently about the challenges facing the $65 billion quick-service restaurant industry through the end of 1990.

Advertising Age: The restaurant business has endured a tough first half in 1990. What are the prospects through the third and fourth quarters?

Mr. Krueger: I'm concerned for Arby's, and I think there's reason to be concerned for the industry.

There have been big price increases because when sales get soft there's a tendency to raise prices. That works for a while, but not the long term.

We're starting to overprice ourselves. Some of that is artificially high prices you can discount, but then it gets like list prices with cars, and you get stuck in discounting. You lose menu integrity when that happens.

ONE ON ONE

"When prices rise, the first thing the consumer gives up is a drink. They can get a Big Gulp for less at 7-Eleven."

—Larry Krueger

AA: Are you feeling the recession?

Mr. Krueger: We watch the Consumer Price Index, and when food-away-from-home prices rise faster than food-at-home, as they are now, we run into trouble. When prices rise, the first thing the consumer gives up is a drink. They can get a Big Gulp for less at 7-Eleven or coffee or a soft drink at work or home.

AA: Do you expect concerns about oil prices and the Middle East to affect business?

Mr. Krueger: I don't think we'll see an impact until later this year.

I think we'll encounter a "scared consumer," and that's bad, because a scared consumer does lots of unpredictable things.

He avoids going into debt. He starts making changes in discretionary spending. That impacts on us. Maybe he takes his lunch.

AA: Are you making changes in anticipation of that?

Mr. Krueger: We've had to. We've rethought the whole fourth-quarter marketing plan.

December traditionally has been a good month for us, our No. 2 or 3 month in sales. We always run a "Holly Glass" promotion during the quarter and we will this year. But we used to just run a free standing insert for it and sit back and collect the money.

But not this year. We're going to have to fight. A glass may not be enough.

AA: What does the revised marketing plan include?

Mr. Krueger: It's not business as usual.

We're going to run the glass promotion earlier, in November, but we'll also be running promotions and new products from September through the end of the year.

We've given franchisees a choice of several: a 99¢ promotion on some of the classic roast beef sandwiches; a "5 for $5" deal on sandwiches; a French Dip combo; a whole arsenal.

We were going to do one new product, the Albuquerque Turkey sandwich, but now we're giving franchisees a choice of promoting that or a Triple Cheese roast beef sandwich.

We don't want franchisees saying, "You didn't give me something to fight with."

AA: How tough will that fight be through the rest of the year?

Mr. Krueger: Very. There's been a general slowing of sales in the industry, and that's going to intensify, and so is competition.

McDonald's is not going to sit around. They'll get aggressive. And you can be as smart as you want, but when the big guys start swinging, you're going to get hit. □

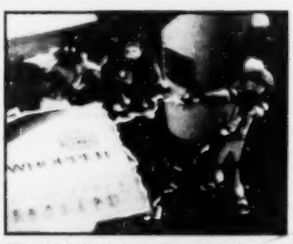
- Join the club: The success of Burger King's Kids Club proved McDonald's hold on the children's market isn't as rock-solid as everyone in the industry believed.



BK's Kids Club is a whopping hit.

WHAT'S OUT

- Stone throwing: In the past year, Arby's, KFC and Pizza Hut have run ads carefully mocking Ronald and No. 1. But the industry slump has hit even Big Mac, so why bother bashing McDonald's when you're down, too?
- In the bag: Most kids' meal boxes end up in the garbage, which is bad environmental public relations, so chains are moving toward bagging kids' meals.
- Nasty habits: Everyone hates coupons and discounts but can't seem to shake the habit. Still, chains are looking for any kind of "value-added" promotion as an option to price cutting. □

Food

Trade-offs, multi-use foods gain

By Julie Liesse

Consumers aren't stocking up on Spam yet, but grocery-store marketers are bracing for recessionary changes.

"Corporate earnings reports are showing lackluster or declining sales and profits; we're seeing more unemployment," says John Blair, VP-marketing services and new ventures at Quaker Oats Co. "As all of this gets talked about more and more, a consumer mindset begins to develop."

The last major recession in the mid-'70s caused "a dramatic shift of economic purchases toward fundamental food values," Mr. Blair says.

"The consumer makes food-buying decisions based on a tripod of cost, food value and convenience," he says. In tough economic times, consumers will make some trade-offs, and "cost and basic food values take on greater importance."

The Ad Age/Gallup poll shows 51% of consumers would continue to purchase their preferred grocery brands during a recession, while 27% would opt for less expensive products.

Historically, as consumers modify their shopping lists, more frivolous and junk foods "tend to drop out," Mr. Blair says.

As convenience takes a back seat to economy, single-serve items and foods "with the appearance of being overpackaged" are less attractive to shoppers. And consumers might not be willing to pay premium prices for items such as pet food.

On the other side of the ledger, foods offering basic nutritional value at relatively low prices per serving are staples during troubled economic times. Also, multiple-use foods—mixes that "transcend a meal occasion" and can be used at breakfast and dinner—likely will benefit.

Quaker, for instance, watched sales in two of its categories—pancake mix and hot cereal—grow 4% to 10% during the mid-'70s recession, Mr. Blair says. "That's pretty good growth in the food business, especially for more mature, basic food products. I think we'll see categories like those grow again."

But he says the current slowdown differs from that of the '70s, particularly as a result of the growth in two-income families.

"That won't make shifting food choices go away, but it will have a moderating effect," he says. The food industry won't feel the effects of a recession or consumers' recessionary attitude immediately, Mr. Blair says.

"Food usually trails, because it remains a necessary purchase. But shifts will occur—probably 18 months to two years out." □

Recession-proof, but nervous

By Laurie Freeman

"It's not like we like tough times, but [the package-goods] industry is recession-proof," says Howard Bernick, president-chief operating officer, Alberto-Culver Co. "Consumers put off purchasing a car but they don't put off washing their hair."

In the Ad Age/Gallup poll, 48% of respondents say they would continue purchasing their preferred brands in a recession; 25% would buy less expensive products; and 26% say they already purchase the least-expensive products.

Mr. Bernick says Alberto-Culver's "biggest problem is wanting to ship more product. Stores are keeping a much tighter rein on inventory."

Although rising oil prices inflate the cost of virtually all goods, package-goods companies remain optimistic they can pass along those increased costs to maintain profit margins without hurting brand loyalties.

"I don't expect the bottom [of the economy] to fall out," says David Webb, president-ceo, Lever Bros. "I lived through the last energy crisis . . . and strong businesses are able to cope with situations like that."

Unlike the last recession in the early 1980s, marketers don't believe consumers will turn to the plain-labeled generic products that became more popular during the difficult times then.

In many cases, the generics did not live up to the quality of the national brands, says Frank Blod, principal of New England Consulting Group.

"Consumers may trade down modestly . . . but consumer-goods companies are not going to be hurt too badly, if at all," he says.

Colgate-Palmolive Co. says it's already seen some changes in consumer buying behavior worldwide in the area of high-ticket items.

"But overall it's been a healthy year globally," says Clay Timon, VP-worldwide advertising. "I can't say we're seeing much negative impact from this global recession."

Mr. Timon says companies, including Colgate, in the past several years made concerted efforts to trim expenses, and now are positioned to invest more in advertising.

"A recession is not the time to cut advertising," agrees Mr. Bernick. "We try as much as we can to increase, not cut, advertising and promotion spending," he says. "We continue to support our brands, even the ones that are struggling, to come out stronger at the end [of a recession] than at the beginning." □

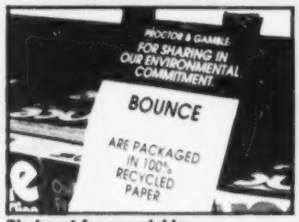
■ Earth-friendly: Anything green is good as gold as enviro-friendly products and refill packs become the industry rule, not the exception.



Big boost for recyclables.

■ Lightening up: Colgate-Palmolive, Lever and P&G are taking some of the weight out of doing laundry with superconcentrated detergents, which can average 25 washloads from a 63-oz. package. Value-price cigarettes up a recession, it could mean a further shift among consumers from full-price cigarettes to "value-price" or generic-price smokes, says a former Brown & Williamson Tobacco executive. "It could hurt some full-margin brands," he says.

The value-price cigarette category already has been on the upswing, so much so that all of the six major tobacco marketers sell both value-price and full-price smokes.

Mr. Maxwell says value-price cigarettes accounted for 18% of all cigarettes sold in the second quarter of 1990, up from 11.4% for all of 1988.

Because the price-value concept was only in its infancy during the most recent recession no precedent supports the theory that low-price cigarette sales would increase.

> The market for cigarettes trends upward in a recession because "smoking for people is a pleasure—a friend" in tough times.

But Mr. Dangoor thinks they will. "It's almost definitely the case that value-price cigarette sales would be on the uptick" in a recession, he says.

So far, the advent of value-price cigarettes has not been a major boon to advertising. Most value brands are introduced with big ad schedules in the first year, but afterward support usually drops to point-of-purchase.

For example, PM spent $27 million to advertise the repositioning of its Alpine cigarette to value-pricing in 1989, but its older, more established value brand, Cambridge, received only $3 million in ad support the same year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

Should value-price sales rise even more in a recession, marketing budgets of full-price brands almost certainly would increase, industry watchers say, but the jury is still out over whether the bulk of the increase would be in advertising or promotion. □ downturn the consumer electronics industry has fared well," he says.

Consumer electronics

Not all are as positive.

David Lachenbruch, editorial director of newsletter Television Digest, sees 1990 being the first year in a decade that TV sales won't be at record levels.

> "A color TV and VCR are highly postponable purchases."

"A color TV and a VCR deck are both highly postponable purchases," he says. "The only reason that TVs will not set a record this year is because of the economy."

He says manufacturers are more concerned about the economy this year than are consumer electronics retailers.

"The retailers say that when the Persian Gulf news came out there were a couple of bad days, but then everybody came back to the stores. The manufacturers are very cautious. They are keeping inventories down and there is lot of concern."

High-level products—those with the greatest profits—will continue to sell, says Mr. Lauterback. Bottom-level products including accessories will also continue to move off shelves. "It's the middle that drops out," he says.

Clark Johnson, VP of NPD Group, a research service, however, suggests that one reason fewer TVs are being sold this year is some of the changes in consumer buying behavior already have occurred.

"My impression is that the recession has already started to hit people with less discretionary income. A worsening would exacerbate it, but wouldn't be a radical change," he says.

Some smaller appliance marketers also are worried about the fourth quarter.

"I expect that we will continue to see a relatively soft retail environment in the third and fourth quarter," says John Beggs, president of Norelco Consumer Products. "In a depressed economic environment, people grow more cautious]" □

Air carriers landing at lousy time for fare hikes

By Jennifer Lawrence

Airlines are in for an even tougher fourth quarter than usual.

Carriers are getting caught by the uncertainty of the Middle East crisis, flat domestic travel demand and the traditionally slow fall selling season.

"It's not the time to raise prices when you're in a relatively weak economy," says Michael Gunn, senior VP-marketing at American Airlines. "There will be an intensified share fight."

Yet major carriers reluctantly are hiking fares 5.3% by Oct. 1 to recover escalating jet fuel costs.

Consumers likely will not take kindly to that. Already nervous about the prospect of a fourth-quarter recession, most say they will cut back on travel if the economy gets any worse, the Ad Age/Gallup poll finds.

"It looks like death," says Edward Starkman, PaineWebber analyst. "Advance bookings are soft. Domestic travel has been down the last few months, but the international side is looking good."

Increased operating costs and little demand may mean that airlines will cut back ad spending as bottom-line pressures mount, suggests John Pincavage, analyst at Transportation Group.

"If the price of oil continues to go up, the airline industry is in real trouble," he says.

While American believes it is well-positioned competitively, the prospect of a recession has made the carrier cautious in its plan for the rest of the year.

That fight is likely to be fought on price, says James O'Donnell, marketing consultant with Seabrook Marketing. "There will be intense pressure for uneconomic fare cutting because of overcapacity, an economic slowdown and rising fuel prices.

"Strong carriers can weather the storm. Weaker airlines will lower fares and try to get out of the problem by maximizing volume," he says.

"If this situation holds, we will see a lot of price advertising and dramatic cutbacks on budgets for 1991," Mr. O'Donnell predicts.

United Airlines, the No. 2 carrier, so far has made no plans to alter its advertising, says John Ruhaak, VP-advertising and promotion. Northwest Airlines will actually increase image advertising in November, according to Judy Mitchell, senior director of marketing communications. □

Trying that 'come hither' look

By Ira Teinowitz

Consumers will put the skids on travel if the U.S. sinks into a recession within the next six months.

According to the Ad Age/Gallup poll, 66% of those surveyed say they would cut back on travel.

Recognizing this dilemma, U.S. resorts and hotels are looking beyond the home front for the fourth quarter by targeting consumers in Europe, Japan and elsewhere.

The dollar's decline makes the U.S. a very affordable travel destination for outsiders.

"We are addressing people internationally," says Mike Lindgren, director of management reporting at ITT Sheraton. "It's our experience that for people in Germany it's a whole lot cheaper to get to the U.S. than [other popular destinations]."

The U.S. Travel & Tourism Administration recently predicted the amount spent by U.S. visitors would exceed the amount spent by U.S. citizens abroad by $1.2 billion this year. The agency estimates 36.6 million visitors will come to the U.S. this year, an increase of 42% from four years ago, and will spend $44.5 billion—double what was spent in 1985.

"The dollar is low, people can afford to come and it's a good buy to come to the U.S.," says Jill Collins, the agency's public affairs director. "A European family can come to Florida and spend a week there for less than it costs to go to Monaco.

"People have a great desire to see this country. The Japanese in particular want to see what they've been seeing in the movies," she says.

Mr. Lindgren says Sheraton sees luring foreign travelers as an alternative to a depressed U.S. market. "We are expecting the third quarter to be down slightly vs. 1989," he says. "There has been a little bit of a decline in conventions and a little bit in business travel. We've had some cancellations in conventions due to the economy."

He says leisure travel has remained fairly constant.

Mr. Lindgren says Sheraton is most concerned about 1991.

"I don't think business travelers will be affected by a $10 increase [in air fares], but there is a chance of it having a negative impact when companies budget for next year," he says.

Ms. Collins says it's too early to assess the impact of the Middle East crisis, but she hopes it might help bring more people to the U.S. "I don't know if they have resorts in Kuwait, but if they have to go someplace else, maybe they will go to Disney World," she says. □

Grinch is back for holidays

much, consumers will start to hoard essential items as well as holiday gifts.

"In a time like this, there is an impulse to rush out and buy the things that may be short later, especially with regard to Christmas. . . . The tug of children and their not having goods for Christmas is very powerful, so Americans may rush to go out and buy Christmas gifts for their children," says Joseph Margolis, a Washington psychoanalyst who specializes in consumer psychology and the economy.

Even so, when asked if they would cut back on gift giving if the U.S. enters a recession within the next few months, 61% of those surveyed responded yes.

However, there is often a dichotomy between what consumers say in times of recession and what they actually do.

This is evident in consumers' responses to the Gallup poll. While a majority say they will cut back on gift giving if the economy worsens, many answered otherwise in response to another question.

In the survey, conducted by telephone in mid-August, consumers also were asked how much they spent on the holiday season last year compared with how much they plan to spend this year. Most consumers said they would make no changes.

"Consumers will say they're trying to save and are prepared for the worst, but what they say doesn't always correspond to what they're doing," says Ernest Dichter, chairman of Dichter Institute International, a consumer behavior research company.

"The logical answer is 'I'm saving.' But in reality, people get tired of living in miserable times, so they counteract their feelings of misery with purchases," often of luxury, high-quality goods, he says.

Dr. Dichter says the result could be a stronger fourth quarter than anyone expected.

"Many people have been sitting on the sidelines, worried about the oil crisis and the economy, and they think maybe this is a good time to buy because things won't come down in price," he says. "In previous recessions, contrary to what the economists were predicting, people got off the sidelines instead of waiting for things to improve." □

Scatter TV rates fall

ey bought what they considered ner 'safe' network dayparts like ytime, news or late night," said al Liebowitz, president and under of KSL Media, New York. hat helped leave a huge soft- ss in prime time, and we can ke advantage of the market nditions."

Network sources say expanded twork sports inventory, in- eased availabilities on Fox oadcasting Co. with five nights prime-time programming and neral economic uncertainties e also factors.

"Clients have money, but they ll only release it closer to air- ne," another network executive d. "They have to worry about rporate profits in the fourth arter."

Network officials dispute yers' contention that scatter rket rates are 30% below up- nt prices.

"Near-term scatter is lower- iced than upfront, but when encies say 30% less, you have to k at what's being compared," the twork sales executive said. "An front package has a price range, d if you compare the top price to low-end buy in scatter, it looks e a big spread. But if you com- re the prices in the same show, it's re like a 10% difference."

The softness is selective. Day- ne, news, late-night and Satur- y morning dayparts are all ht, with scatter time selling at above upfront prices, agency urces say.

Top prime-time shows are also mmanding big scatter prices. gency and network executives ted ABC's "Roseanne" at the p with an asking price near 00,000 for a 30-second spot, ile NBC's "The Cosby Show" d ABC's "America's Funniest me Videos" could get more an $375,000 for a :30.

The asking price for a :30 in x's "The Simpsons" could go as high as $350,000 once original episodes start airing Oct. 11.

Most of the fourth-quarter bargains, media buyers say, are available on CBS and ABC, while NBC and Fox have less inventory to sell and can keep prices higher.

Fox is concentrating on advertisers seeking the 18-34 age group, said Jon Nesvig, senior VP-sales, and fourth-quarter prime-time scatter inventory is selling above upfront prices.

Agency buyers say syndicators are reaping about 20% more for time sold in scatter vs. upfront, while cable TV networks are also "better sold" than last year.

If fourth-quarter network business doesn't pick up and advertisers keep making deals well below upfront costs, some agency executives say, they might consider exercising cancellation options and then use the money on another network at a better price.

The networks generally frown on that practice but buyers say old, unwritten standards and practices are changing.

"Ten years ago, you wouldn't even think of something like that," an agency executive said. "But there's no gentlemen's agreement anymore. Selling time at less than upfront prices is a sure way to bring in cancellation options, and the networks can't say there are unwritten rules against it if they gouge you with prices at the beginning."

Network executives warn that prices are likely to go up in other quarters and say future advertiser/network relationships would suffer.

"If business is good and they cancel, you don't consider it fair play," a third network executive said. □

King Features Syndicate's Popeye s No. 8, while Warner's Daffy ck tied with Disney's Winnie the oh character for ninth.

The long-term equity of classic aracters increases every year d is reinforced by advertising, d C. Woody Browne, president the International Licensing In- stry Merchandisers' Associa- n and VP-marketing and li- nsing at Tyco Toys.

"The licensing industry's hot ght now on the strength of wer characters, like the Teen- e Mutant Ninja Turtles and the mpsons, but classic characters ve longer, stronger ties with ults," Mr. Browne said.

"Bugs Bunny has been a top- ted TV show since adults were ds," he said, "and kids who ew up reading 'Peanuts' are out nking about life insurance, so e characters are ingrained in ults' thinking."

Licensing fees and retail sales licensed materials last year to- led $62 billion, and licensed erchandise sales are said to be 8.5% to 10% this year.

So it's somewhat surprising that Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles, one of the strongest-selling licensed character names, was by far the leader when it came to adults' least favorite characters.

The Turtles are the hottest-selling toy in the U.S. and still are attractive as marketing tie-in partners. Pizza Hut this month launched a major Turtles promotion coinciding with the release of "The Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles" movie on videocassette.

The Smurfs were second while the Road Runner was third. Bart Simpson finished fourth, followed by the He-Man superhero character. Fox's Simpsons family ranked sixth, followed by Popeye, Garfield and characters from the animated TV show "Beetlejuice."

The Flintstones tied with Merchandising Corp. of America's Woody Woodpecker for No. 10.

The survey revealed gender differences. For example, 81% of those who said Popeye was their favorite were men; 93% of those who named Winnie the Pooh were women.

Men accounted for 61% of those who favored the Road Runner, while women represented 79% of those who said the character was their least favorite.

And of those who listed the Smurfs as their least favorite character, 69% were men.

Classic characters also helped drive ad recall.

When asked which products or services using animated or licensed characters in ads seen in the past 30 days first came to mind, adults most often named Holiday Inns. Ads for Walt Disney World—featuring Mickey and the whole gang—placed second, with Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.—whose ads feature characters from the "Peanuts" comic strip—No. 3.

Nestle Foods Corp.'s Butterfinger candy bar and McDonald's Corp. tied for fourth, followed by Burger King Corp. and Embassy Suites, which tied for No. 6.

Eighth was a three-way tie between the California Raisin Advisory Board's dancing raisins, Disneyland and the Turtles.

The random phone survey was conducted in July. The margin for error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Maybelline sets $35M review

MEMPHIS, Tenn.—Maybelline is reviewing its $35 million cosmetics account now at DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago. Sources said the company, recently bought by Wasserstein, Perella & Co., is expected to contact D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Cliff Freeman & Partners and J. Walter Thompson USA, all New York. President-CEO Gary Mulloy resigned last week, and a successor is expected to be named in mid-October.

Bozell inks Czech agency affiliation

PRAGUE—Bozell last week signed an exclusive affiliation agreement that could lead to an equity or joint venture arrangement with Rapid, the largest Czechoslovakian ad agency. This follows similar agreements in Poland and Hungary (AA, Aug. 20). Sources said New York-based Bozell will announce in about 10 days a deal to expand into the Soviet Union. Under the Czech agreement, Bozell will make available to Rapid market research studies, group policy

Hearst clamps down on rate negotiations

By Scott Donaton

NEW YORK—Hearst Magazines President D. Claeys Bahrenburg is taking a hard-line stance against rate negotiation.

At a recent meeting of Hearst publishers, Mr. Bahrenburg instructed them to protect their rate cards at any cost, even if it means losing business for the magazine company.

He told publishers to concentrate on selling ad pages at the highest possible price, even if it means walking away from deals with advertisers that insist on deep discounts.

The bold move comes as publishers prepare to negotiate 1991 schedules with advertisers during a general downturn in page sales that industry analysts expect to deepen next year.

"He was trying to give us the courage to stand up for what we believe in, to hold the line as best as we can," said Katherine "Kitty" Mountain, publisher of Hearst's Victoria.

Mr. Bahrenburg and several other Hearst publishers declined comment on the Sept. 14 meeting.

The Hearst Corp. division's 15 titles also include Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping, Esquire, Harper's Bazaar, House Beautiful, Redbook and Town & Country. Mr. Bahrenburg took the reins of the division in April.

With advertisers expected to tighten their belts several more notches next year, most magazines will be fighting to maintain and increase market share by cutting rates and offering other concessions to build volume. Mr. Bahrenburg's instructions were to focus less on market share and more on increasing magazine ad revenues and profits-per-page.

"I don't think there's a shift. Market share's always going to be important to the magazines at Hearst," Ms. Mountain said. But "we want to be as profitable as we possibly can. It is tight, and we need the encouraging words that [Mr. Bahrenburg] gave us . . . to have the courage to stand up

Y&R taps Spivak for 'small' spark in creativity

By Jon Lafayette

NEW YORK—Young & Rubicam, hoping to capture some small-agency creative magic, last week tapped Helayne Spivak as executive creative director of its flagship office here.

Ms. Spivak, 38, who wrote award-winning ads at Ally & Gargano and Ammirati & Puris before becoming executive creative director at Hal Riney & Partners in 1988, wants to help restore the giant agency's tarnished creative reputation.

"This was a very important search for Young & Rubicam. They said they wanted to make a strong creative statement. . . . They wanted a breath of fresh air."

"They want their reputation not just to be that they are successful and that they have wonderful clients, but that they do good work," she said. "They want to do great work and be recognized for it. I'm just a copywriter trying to do her job on a slightly larger scale."

Ms. Spivak completes the new management team put in place at Y&R in April when agency Chairman-CEO Alex Kroll named Joe De Deo president of Y&R Advertising and put Chairman John McGarry and President Tim Pollak in charge of the New York office.

Their first order of business was to find a creative director to improve the agency's creative work and reputation. Since 1987, Y&R had divided the responsibility for its creative department among several creative directors.

Helayne Spivak's goal is to make Young & Rubicam "like a small shop."

"This was a very important search for Young & Rubicam," said Bonnie Lunt, president of Bonnie Lunt Management, the executive search company that contacted Ms. Spivak for Y&R. "They said they wanted to make a strong creative statement. They didn't want someone just because they came from a big agency. They wanted a breath of fresh air."

Ms. Lunt said she recommended Ms. Spivak in April, when Y&R first told her what it was looking for.

After looking at about 20 reels of clips and interviewing three or four other candidates, Y&R management concluded that Ms. Spivak "was the most original, exciting, young talent in town and would

Interpublic adds network with Lowe buy

By Jon Lafayette and Laurel Wentz

Interpublic Group of Cos. last week became the first agency holding company to establish a third agency network, acquiring London-based Lowe Group and stealing the thunder of the big British holding companies now loaded with debt.

New York-based Interpublic will pay about $165 million in cash and stock for the remaining shares of Lowe, which has grown quickly to billings of about $1.6 billion since its founding in 1981.

"We're a little contrary at this point by expanding," said Philip H. Geier Jr., Interpublic chairman-ceo. "In the 1980s, there was a lot of expansion. A lot of the prices paid were too high, and there wasn't enough management to manage things. Now [the industry] is going through a period of disinvestment."

Interpublic has had a financial relationship with Lowe for seven years and last year increased its stake to 35.4% in a deal that turned Interpublic's Lowe Marschalk over to Lowe Group. Last week's deal is for the remaining 64.6%.

"IPG is buying themselves a good agency and at quite an attractive price," said Mark Shepperd, an analyst at U.K. stockbroker UBS Phillips & Drew. With share prices so low, "good quality agencies can be bought cheaply."

London-based holding companies Saatchi & Saatchi Co. and WPP Group currently are wrestling with low stock prices and debt caused by acquisitions. Interpublic's longtime agency networks are McCann-Erickson Worldwide and Lintas:Worldwide.

Colgate aftershock

Advertising strategy changes looming

By Laurie Freeman

The unexpected departure of Clay Timon as Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s VP-director of worldwide advertising is likely to produce a dramatic shift in its advertising strategy.

Sources inside Colgate say it will move away from the global focus Mr. Timon championed and to a country-by-country approach said to be favored by top management.

Mr. Timon differed with Senior Exec VP-Chief Operating Officer William Shanahan, said a Colgate executive who asked to remain anonymous and who called the problem "deep philosophical differences in Colgate's ad strategy."

A second Colgate executive who spoke only on condition of anonymity said Messrs. Timon and Shanahan had fundamentally differing views on how the company should advertise.

This source said Mr. Shanahan prefers localized, individualized campaigns that stress reasons to buy a particular Colgate brand. Mr. Timon preferred a softer, non-traditional package-goods approach, which has characterized Colgate's advertising for the past five years.

Localized advertising was the norm at Colgate for years, largely because it was a collection of companies before Colgate Chairman-CEO Reuben Mark began the globalization process.

Mr. Timon last week declined comment; Mr. Shanahan didn't return phone calls.

One executive said Colgate's global marketing strategy will remain intact, but its global advertising strategy will be set aside. The comeback of local, country-by-country ad campaigns will result in Colgate losing its overall global advertising voice, this source said.

The source indicated that Colgate executives worldwide are concerned about the change, which comes as Colgate is stressing more than ever the global marketing approach.

"It seems to fly in the face of everything you know about global marketing," this insider said.

It remains to be seen how soon Mr. Timon's departure will affect the company's ad strategies, its $450 million worldwide ad budget and its relationship with Foote, Cone & Belding Communications and Young & Rubicam, Colgate's two major global agencies.

A company memo signed by Mr. Shanahan and issued the week of Sept. 10 said Colgate's "centralized

The comeback of local, country-by-country ad campaigns will result in Colgate losing its overall global advertising voice.

Advertising Management Functions are no longer necessary." Mr. Timon's post and that of Ariel Allen, VP-creative services, were eliminated (AA, Sept. 17).

It couldn't be determined whether plans to restructure the advertising department were completed with the elimination of those positions or whether Ms. Allen's new post has been determined. A Colgate spokesman didn't return calls last week.

Other sources said Mr. Timon, previously an agency executive with Doyle Dane Bernbach, will be missed at Colgate's shops.

"Clay came from agencies. . . . He knows how they operate and how to pull the best out of them," said one source, adding that Mr. Timon's leaving "will change how [Colgate] deals with their agencies, but I don't know how yet."

The elimination of a centralized advertising department, one Colgate executive predicted, means the company's agencies will once again compete against each other for new assignments.

But a Colgate agency executive didn't expect much change.

"Agency relationships are basically founded across a broad spectrum of people," he said. Since Mr. Timon's departure, he added, it's "business as usual" between his agency and Colgate.

A company spokesman said earlier that supervision of advertising would be in the hands of top management, regional management and product managers.

Mr. Mark has been stressing profitability rather than volume or share gains at the package-goods marketer since 1987. But it's unclear whether the profitability push will contribute to the expected de-emphasis on global advertising.

Mr. Mark declined to comment on Mr. Timon's departure and Colgate's strategy.

Colgate has thrived on its global marketing strategy and has long been praised for the creative fire behind the global advertising approach of Messrs. Mark and Timon.

It's doubtful Colgate will cut spending now that Mr. Timon is no longer on staff.

"In fact," said a source, "there may be some incremental spending. This is a company that believes in advertising."

"The place where Clay interfaced with the agency was in the international area," said Stanley Katz, chairman of FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, who added that Mr. Timon "made the agency report-card presentations for Colgate." He said Ms. Allen was involved with the agency on the U.S. business.

Ms. Allen didn't return phone calls at press time. □

BSB not for sale: Saatchi

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Co. last week denied plans to sell Backer Spielvogel Bates despite a breakdown in Saatchi's attempts to move its U.K. agency to Canary Wharf. Speculation was that the collapse of that deal might increase pressure on the agency to raise money elsewhere.

"We have had informal approaches to see whether we are interested in selling BSB," a Saatchi spokesman said, referring to contacts the agency has had with Paris-based agency groups RSCG Group and Eurocom. "We are not interested in selling BSB, and we have made that clear to all who have inquired."

Jean-Michel Goudard, RSCG International president, denied reports that RSCG has tried to buy Backer. But sources close to Saatchi previously have said an informal approach was made and turned down earlier this year.

Eurocom has approached Saatchi at least once about buying Backer and appears to still be interested. A member of the U.K. financial community said he believes Eurocom has hired a U.S. bank to evaluate possible deals. Eurocom executives wouldn't return phone calls last week.

To alleviate its financial problems, including current debt of more than $400 million, Saatchi is believed to be quietly seeking new investors, sources close to the company say.

ANALYSIS

Saatchi had hoped to interest Canary Wharf's owners, Olympia & York, in making an investment in the Saatchi holding company, sources say. But the Canadian developer decided it didn't want to be in the advertising business.

Even the deal to move to Canary Wharf fell apart when negotiations reached an impasse.

"It didn't make sense for O&Y and Saatchi & Saatchi to enter into a lease at Canary Wharf," an Olympia & York executive said. "It's more important for Saatchi to resolve its overall corporate problems before entering a lease."

If completed, the deal would only have brought Saatchi an estimated $20 million to $30 million in Olympia & York payments for the long leases on the buildings Saatchi would have vacated in the move.

"[Canary Wharf] was never going to save the company," said Mark Shepperd, an analyst at U.K. stockbroker UBS Phillips & Drew. "It would have been helpful but not a panacea for the company's problems."

Saatchi is also believed to have talked to Eurocom about taking an equity stake in the Saatchi holding company. But Eurocom appears to be more interested in acquiring advertising holdings, preferably ones that can be merged into its Paris-based Eurocom WCRS Della Femina Ball network.

Eurocom is currently exploring three options, none of which appears to have been definitely cho-

Catalogs high on yule list

By Alison Fahey

Industry touts growth curve, has visions of sugarplums for fourth quarter

Catalog marketers are going to have a much jollier holiday than retailers this year.

In spite of tough economic conditions, catalog sales growth is expected to outpace retail sales during the fourth quarter.

The catalog industry isn't recession-proof, but a Gallup Organization survey commissioned by Advertising Age shows consumers won't be trimming catalog shopping this Christmas (see charts at right).

"Catalogers are still on the growing part of the curve, and retail is more mature," says Bob Salerno, a partner at consultancy Coopers & Lybrand. "Sales growth [in retail] will be minimal."

Specialty catalog companies may grow at a slower rate than other catalogers because of increased competition, he says. "The individual catalog share of the market is shrinking."

While catalogers aren't immune to consumer reticence, "[the fourth quarter] looks pretty strong," says Jay Walker, chairman of Catalog Media Corp., a marketing and promotion company for catalog companies. "The fundamentals favor the catalogs and that [means] people have less time to shop."

Buying by mail "is increasingly becoming an accepted way of life," says Maxwell Sroge, president of the catalog consultancy that bears his name. He says the growing degree of acceptance will help carry catalogs through the fourth quarter.

Mr. Sroge projects overall catalog sales in the fourth quarter will be up about 10% to 12% from the same period a year ago. That compares with industry predictions that overall retail sales will be up 4% to 6% during the same period.

Last year, overall catalog sales were up about 12%, says Mr. Sroge, due in part to high fourth-quarter sales rather than new players. That was almost double the sales gains made at retail cash registers, according to industry figures. The surge prompted some catalog companies, including Spiegel Inc., to say it was their best Christmas ever.

This year, the postal rate hikes expected to go into effect in February are another big factor leading to projected sales momentum, say industry sources. Catalogers will try to beat rate hikes by mailing huge volumes of catalogs this year to acquire customers at a lower cost.

That increased mailing will lead not only to more customers but more sales, says Mr. Sroge.

"We're expecting a strong fourth quarter . . . in spite of everything that's going on," says Sara Wong, PR coordinator for Sharper Image.

Industry sources claim the convenience of shopping from home and improvements in catalogers' customer service are keeping shoppers out of crowded stores.

To accommodate a trend of late shopping, several catalogers last Christmas introduced quicker delivery service and overnight delivery, moves many catalogers say helped lift last-minute orders.

J.C. Penney Co. attributed its "double-digit" sales gains last year to improvements in order-taking by phone and a 48-hour delivery service.

"Promotions like [those] with Federal Express will be very aggressive this year because they tested so well last year," says Mr. Walker.

"The services offered by our catalog make it tough [for our stores] to compete," says another retail executive.

Penney's, like other catalogers, expects a

Catalog execs bare their weaknesses

By Kathy Martin

Aficionados of the latest J. Crew or Wolferman's Good Things to Eat know an essential truth about catalog marketing: it's habit-forming.

And who's more likely to be a mail-order junkie than the head of a catalog company?

Advertising Age asked executives at catalog companies about their most recent purchase from a catalog other than their own.

David Brownlee, ceo, Company Store

Mr. Brownlee's most recent purchase was a Lands' End shirt he bought for his brother.

"I've been an avid catalog buyer for years—that's not just part of my business," he says.

Mr. Brownlee usually orders apparel from J. Crew and Lands' End.

Lillian Vernon, ceo, Lillian Vernon Corp.

Ms. Vernon buys "antiques and gifts and frills" on her own during her world travels, she says.

But for the basics, she turns to catalogs. Her most recent purchase was a pair of white sneakers from L.L. Bean, which she says is her favorite catalog.

Gun Denhart, president-ceo, Hanna Andersson

Ms. Denhart recently bought swimming goggles for herself from Roberta Fortune's Almanac catalog.

Wayne Somers, senior VP, Harry & David

"Odd things" were the order of choice for Mr. Somers, who is busy fixing up a new house.

"We order quite a bit from catalogs, most recently some lighting fixtures from Kemp & George and Lightolier, home accessories and furnishings from Williams-Sonoma," he says. "My wife frequently buys clothing through the mail from Neiman Marcus, Lands' End and Bergdorf Goodman."

"When you live in Medford [Ore.], shopping is not one of the attributes," he says. "We find it necessary to shop by mail and are probably doing more mail-order now, as we just moved here and are doing work on our house.

"We support the industry where we can, but a lot of it is dictated by location."

Wayne Badovinus, ceo, Eddie Bauer

Gourmet cookware was the last purchase the recently married Mr. Badovinus made from a catalog. He bought several large cooking and kitchen utensils from the Spiegel catalog. □

Catalogers may be in trouble if retailers start slashing prices. Retailers are expected to hold off on price promotions, seeking to avoid the discounting frenzy that lowered profits last year.

But current consumer attitudes and spending patterns lead some to predict holiday discounting will be back with a vengeance.

"Retailers have more flexibility," says Mr. Sroge, which gives them an advantage over catalog marketers that can't respond to changing situations as quickly. □

Europe's satellite TV viewers soar

By Elena Bowes

LONDON—The number of viewers tuning into European commercial satellite TV has soared by 70% in the past year to 42.9 million, according to the fourth annual Pan-European Television Audience Research survey published this month.

Average weekly viewing per person of commercial satellite TV has more than doubled to 7 hours, 2 minutes this year from 3 hours, 18 minutes in 1989, according to the industry group's study.

Viewers are finally accepting satellite TV as an entertainment option, said Julian Pounds, chairman of PETAR's technical committee. "It's a question of gaining people's confidence," he said.

Increased satellite TV viewing is also due to more homes gaining access through their cable operators and more TV viewing in general, Mr. Pounds said. The potential audience for commercial satellite TV in the 11 largest cabled European countries is 53.7 million, up 24% over 1989.

CYNTHIA WATSON

The PETAR survey, conducted in the 11 biggest cabled markets in Europe, is projectable to 70% to 80% of all cabled homes. It includes 106 channels, 46 of which are satellite delivered.

The satellite stations have done a good job building their networks, Mr. Pounds said. SAT 1 and RTL-Plus, two West German channels, increased their audience in Switzerland, Austria and Germany, he said. MTV Europe has tripled its European audience with particular success in Germany, where viewership increased ninefold since 1989. CNN International's penetration of Western Europe increased 184%, with the biggest subscriber gains in Norway, Sweden and the Netherlands.

Although the stations are rapidly gaining viewers, advertiser interest has been slow because the channels are still considered experimental. Rupert Murdoch's Sky Channel, the first and one of the most ambitious, is still losing money after eight years.

"There's a lot more [advertising] now than when we first started, [but] not as much as the medium merits," Mr. Pounds said. "We hope this year we get an upturn in advertisers' interest. It's not a flash in the pan; it's obviously a developing market."

Commercial satellite TV's share of audience is growing at the expense of network TV, whose share of total audience in Europe dropped to 60% from 78%, according to PETAR.

Conducted by Nielsen Marketing Research, Oxford, England, the study asked 4,003 individuals to keep a diary of what they watched from April 2 to April 29.

Those funding the survey are McDonald's Systems of Europe, Financial Times Television, French-language channel TV5-Europe, BBC TV Europe, CNN International, MTV Europe, Italian state TV network RAI, RTL-Plus, SAT 1, Sky Television, Super Channel, W H Smith TV and the U.K.'s Independent Broadcasting Authority. □

Daiko mulls staffing Grey Europe

By David Kilburn

Daiko Advertising, Osaka, is examining possibilities of placing staff in Grey Advertising's European offices.

Japan's No. 5 agency and Grey already have a Tokyo joint venture, Grey-Daiko, that billed $78 million in 1989.

Last year, John Shannon, Grey Europe chairman-ceo, and other Grey executives made a presentation to Daiko executives about their European operation.

"They asked me to come and take a look, which I did in August [1990]," said Shojiro Nishio, Daiko president (AA, Aug. 20). "My impression was that they were doing very well" in Europe.

Compared with HDM and Lintas:Worldwide—both with well-established Japanese ties—Daiko currently handles little Japanese business in Europe.

"Although agencies like HDM, Lintas and Hakuhodo are already well-established working with Japanese advertisers in Europe, they can't handle all of them," Mr. Nishio said. "It is not really possible for agencies in Europe to handle multiple competing accounts as is done in Japan. So we feel there is certainly room for Grey and Daiko to get involved."

A first step would be opening offices in one or more European cities—London, Paris or Brussels—next year.

"We will probably start off by stationing Daiko executives in Grey offices in one or more countries," Mr. Nishio said.

"We'll see what business opportunities we have and how they develop," he said. "At that stage, we'll discuss how best to develop our relationship with Grey. Essentially, we are talking about a cooperative arrangement.

"We've not discussed this with our clients in Japan yet. However, we'd hope that there might be some opportunities for us to work with Panasonic and Mazda in Europe," he added.

"I think I would say given our long and successful relationship in Japan, the obvious next step seems to be to extend this into a European market that [with the single European market in 1992 approaching] offers some tremendous opportunities," Grey's Mr. Shannon said.

Grey and Daiko executives have discussed contacting Japanese companies both in Europe via Grey and in Japan via Daiko for European accounts, he said.

There could also be opportunities to work with local dealers and distributors for Japanese companies in Europe. Local dealers and distributors often use small local agencies, working independently of one another.

"Many Japanese advertisers use different agencies in each country. After 1992, there is likely to be more interest in achieving a wider coverage than purely local agencies can achieve. This presents opportunities for Daiko and Grey," Mr. Nishio said.

In 1989, Daiko billed $1.2 billion, 99% from within Japan, Daiko executives said. In 1989, Grey Europe billed $1.3 billion. □

He's one of the most influential managers in the nation.

Yet he won't see your ad in Fortune or Business Week.

He's responsible for over a million people and he's not even 50 yet. Last year he purchased nearly $15 million in goods and services.

Who is this mega-consumer?

He's an elected, appointed or career official in one of the largest state or local governments in the nation. He's one of the few, very powerful, leaders that control the lion's share of spending in a tremendous $827 billion market.

This influential manager is an opinion leader and your best prospect for selling all types of products and services including computers, software, telecommunications, financial services and insurance.

He could be your biggest customer, but you won't sell him in Business Week or Fortune. He reads City & State.* (In fact, he's most likely to tell you he reads every issue.) City & State is his source for news on all types of management issues, from financing techniques to the latest applications for information technology. And with a new issue on his desk every other Monday, he's assured of useful, up-to-date information.

Reach this important decision maker, and nearly 190,000 others just like him, in City & State, the business newspaper for government managers.

AUGUST AD RESULTS

Cars drive first ad gain

By Scott Donaton

A sharp upturn in automotive spending brought magazines a modest gain in ad pages last month, the first monthly increase this year.

August ad pages totaled 11,345.8, up 0.5% from the same month last year, Publishers Information Bureau reported. But pages still were down 3.1% for the first eight months from a year earlier, totaling 106,889.

The increase was sparked by a 56.5% jump in automotive revenues to $66.5 million, the second consecutive monthly gain for magazines' largest ad category. Still, for the first eight months, automotive revenues were down 2.5% at $557.8 million.

Cigarette/tobacco spending continued its downward spiral. Revenues were down 34.3% last month to $19.8 million. For the first eight months, the category was off 27.5% to $198.4 million.

Sixty-eight of the top 100 magazines tracked by PIB posted declines for the first eight months; 30 posted gains. Family Media's 1,001 Home Ideas was flat with 451.86 ad pages. And Time Warner's Entertainment Weekly made its first appearance in the ranking with 523.72 ad pages through August. The title was launched in February.

Business Week remained the ad page leader for the first eight months of 1990 with 2,499.13 pages, an 8.4% drop. Bride's was the bridesmaid with 2,354.94 pages, down 0.8%. Forbes was third with 2,210.56 pages, up 6.8%, while Fortune was fifth with 2,015.9 pages, a 7.8% decline.

Among weeklies, People, Time and Newsweek all registered modest gains last month. No. 4 People's pages were up 17% in August; Time's pages rose 20.3%; and Newsweek saw pages increase 15.9%. For the first eight months, People was down 7.1% with 2,151.41 pages, Time was off 4% to 1,568.86 and Newsweek dropped 7.6% to 1,326.57.

The New Yorker, which had an exceptional second half last year, was down 7.2% in August to 113.76 pages. But for the first eight months, it was among the few weeklies gaining, reporting with a 2.5% increase to 1,268.96 pages.

Other weeklies remained in a slump. TV Guide, with 1,740.22 ad pages through August, was down 11%; Sports Illustrated carried 1,560.9 ad pages, a 14.5% decline; New York Magazine was off 13.8% to 1,546.6; and U.S. News & World Report's pages dipped 2.7% to 1,162.34.

Among beauty and fashion titles, category leader Vogue was off 8.2% through August with 1,682.27 ad pages, while Elle was up 0.1% to 1,255.35. Cosmopolitan carried 1,344.84 ad pages, down 9.4%; Glamour was down 9.3% to 1,146.65; and Mademoiselle, with 948.53 pages, was off 10.1%.

In the women's service field, Good Housekeeping was the only one of the Seven Sisters to register a gain. The Hearst Corp. monthly carried 1,051.51 ad pages in the first eight months, up 7.7%. Family Circle followed with 1,032.57 pages, a 16.3% slide. McCall's was last among the Seven Sisters with 615.92 pages, down 15.1%.

Conde Nast Publications' GQ remained the top book in the men's field despite a 10.4% decline to 1,108.86 ad pages. Hearst's Esquire was second with 747.81 ad pages, a 3.2% increase. Playboy carried 441.97 ad pages, down 9.8%, while Penthouse's 407.21 ad pages put it up 6.1%.

M ended with 468.58 ad pages, a 4.9% dip. The monthly, published by Capital Cities/ABC's Fairchild division, married new purchase Manhattan,inc. to create M Inc., which made its debut this month.

The auto spending boost helped the leading monthly auto buff books tracked by PIB, which had been mired in steep declines. Car & Driver, Road & Track and Motor Trend saw gains of 30.7%, 12.6% and 65.9%, respectively, for the month. But for the first eight months, all three were down. Car & Driver carried 839.39 ad pages in the first eight months, down 2.9%; Road & Track, with 734.34 ad pages, was down 10.7%; and Motor Trend saw pages fall 11.5% to 601.93. □

PERSPECTIVAS

Hispanic car buys down as ads surge

By Christy Fisher

Despite dramatic increases in Hispanic-specific auto advertising, Hispanic purchases of 1989 model-year passenger cars declined.

According to an R.L. Polk & Co. study commissioned by Univision Network, Hispanic registrations of 1989 new vehicles in 24 major Hispanic markets dropped 7%, to 228,636 units, from the previous model-year registrations.

Non-Hispanic purchases declined a more moderate 4.2% to more than 2.5 million units.

This reverses recent trends: The previous model year, Hispanic purchases climbed 8.9%, while non-Hispanic purchases fell 2%.

Hispanic light truck 1989 model year purchases took almost as sharp a fall, dropping 4% to 117,968 units, after having surged 10.2% the previous year. Non-Hispanic 1989 model year light truck sales rose 0.5% to more than 1 million units.

Data from J.D. Power & Associates also showed a drop from May 1988 to April 1989, following a three-year climb.

The findings suggest short-term, population growth is less of an influence than the economy on total Hispanic market purchasing power, said Dennis Ricci, marketing director-media and advertising services at J.D. Power. "Hispanics as a group have lower income and could be more affected in tighter times."

However, automotive advertisers targeting Hispanics say they are not alarmed by the numbers.

"The long-term trend for the Hispanic market is up [because of population growth potential]," said Richard Halseth, media manager for Ford Motor Co.

"It looks like what is happening in the general market is magnified in the Hispanic market somewhat," he said. "But we don't think it will continue. We suspect [the numbers] are an aberration."

While purchases fall off, Univision and Telemundo Group report automotive ad spending to be up significantly. Univision reports auto ad revenues are up 70% year-to-date; Telemundo claims a 190% jump.

Greater competition in the auto marketplace helps to explain the ad spending jump, said Chris Roman, Univision's Detroit-based regional sales manager.

"Automotive advertisers can't expect to throw a couple of commercials on and dominate Hispanic media anymore," Mr. Roman said. "More and more players are getting into the market, which is getting more sophisticated. We're seeing more advertising, event marketing, dealer packages and POP."

At Univision, imports are leading the ad surge.

"The import cars are really kicking butt in terms of spending," said Raul Torano, senior VP-director of sales for Univision.

Imports' heavy ad spending has helped them achieve greater unit sales growth than domestics from 1986 to 1989. In that time period, Hispanic purchases of imported cars increased 35.8% vs. a 6.6% decline in domestic car sales, according to Polk.

Univision's top auto advertiser is American Honda Motor Co., followed by Mazda Motors of America, General Motors' Chevrolet Motor Division, Ford Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Sales USA, sources say.

Telemundo is seeing large increases from both domestic automakers and imports, said Don Travis, Telemundo's VP-general sales manager.

Top auto advertisers on Telemundo are Ford Motor's Ford and Lincoln-Mercury divisions, Chrysler Corp., Toyota and Honda.

New auto advertisers on Spanish-language TV in 1990 include American Isuzu Motors; Mazda; Mitsubishi Motor Sales of America; Volkswagen of America; GM's Oldsmobile division; GMC Trucks; and Yugo America. Nissan Motor Corp. USA is also active in the market.

Holdouts include GM's Pontiac and Buick divisions, which reportedly are evaluating the market.

Hyundai Motor America was inactive in 1990. Hyundai experienced the greatest share decline among automakers from 1988 to 1989 model year sales, seeing its share decline from 8.3% to 6.1%.

New auto campaigns breaking in October include:

- An effort from GS&B Advertising, Coral Gables, Fla., for Chevrolet's Camaro, Geo and Cavalier. GS&B grabbed the Chevy account when Lintas:Latina was merged with GS&B following Lintas:USA's purchase of 49% of GS&B.
- A new spot in western markets for Oldsmobile's Cutlass Supreme via Hispanic USA, Albuquerque, N.M.
- New TV, radio and print from La Agencia de Orci, Los Angeles, for Honda's Civic and Accord.
- New TV, radio and print for Toyota Tercel, Camry, Corolla, 4x4 truck and 4x2 truck via Conill Advertising/West, Los Angeles.
- TV and print for Dodge Caravan; Plymouth Voyager and Sundance; and Jeep Cherokee Sport via Montemayor y Asociados, San Antonio, Texas. □

Big budget, big sales

As the tagline says, "something big is happening" at Honda. The leading import advertiser, Honda's share of Hispanic car purchases jumped from 7.9% in model year 1988 to 9.3% in 1989, as Hispanic sales grew from 7.9% to 8.3% of Honda's total sales.

Lintas bounces back with GS&B

By Christy Fisher

Lintas:USA has acquired a 49% interest in Coral Gables, Fla.-based GS&B Advertising. The shop will be merged on Nov. 1 with Miami-based Lintas:Latina, which will be closed.

Lintas:Latina saw half of its $20 million in billings fly out the window when Eastern Airlines sold its Latin American routes to American Airlines in July.

"We found ourselves below threshold level in billings," said Spencer Plavoukos, chairman-ceo of Lintas:New York. "We had to make a move to get more mass."

"We found ourselves below threshold level in billings. We had to make a move to get more mass."

GS&B will provide Hispanic advertising and marketing services to Lintas, as well as other units of parent Interpublic Group of Cos.

The move follows quickly the July 1 dissolution of GS&B's year-old merger with Castor Spanish International, New York.

GS&B Advertising will have estimated billings of $32 million and 60 employees. Heading the shop are GS&B executives Al Garcia-Serra, president-ceo, and Julio Blanco, exec VP-creative director; no Lintas:Latina employees are being laid off as a result of the merger.

GS&B handles Edward J. DeBartolo Corp., Miami Metro Zoo, Miami City Ballet and Pan Am Corp. Lintas brings General Motors Corp. Chevrolet division, Coca-Cola Foods, Lehn & Fink (Lysol products), Carnation Foods, Thomas J. Lipton Inc. and MasterCard International.

FoVa improves relations: Font & Vaamonde Associates, New York, recently added a PR arm. Operated as a separate company, FoVa PR initially will service Warner Bros. and Adolph Coors Co.

FoVa also is hoping to strengthen its Hispanic agency network by turning its ancillary offices in Chicago, Los Angeles, Miami and San Antonio into full-service shops. As part of the changes, Vice-Chairman Luis Wexsler has been named general manager of the northern and southern divisions and Vice-Chairman Rochelle Newman adds the title of western division general manager.

FoVa also picked up the plum network TV buying assignment from Procter & Gamble Co., the Hispanic market's leading network TV advertiser, from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles.

Shop adds Hispanic: Wilshire Newport, Burbank, Calif., has established Dimension Hispana to service the Hispanic market. Frank Betancourt, VP, heads the new division. □

Top 100 boosts ad spending 6.4% to almost $34 billion

Philip Morris again heads the parade; while 30 actually cut ad dollars, many leading marketers lean on line extensions

Philip Morris Cos., powered by a heavy investment in advertising and promotion for its Kraft General Foods unit, retained its title as the top U.S. advertiser with expenditures of $2.07 billion in 1989, according to the 35th annual Advertising Age 100 Leading National Advertisers report.

Procter & Gamble Co., at $1.78 billion, finished second to Philip Morris for the third consecutive year, although its 7.5% increase moved it closer to PM, whose ad growth rose only 2.2%.

Sears, Roebuck & Co. boosted advertising by 38% to push its "everyday low prices" marketing strategy, and edged out General Motors Corp. for the No. 3 spot.

The top four marketers—the only ones to break the $1 billion advertising barrier—represented almost 20% of the Top 100 total of $33.9 billion, up 6.4%. Price of admission to the Top 100 was $104.3 million, recorded by No. 100 Dr Pepper/Seven Up Cos.

The ad volume increase by the Top 100 dropped slightly from 6.7% growth in 1988. That year, marketers supported only 3.9% more new products than in 1987.

Apart from ad volume, the Top 100's ad efficiency pace-setter was No. 86 Wal-Mart Stores, which generated $203.15 in sales per ad dollar spent. While down 7.2% from the previous year, the total far exceeds the $48.72 from a more diversified Sears, down 11.2%. Wal-Mart's ad expenditure last year was $127.1 million.

Wal-Mart was one of five new entries to the Top 100. Others were No. 81 Circuit City Stores, No. 92 United Telecommunications (US Sprint), No. 96 Daimler-Benz AG and No. 99, Nike Inc.

Dropouts from the Top 100 included American Cyanamid Co., whose sale this year of Shulton USA excludes it from the Ad Age tally; BCI Holdings Corp., whose Beatrice food properties are now part of No. 51 ConAgra; and Columbia Pictures Entertainment, now a unit of No. 31 Sony Corp. Ad expenditures for Franklin Mint and Borden Inc. dropped below the 1989 cutoff.

In 1989, new-product growth rebounded, rising 14.2%.

Comparing that new-product volume increase with last year's maintenance-level advance in advertising indicates marketers redistributed dollars within brand lines rather than adding new funds.

National media ad spending accounted for $19 billion, or 56%, of the Top 100 total volume. The remainder was "unmeasured" spending—advertising and promotion not monitored by national tracking services (see story on Page 2).

Network TV accounted for 21.4% of Top 100 spending, growing 2.7% to $7.2 billion. A measure of the Top 100's power in that medium is that 75.8% of all network TV spending came from the group, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The Top 100 propped up the medium in 1989, when spending for all network advertisers actually declined 0.2%. Network TV's dominance among national measured media is being eroded by dramatic increases in syndicated TV and cable TV, which grew 43% and 27.4%, respectively, nationally.

The Top 100 also are leading a first-half 1990 spending spurt in network TV, which in total is up 10.7% to $5.2 billion. Growth in syndicated TV has slowed to 27.3% and cable TV to 15%.

As in 1988, GM poured more ad dollars into network TV than anyone else, $506.5 million, 37.1% of its U.S. media budget.

No. 6 PepsiCo remained the leading advertiser in spot TV—a primary medium for its big restaurant core of Pizza Hut, Kentucky Fried Chicken and Taco

Spending up 6.4%

Bell. The company spent $264.6 million in spot, up 2.6%. Spot TV spending among the Top 100 grew to $3.7 billion in 1989, up 2.3%. Total spot TV advertising in 1989 hit $9 billion, up 4.9%. During the first half of 1990, spot TV spending on the medium has remained flat at $4.4 billion, up only 1.8%.

The Top 100 contributed 23.7% of all LNA/Arbitron measured expenditures for national newspaper advertising. Retailers among the Top 100 dominated that medium, claiming nine out of the top 10 positions.

The leading advertiser in national newspapers was No. 27 May Department Stores Co., at $230.9 million, up 4.8%.

Philip Morris Cos. dominated magazine advertising with spending of $281.5 million, up 3.7%, about $68 million more than runner-up General Motors.

Revlon Group, No. 58, and E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., No. 78, were the only two advertisers among the magazine category's top 25 to devote more than 30% of total ad dollars to magazines.

Consumer magazine ad spending grew a healthy 11.8% in 1989, to $2.9 billion. But growth slid to a dismal 1.8% in first-half 1990 as spending slowed to $3.2 billion.

Hidden in composite growth totals of the Top 100 is the fact that close to one-third actually put less into advertising in 1989 than in 1988. In 1988, 25 showed reduced spending; that number rose to 30 in 1989.

Those companies ranged across categories. Among the eight largely pharmaceutical companies in this report, five spent less. Conversely, 10 of 11 auto companies among the Top 100 showed a collective 14.8% increase. Among automakers only Volkswagen AG cut spending, to $131.9 million, down 6%.

Drug companies tended to shuffle ad dollars within brand lines—to back extensions—rather than add new funds. Bayer AG, No. 97, backed Alka-Seltzer Advance Formula (with acetaminophen) with almost $12 million but spending for the entire Alka-Seltzer line decreased.

Considerable divestitures within the drug industry encouraged lower spending levels. Schering-Plough Corp., No. 72, sold Maybelline Co. and cut advertising 15% on its remaining consumer lines as its focus turned to ethical drugs and their possible over-the-counter conversion.

Ad spending at SmithKline Beecham, No. 54, dropped 21.4% as it sold cosmetics lines in a cost-cutting measure following its merger last year. The intent is to concentrate on prescription-to-OTC movement of drug products. Johnson & Johnson, No. 20, signed a deal with Merck & Co. to move Merck's ethical drugs to OTC.

Kraft General Foods, responsible for more than half of Philip Morris Cos.' total expenditures, entered the year intent on becoming "fat-free" in its food lines. Such a tag could apply just as well to the flurry of new-product growth from all marketers, according to New Product News.

The publication reported new products totaled 12,055 in 1989, up 14.2%. There were 9,192 new food products, up 12.3%, and 2,863 new non-food items, up 20.5%.

Health (lower calorie, low-fat, low-sodium and no-cholesterol) was the byword for most of the 694 new entrees/dinners, up 13.2%, led by Healthy Choice from ConAgra, Stouffer's Right Course from No. 11 Nestle S.A. and Le Menu's LightStyle line from No. 57 Campbell Soup Co.

The health & beauty aids category, which grew 15.4% to 2,308 new entries after dropping off 1.9% in 1988 from '87, saw heavy activity in OTC line extensions and cross-category brand expansion. Nowhere was that more evident than at Johnson & Johnson, which in 1989 introduced Tylenol Adult Cold Medication, Tylenol Allergy Sinus and Children's Tylenol Cold remedies.

The pain-relief market was active in new growth from virtually every Top 100 player in the category. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., No. 23, introduced Excedrin PM and Aspirin-Free Excedrin. Bayer introduced Alka-Seltzer Advance Formula from Miles Inc., a low-sodium, lemon-flavored acetaminophen product.

Heavy new-product activity in household supplies boosted totals to 372 for the year, up 59.7%. Included in the surge were detergents, in particular well-known brands in superconcentrated and bleach-added versions from P&G; No. 43 Colgate-Palmolive Co.; No. 12 Unilever NV; and No. 63 Clorox Co.

Despite the slump in sales and massive debt plaguing the retail industry, ad spending by the 12 retailers in the Top 100 rose 5.3% to $3.2 billion. The group's average sales per ad dollar also increased to $61.28 in 1989, up $2.04.

Wal-Mart's leading sales per ad dollar tally of $203.15 represented a drop of 7.2% from 1988. Wal-Mart prides itself on its parsimonious ad outlay. Much of its advertising, in fact, is vendor-driven.

Other retailers are beginning to take advantage of these manufacturer-supplied dollars. K mart Corp., No. 18, began a "Partnership Marketing" campaign this August jointly funded by the retailer and product marketers.

Co-op spending is part of "unmeasured" advertising, an amorphous total dominated increasingly by sales promotion. This year's sales promotion crown goes to No. 7 McDonald's Corp.

McDonald's developed tie-ins with movies "The Little Mermaid" and "Dick Tracy" and the syndicated TV "Disney Afternoon" with No. 33 Walt Disney Co. McDonald's also cross-promoted Kendall Co.'s Curity Curad First-Aid strips with its Happy Meals and is linking with NBC-TV this fall in a watch-and-win sweepstakes called "McMillions on NBC." □

Methodology and sources

Rankings

The 100 Leading National Advertisers are selected from the 200 largest advertisers based on measured U.S. ad spending (see below) in calendar year 1989. Companies spending more than $29.5 million in measured media make up this group of 200. Those companies are ranked by the sum of their measured and unmeasured expenditures. This report profiles the top 100.

Measured media & monitoring services

In this report measured media refers to advertising expenditures in national consumer media that are monitored by LNA/-Arbitron Multi-Media Service (a single service provided by the two companies Leading National Advertisers and Arbitron Co.) and Radio Expenditure Reports, now a part of LNA.

10 measured media

Magazine: Publishers Information Bureau monitors 166 consumer magazines.

Newspaper: LNA/Media Records measures and projects newspaper data to 125 markets for all categories except financial and retail ad spending, which are not projected and represent 41 and 36 markets, respectively.

Sunday magazine: PIB measures four Sunday magazines. Media Records measures 34 and projects spending based on one-time open inch rates to 125 markets.

Outdoor: LNA Outdoor measures poster and paint boards in more than 200 plant operator markets.

Network TV: Arbitron records every minute of ABC, CBS and NBC network TV and calculates ad spending by applying program rates to each spot.

Spot TV: Arbitron monitors TV stations in 75 markets, 17 of which are monitored daily and 58 once a week.

Syndicated TV: Arbitron gathers rates from advertisers and agencies and applies the rates to national spots bought by advertisers.

Cable TV networks: Arbitron monitors Christian Broadcast Network, Cable News Networks, ESPN, MTV:Music Television, USA Network and Superstation WTBS around the clock. Estimated rates are applied to advertisers.

Network radio: Arbitron monitors 17 radio networks.

Spot radio: RER compiles data from national stations' representative organizations, yielding spending for nearly 2,500 stations in more than 200 markets.

Unmeasured spending

Unmeasured spending figures are Ad Age estimates and include direct mail, promotion, co-op, couponing, catalogs, business and farm magazines, and special events, to name a few. Corporate annual reports, 10-K forms, corporate sources and Ad Age reporters help compute this number. Unmeasured advertising does not include corporate overhead, overseas ad spending or most local ad spending.

Brand spending

Ad spending by top brands presented in tabular form at the top of each profile includes LNA/Arbitron's nine measured media only. To be listed in the tables, a brand must have spending greater than $1 million in 1989. Brand expenditures represent total spending by an LNA designated "tradename" within a PIB subclass.

For example, in the Philip Morris Cos. profile, "Kraft cheeses" and "Kraft salad dressings & mayonnaise" are listed as top brands. The "Kraft" name is considered a trade name by LNA; "cheese" and "salad dressing & mayonnaise" are PIB subclasses. Throughout this report, totals for tradenames within subclasses are called brand spending totals.

Retailers' brands

Among retailers, advertising by a store name in such subclasses as "apparel," "household" and "drugs & toiletries" is considered brand spending. In the K mart Corp. profile, for example, spending by top brands includes "K mart stores sport," which refers only to advertising for sporting goods, while "K mart stores" reflects less specific spending for the entire store.

Sales and earnings

Worldwide, U.S. and division sales and earnings are taken from public documents unless otherwise noted. Exchange rates are given for foreign-based companies, unless the company reported in U.S. dollars. Although ad figures represent U.S. spending only, worldwide headquarters are listed because some large corporate advertisers include divisions which are not related in the U.S. Spending by Philips NV, for example, includes North American Philips Corp. and Polygram Records Corp.

Corporate composition

Parent company totals for advertising spending are pro forma for 1989 and 1988—and include 100% of the ad spending of companies they either acquired or agreed to acquire as of Aug. 1, 1990. Similarly, companies or divisions divested before Aug. 1, 1990, have been excluded.

U.S. Government spending

Ad spending figures for the U.S. Government are compiled from ad agencies of the federal government, rather than the sources listed here.

Annual review

American Brands pulled out all the ad stops for its American Tobacco unit in 1989 in boosting the subsidiary's media spending 33% to $62.8 million, but it was the Jim Beam subsidiary, where ad dollars jumped a bare inflation-matching 4%, that a key repositioning will have an impact on the company's future.

Jim Beam bourbon, which advertising-marketing VP Ralph Hallquist said "did not have a clearly defined consumer personality" until the 1989 campaign, received the largest media support in its history—$4.6 million, up 64.6%.

Results from the campaign, based on a series of often whimsical magazine ads themed, "You always come back to the basics," were immediate and dramatic. The brand moved up from sixth to fifth among liquor brands with a 2.4 share of market (2.3 in 1988), according to analyst John C. Maxwell Jr. of Wheat, First Securities, on a volume increase of 0.8%. Earlier this month, the $14 million Jim Beam Brands account was consolidated at Fallon McElligott, Minneapolis, from portions at BBDO and Cramer-Krasselt, both Chicago.

Also lacking in personality were Gilbey's Gin and Windsor Canadian Supreme whiskey, gained in the acquisition of the distilled spirits divisions of National Distillers in 1987, which slipped at a rate greater than the industry sales overall decline of 2.7%.

Gilbey's dropped to No. 31 from No. 26 as its case depletions slipped 10.4%, producing a market share of 0.7%, down a tenth. Windsor dropped two positions, to No. 16, on a 9.1% decline in case depletions that produced a share of 1.3%, off a tenth. Media backing for Gilbey's gin was $3.1 million, more than double the prior year spending, while Windsor got $2.2 million, down 31%. New campaigns for both began late in the fourth quarter of 1989 and peaked in March 1990.

This year, Kamora coffee liqueur, previously unadvertised, and De Kuyper cordials—backed by $3.5 million in media in 1989, down 35%—will be repositioned. The latter saw a national rollout of three flavor extensions in 1989—BlueBerry, ButterShots and WilderBerry. As a result, overall spending is expected to increase this year.

Also in 1989, American Brands purchased Whyte & Mckay of Glasgow and began distributing The Dalmore, the company's single-malt (as opposed to blended) Scotch whisky in the U.S.

American Tobacco's share of the tobacco market dropped from 7% to 6.9%, as its share advanced one point to 7% among price-value brands but dropped to 6.9% from 7.1% in the standard price category, according to Mr. Maxwell.

American Tobacco's cigarette sales were up only because international sales were strong. American Tobacco's U.S. sales were down 3% to 36.9 billion units, while foreign sales were up 12% to 49.1 billion, according to Kidder, Peabody & Co.

Much of the new ad muscle was put behind price-value offerings—a category equal to about 15% of the market, including American Tobacco's second largest brand outlay of $16.8 million for Malibu, up 38%. Backing for Malibu (a full-price but heavily couponed brand) was mostly in consumer magazines and Sunday magazines. The brand, which got a line extension in Malibu Ultra Lights, increased in market share from 0.5 to 0.6%.

Newly-introduced American cigarettes, with media support of $843,000 in consumer magazines and newspapers, claimed a 0.4% share of market in its first full year.

Another value-price brand, Montclair, rolled out nationally in March 1989, but no media support was provided in 1989.

As the non-filter category continues to decline, taking the once top-performing Pall Mall with it, the company placed virtually all its advertising against the filtered versions of the brand.

Carlton filters pulled the largest American Tobacco expenditure of $27 million, up 20%. Its dominant media, too, were consumer magazines and Sunday magazines. Carlton's market share showed no growth at 1.7%—the company's biggest market share contributor.

Carlton and Malibu spent $2.2 million and $4.3 million, respectively, in outdoor—American Tobacco's two heaviest users of the medium.

AB's Acushnet golf clubs and balls continue to draw heavy media support of $7 million, down 15.7%. Advertising for Foot-Joy golf accessories dipped 17% to $2.4 million.

Guide to profile information

Fictitious Barrel of Brands Corp. ranks 22nd among 100 Leading National Advertisers picked by Advertising Age in this issue. Boston-based BOBC spent $500 million on advertising in calendar year 1989, according to AA estimates.

Ad spending figures by media—given in thousands of dollars in the tabular breakout beneath the box—include expenditures measured by media monitoring services and unmeasured advertising estimated by AA.

Brand spending includes LNA/Arbitron's nine measured media only: magazine, Sunday magazine, newspaper, outdoor, network TV, spot TV, syndicated TV, cable TV networks and network radio. They include all spending within Publishers Information Bureau category by an LNA designated tradename. (See Page 2 for methodology and sources.)

BOBC's sales and earnings—given in millions of U.S. dollars—represent the company's latest fiscal yearend, which is noted beneath the data if it is not a calendar year. Exchange rates are given for foreign companies unless figures were reported in U.S. dollars.

Worldwide and U.S. sales, earnings and operating income are taken from public documents unless otherwise noted. Division sales are the business segments as defined by BOBC and include revenues for comparable years.

Annual review

American Express, already spread thin in the marketing war against bank cards and other financial institutions, took to battle on another front this year—rebuilding its Shearson Lehman Brothers unit, which was hard hit by the collapse of the junk bond market.

American Express CFO Howard L. Clark Jr. took over as chairman of the unit, separated its investment banking and retail divisions and dropped ad agency McCann-Erickson for Ally & Gargano. Ally then broke a campaign tagged "When you do it better, you get to be the leader."

Just about the time AmEx seemed to be losing its sizzle in the credit-card market, Kenneth Roman, top executive at AmEx agency Ogilvy & Mather, was hired as exec VP-corporate affairs and communications.

He is helping American Express, which has clung to its image as the caviar card, lure the pizza crowd. The card is being tested at Domino's Pizza in New York. Ads are even being placed on carry-out pizza boxes. The card has been accepted at Gulf gas stations and Target Stores, the nation's No. 3 discount chain.

AmEx got into the rebate business, teaming up with TWA to offer cash rebates of up to $1,000 in the form of American Express gift checks on international travel. Any cardmember putting a $500 down payment on a Buick with an AmEx card also received a free vacation.

The reason for the move to middle America is that the long-running credit-card wars are not going well even though worldwide charge volume climbed 12% to $25 billion in 1989. Margins are narrowing as the giveaways and lower and better fees mount. An interest-rate war also could be materializing.

Visa captured 45.1% of the $296.9 billion U.S. volume for charge cards with $134 billion in 1989, according to Curt Peters, Credit Cards News editor. MasterCard had 28.1% compared to American Express' 21.9%, down from 22.6% in 1988. Discover and Diner's Club shared 4.9%. Visa's share of market has held at 58% since 1988, while MasterCard's share has dropped slightly to 36%.

Credit card issuers are looking for ways to combat the successful AT&T Universal card, which experts predict will have 35 million cards out by 1995—more than AmEx with its 23.3 million cards and charge volume of $65 billion.

Instead of targeting each other's customers, competitors are aiming for the bigger consumer spending pie. Of the $3 trillion spent last year, 87.5% of expenditures were by check and cash.

American Express hasn't forgotten its upscale base. It sponsored a 14-page, co-op ad section promoting Optima and Green cards in Vogue last year and, jointly with its own New York Woman magazine, sponsored a holiday express bus that hit 45 Manhattan stores which advertise in the magazine.

A similar promotion will occur in the fourth quarter when AmEx pulls out its "Shoppers Service," a multi-page ad "catalog" inserted in selected fashion magazines containing products from 15 retailers. Cardmembers will place orders by calling a toll-free number. AmEx is backing the program with $2 million in print and a direct mail shopping guide, "In-Store," that went to 1 million cardholders in nine major markets in September. The campaign was created by Lipman, Richmond, Greene Advertising, New York. Bronner Slosberg Associates handled direct marketing.

American Express, unbridled by federal restrictions, is continuing to battle the banks by stepping into their turf. The company added a personal savings program for cardholders which has heightened bankers' fears that AmEx will eat into their customer base. One consultant called the panoply of AmEx products—money market account, line of credit, credit cards and mutual fund products—a "CitiOne account without branch banking."

AmEx has upped its ad budget by some $12 million to $181 million. Much of the increase, some $8 million, went to double the budget of the Gold bank card to $16 million. Gift checks rose 44% to $11 million.

Some increases came at the expense of advertising at Shearson Lehman Brothers which dropped 32.6% to $15.7 million in media, according to LNA/Arbitron. Despite an overall 8.4% growth in media spending at AmEx, expenditures were off in network TV and newspapers—media in which Shearson spending declined by $2 million and $4 million, respectively. Spot TV rose a dramatic 83% including $15 million alone in new spending for Optima and Gold cards and the AmEx corporate card system.

American Express has become an aggressive player in the communications business through American Express Publishing Co., which announced plans to publish as many as 20 magazines in five years, either by inaugurating new publications or purchasing existing ones. The unit acquired city magazines, Atlanta and D, a Dallas-Fort Worth monthly, and repositioned Departures magazine.

Annual review

American Home Products Corp. moved closer toward becoming a major force in healthcare with the divestiture of an unrelated division and the acquisition of A.H. Robins Co.

The $1.25 billion sale of its Boyle-Midway division to Reckitt & Colman PLC included Woolite, Easy-Off, Wizard, Black Flag and Sani-Flush brands as well as the Neet depilatory line. Measured spending in 1989 by the division's brands exceeded $30 million.

AHP retained the division's Pam cooking spray and Butter Buds Sprinkle Butter Substitute, whose sales grew 36% last year thanks to America's obsession with healthy eating.

The acquisition of A.H. Robins, which has been in Chapter 11 from claims against its Dalkon Shield, brought well-known health care products such as Robitussin, Dimetapp and Chap Stick. These items complement AHP's existing base, offered Jim Callandrillo, project manager of Fairfield, N.J.-based Kline & Co. "Plus, American Home will be able to get Robins' products into more outlets."

Robitussin remained the leader in the $2.1 billion OTC cough liquid category with a 32% share, ahead of Vicks' 18% share. Measured spending against the brand, which still carries the Robins logo, registered $17 million, up 30.8%. There are currently four formulas for different cough conditions. During 1989, the line was extended to single dose and improved Night Relief.

Dimetapp garnered 9% of the upper respiratory category, behind Richardson Vick's Nyquil's 12% share. About $22 million was allocated in 1989 spending.

Despite a slight 1% reduction in measured spending overall for AHP brands, they retained impressive market shares.

Sales of Advil, the jewel of its Whitehall division, grew 19% last year to $230 million, claiming 53% of the ibuprofen business, way ahead of Nuprin's 20%. Motrin IB from Upjohn, which also makes Nuprin for Bristol-Myers Squibb, carved out a 2% share in its first year, according to Kline's Julie Wolfe.

Although Advil is expected to rev up spending to keep it No. 1, measured spending from 1988 to 1989 remained relatively stable at $48 million. Advil is now the No. 2 brand in the entire $2.5 billion pain relief market behind Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol.

Capitalizing on the strong Advil name, CoAdvil and Children's Advil Suspension were rolled out in 1989. CoAdvil, backed with a $9 million budget, is a combination ibuprofen and pseudoephedrine for relief of cold, sinus and flu symptoms.

In July 1990, Whitehall moved the $17 million Anacin aspirin account from Young & Rubicam to Partners & Shevack which already handled the $11 million Anacin-3 business.

Whitehall's Clearblue Easy commands about 19% of the burgeoning home pregnancy test kit business and during early 1990 a Clearplan Easy ovulation predictor was rolled out to the trade. Clearblue measured spending reached $4 million.

American Home Food remained the leader in the $700 million prepared pasta segment with its Chef Boyardee lineup. Fueling growth was the Chef Boyardee Microwave Meals brand which expanded in 1989 with four children's microwave pasta dishes. Chef Boyardee commands almost 60% of the business, ahead of Campbell's 36% share. Measured spending—up 11.4% to $20.5 million in 1989—led a big marketing push behind the microwave meals.

A shakeup in the Whitehall division led to the departure of L. Randall Yates who is credited with helping launch Advil in 1984.

Annual review

Rather than continue its fight to merge its Alpha Beta and Lucky Stores, American Stores Co. will divest over the next five years 151 of its 174 Alpha Betas and nine of the newly bought 393-store Lucky chain.

The divestiture agreement was reached this May with the state of California which had enjoined American from merging the two grocery units on antitrust grounds. It followed a ruling against American by the U.S. Supreme Court that left in place a state order to halt the merger. A protracted court battle loomed ahead of American if it had persisted in challenging the state, which claimed American's consolidation plan would have enabled it to control food prices.

With both Lucky and Alpha Beta, American holds the second largest share of the retail food market in Los Angeles at 18.4%. Top-ranked Vons (Safeway-owned) has 24.8% and Campeau Corp.'s Ralph's, 13.7%. Following the sale of Alpha Beta stores, American is expected to drop to third, according to Debra Levin, a Salomon Bros. analyst.

Statewide, American holds a 26% share with both units matched by Safeway. By merging newly bought Lucky with its Alpha Beta stores, American could have incurred considerable cost savings.

As part of the hoped-for Alpha Beta-Lucky consolidation, American planned to combine Lucky's "Low Price Leader" marketing theme with the variety and price message of Alpha Beta. Troy De Ambrosio, VP-public relations, declined to comment on the direction Lucky advertising will take following the decision to sell Alpha Beta.

In August, Lucky announced it would launch a home delivery service, the first by a major chain in Southern California. Helping in the venture is Maryland-based Shoppers Express.

American's two biggest ad spenders in 1989 were Lucky, showing $44 million in measured advertising, down 7%, and Jewel Food Stores, at $34 million, up 85%, a $16 million increase all in newspapers, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Jewel's advertising, which focuses on its breadth of food offerings, helped it maintain a 36% share for both 1988 and 1989 against aggressive competition in its Chicago home base from Dominick's Finer Foods, an independent chain whose share has grown from 19% in 1987 to 21% in 1989, according to Gary M. Giblen, analyst with PaineWebber. Dominick's spent $16.4 million in media, up 10%.

Measured spending increased 10% to $11 million for American's Acme Markets, which is the top-ranked food retailer in the Philadelphia market at 21%. Alpha Beta showed a 42% drop to $6 million, reflecting its planned merger with Lucky. Both are California-based.

American's individual store units handle their newspaper advertising in house, while broadcast—spot TV with spot radio support—is supplied by outside agencies. Newspapers in 1989 continued to amass substantial ad spending gains while broadcast dropped slightly.

Reflecting the change of 175 Osco Drug Stores in the Southwest back to their original Sav-on name, measured spending grew 56% to $25 million for American Drug Stores, the operating unit housing Osco Drug.

The company is divided into five operating units: Lucky Stores; Alpha Beta; American Superstores (Acme, Jewel and Star markets); American Drug Stores (Osco and Sav-on); and American Food and Drug (Skaggs Alpha Beta, the former Buttrey Food and Drug stores, and Jewel Osco).

The acquisition of Lucky for $2.5 billion in 1988 helped push up American's debt to more than $3 billion. To ease the debt, American in August sold its 44 Buttrey Food & Drug stores to a management-led group for $184 million. More sales are expected. Capital improvements also have been scaled back.

In 1989, American scrapped a decentralization plan to concentrate control at the headquarters level. It also moved back to Salt Lake City from Irvine, Calif., where it had relocated in 1987.

AMR Corp.'s American Airlines will continue to focus its resources on international growth with marketing emphasis on first-class and business-class service.

The company plans to invest more than $11 billion over the next five years to boost its global presence, according to Michael Gunn, American senior VP-marketing.

American completed the purchase of Eastern Airlines' Latin and Central American routes with service inaugurated in July and August. The acquisition included route authorities between Miami and 20 destinations in 15 countries. Anticipating the expanded service, AMR added Miami as American's seventh U.S. hub city.

The carrier also repositioned in the U.S. and Europe its business-class service, renaming it International Flagship Service. Advertising highlighted the new seats, inflight cuisine and redesigned wine list.

American's international growth is compensating for essentially flat domestic passenger traffic.

For the first seven months of 1990, system-wide revenue passenger miles were up 4.3%, while the domestic portion was up only 1.3%.

"Our international traffic increased 28.1% year over year," said Mr. Gunn. "European traffic remains strong, and early results from our South American start-up are encouraging."

American so far is holding on to its No. 1 position in the U.S. market in revenue passenger miles, according to PaineWebber. American claimed a 16.9% share for the first seven months of 1990, compared to United Airlines' 16.6%. By comparison, 1989 figures show American with 17.6% to United's 16.6%. Delta Airlines remains

No. 3 with a 13.2% share, followed by Northwest Airlines at 11.4%.

American's challenge in the coming year will be to revive share growth and profitability.

"This is a time for fundamentals to pay off," remarked Mr. Gunn. He acknowledged that budget belt-tightening across the board was under way and that higher costs to an already thin-margin industry are an "unquestionable blow."

He emphasized that despite some ad spending cutbacks on the image front, tactical promotional ad programs would continue and that new service to Latin and Central America would receive ad support.

AMR's media usage in 1989 reflected its tactical use of media as the company pulled $12 million out of network TV and placed it into quicker-hitting newspaper advertising.

Annual review

Anheuser-Busch's reach beyond beer to theme parks, snacks and baked goods for future growth isn't the result of failure, but of success.

A-B's beer business grew last year in a stagnant market, pushing its share to 42.1%. And that share has risen to 42.9% for the first half of 1990, up one share point from a year ago, said A-B.

Even as A-B pushes for a 50% U.S. market share, analysts and perhaps the company question the cost of further U.S. growth.

One alternative for expanding its beer business—taking A-B's brews more strongly to Europe—seems at the moment foreclosed by a Czechoslovakian brew's right to the Budweiser name. A-B is known to strongly desire a major presence in Europe and may be looking at strategic purchases, including buying the Czech brewer.

Meanwhile, it has looked beyond beer.

Busch Entertainment, which began with parks at several brewery cities and expanded to four parks including Busch Gardens sites, last year paid $1.1 billion to acquire four Sea World parks and Cypress Gardens from Harcourt Brace Jovanovich. A-B is hoping to build another park near Barcelona, Spain.

A-B consolidated advertising for Sea World of Florida (formerly handled by Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York) and Sea World of Ohio (formerly handled by Stern Advertising, Cleveland) at DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, which also handles Busch Gardens. A-B kept agencies for other Sea World parks.

A-B's Eagle Snack division moved national from its eastern coverage, aided by a new plant in Visalia, Calif. A-B claims Eagle Snacks' 1989 sales grew 37% to $400 million and captured 4% of the snack market.

Eagle added tortilla chips and expanded its Cape Cod line. A-B still advertises Eagle Snacks only in target markets, using Tony Randall and Jack Klugman, but has been talking of moving national in 1991.

An indication that A-B will be paying more attention to the marketing of other products was appointing the beer company veteran VP-marketing, Michael Roarty, to exec VP-corporate marketing & communications for the parent A-B Cos.

A-B already has begun to leverage its beer ad buying clout for all company advertising. A-B now freely substitutes advertising between its beer, snack food, and amusement park divisions on the many long-term buys it makes, especially for local sports programming.

While A-B's overall beer sales were up, 1989 provided otherwise mixed results for the brewing side.

Budweiser sales were off slightly, prompting the introduction of a new "Nothing beats a Bud" campaign from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis, the close to Bud Bowl II. A-B's overall growth came from increased sales of Bud Light, Michelob Light and Busch beers.

A-B blamed the Budweiser decline on aggressive price cutting by rivals. The company also cut back on media spending for its top three beers: Budweiser, down 11.6% to $183 million; Michelob, down 10.1% to $85.5 million and Busch, down 7.4% to $28.6 million.

Network TV alone lost $25.5 million in business from A-B, mostly from beer, while spot TV gained $7.3 million and cable drew an additional $5 million. Some of the cuts in national spending, A-B said, would be balanced later by increased local ad spending.

At mid year A-B was claiming success overall. However, there were indications that the brewer's increasingly niche marketing approach was continuing to cannibalize Budweiser sales.

A-B rolled out O'Doul's non-alcoholic beer in late 1989, Bud Dry in early 1990, and expanded distribution of Busch Light Draft. It also is testing Busch Genuine Draft in Tulsa, Okla. Bud Dry drew $4 million in national media spending, while O'Doul's pulled $1 million.

While A-B's beer marketing continued, part of A-B's corporate attention was on Congress, where a budget deficit prompted talk of an increase in beer taxes. A-B first stepped up its "Know When to Say When" responsible alcohol consumption message and eventually began a separate ad campaign urging the public to "Can the beer tax."

Annual review

How does AT&T stem market share erosion in its long-distance service and add a revenue-packed business at the same time? It seems to have done both this spring with the introduction of the Universal Card.

The combined telephone calling card and general purpose bank card available as either a Visa card or MasterCard also is likely to push AT&T total advertising back into double-digit growth after advancing only 3.8% in 1989 over the prior year.

"The card has a dual purpose," said Frank Governali, VP, First Boston. "It helps reduce customer churn. Residential customers probably will be less willing to shift long-distance carriers. And there is a lot of money to be made in that area [cards]."

The card, which offers a 10% discount on AT&T long-distance calling service, has been offered free to customers who sign up in 1990 and use it at least once a year. By mid-August, advertising bearing the theme, "There is One World, One Card," had helped push Universal accounts well ahead of projections—to 2.7 million with 4.6 million cardholders. Ad spending levels for the card are running high. AT&T was monitored spending $2.7 million, mostly in network TV, on the card in the first quarter, according to LNA/Arbitron. The card was only introduced March 26.

Long-distance service remains AT&T's dominant business, although its market lead is shrinking. In 1989, it captured a 66.4% share of total revenues, followed by MCI at 12.5% and US Sprint, 8.3%, according to Northern Business Information, New York. That hold in 1990 will shrink to 64.4%, as MCI pulls 13.7% and US Sprint, 9.1%. The overall market is expected to grow 8.5% this year.

AT&T in 1989 reapportioned its media ad spending by funneling dollars that went into corporate image building advertising in 1988 into long-distance services. General promotion expenditures dropped by $65 million. Long-distance lines added $11 million to reach $82.4 million; long-distance business lines added $46 million to hit $93.6 million and overseas long-distance spending advanced $20 million to $44.7 million. AT&T virtually eliminated teleconference service spending that reached $8 million in 1988.

Media usage shifted slightly as AT&T's network TV dollars declined 6.4%. Network still accounted for 45% of total media.

AT&T's long-distance advertising in late 1989 and early 1990 used dramatized testimonials of people who had switched to rivals MCI and US Sprint and hadn't experienced the cost savings or service they expected. The ads were tagged, "Aren't you glad you never left." That effort led to "Put it in Writing," the campaign that broke this May. Ads urged consumers to get competitors' service and price claims in writing. It sparked a retaliatory campaign from US Sprint this August that said it did provide written estimates and urged AT&T to lighten up.

"The revenue growth will be a lot more hard won now than for the first few years after divestiture. It's a tight race all around. The emphasis is not on market share anymore. The emphasis is on revenue growth. And the next big growth opportunity is the low-end market—residential, and small-to-medium-sized businesses," said Carole Craven, NBI senior analyst.

"AT&T is really going after small- and medium-sized accounts that cost more in terms of manpower and money to win. The gains are not as dramatic," Ms. Craven said. Price competition also has reduced margins in the high-end market for large businesses, she said.

AT&T in late February broke a high-profile network TV campaign for its "Reach Out America" calling plan, featuring Bo Jackson. AT&T has enhanced its "Reach Out America" calling plan by introducing a half-hour plan and more fully discounting the 24-hour plan, due to competition. "Reach Out America" has doubled its subscribers in the last two years.

AT&T in 1989 acquired Paradyne Corp., a U.S. maker of data communications equipment, and ISTEL, one of the largest private phone networks in Europe. ISTEL will likely become AT&T's gateway for electronic messaging and computer products in international markets. AT&T also purchased an interest in Italtel, manufacturer of telecommunications systems in Italy.

AT&T Computers Systems business is recovering from a couple of years of misdirection, said Mr. Governali. After years of unprofitability, AT&T has found a niche in stressing computer networking and it is betting on the success of its Unix operating system. AT&T has about 2% of the $103 billion U.S. market for computer hardware, software and services, compared to IBM's 30%.

Annual review

Faced with a hostile takeover attempt by Sir James Goldsmith and sizable debt from its purchase of Farmers Group of Los Angeles, British conglomerate B.A.T. Industries PLC earlier this year sold off much of its American holdings.

The divestitures left B.A.T. with Farmers and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. as its only major operations. Both subsidiaries now report directly to England.

The brouhaha precipitated by the takeover attempt had little impact on B.A.T.'s ad spending in the U.S. in 1989, which increased almost 39% across the board. Marshall Field & Co. almost quadrupled its ad expenditures, to $32.9 million from $8.3 million; Saks Fifth Avenue jumped 25% to $24.7 million; Ivey's rose 17% to $2.6 million.

These operations are gone now. Marshall Field's and Ivey's went to Dayton Hudson Corp. for a combined total of $1.2 billion. Saks was snagged by Bahrain-based Investcorp for $1.8 billion. John Breuner Co. also was sold. Only spending by Sak's among former retailers is included in the B.A.T. total.

Brown & Williamson increased its ad spending by almost 29%, to about $75 million as domestic unit sales declined 1.7%, according to John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities. But since overall industry volume declined by a much larger 6.1%, B&W garnered its first share gain in four years, up 0.6 points to 11.5%.

Most of B&W's growth and most of its new ad monies were tied to the repositioning of Viceroy as a value-price brand and the regional introduction of a low-price version of Belair. Viceroy ad expenditures went from virtually nothing in 1988 to more than $13 million. Year-end results indicate the decision paid off. Sales of Viceroy increased to 6.59 billion units, up 86.7%, as it moved from an 0.6 share to 1.3% of market. Value-price is the growth segment of the cigarette market, increasing from 11% of market in 1988 to 15% in 1989.

With ad spending for Kool at $19.7 million, up only 2.1%, the flagship brand showed no movement in market share, which has been 6% since 1987. Conversely, Capri's share of market rose 0.1 points to 0.6%, despite an almost $3 million decline in ad spending to $29.6 million.

Farmers Group doubled its media expenditures to $6.2 million, according to LNA/Arbitron. A spokesman at the company said its actual ad budget was far greater than what was recorded in the nine-media totals by LNA/Arbitron. In net premiums written, the company moved from seventh to sixth in 1989 on premiums of $5.9 billion.

■ Annual review

Decreased advertising for Alka-Seltzer and for vitamin brands contributed to an 11.5% drop in U.S. media spending for Bayer AG, the West Germany-based company whose U.S. advertising is centered almost wholly at Miles Inc.

However, advertising for Alka-Seltzer, the franchise product at Elkhart, Ind.-based Miles, is expected to be up for full-year 1990, because of spending for a new line extension—Advance Formula Alka-Seltzer—launched last fall, according to Kline & Co.

The company spent an estimated $11.7 million in media, not including heavy spending for couponing and sampling, to introduce the lemon-flavored, low-sodium, acetaminophen-containing Advance Formula Alka-Seltzer. The Alka-Seltzer line received $39.2 million in media, down 12.8%. It represented 60% of Bayer's total media spending in the U.S.

Advanced Formula fizzes just like the old Alka-Seltzer, but the "fizz" antacids, where Alka-Seltzer has a 90% share, lag in sales behind tablets and liquids. The extension was introduced for new users—those who didn't like the taste of Alka-Seltzer or were put off by its aspirin or sodium content, said Miles spokeswoman Dionn Tron.

The antacid category as a whole grew only 2% in 1989, but Kathryn Griffie, a Kline & Co. consultant, sees 1989 as the lull before a storm of new products and increased advertising and sales. "The trend is toward extra-strength and better flavors. Everyone is introducing them in anticipation of the prescription brands going OTC," she said.

In the early to mid-'90s, patents will be running out on currently prescription-only antacids, Tagamet, Carafate, Pepcid and Zantac, she said.

New products from Alka-Seltzer's competitors include Pepto-Bismol Maximum Strength (P&G), Maalox's cherry cream and mint cream flavor, liquid and tabs, Tums' peppermint and cherry flavors and Warner-Lambert's Extra Strength Rolaids.

Advertising from Wells, Rich, Greene started in September 1990 for an extension to Alka-Seltzer Plus Cold Medicine brand—Alka-Seltzer Plus Sinus Allergy Medicine.

Alka-Seltzer Plus Cold medicine and Alka-Seltzer Plus Nighttime Cold medicine together claimed a 10% share and second place in the adult cold remedy market in 1989. Nyquil led with 14%. The two products received $22 million in media, down 15%.

Miles' Bugs Bunny and Flintstones vitamins "pretty much stayed on top of the market due to their advertising," said Ms. Griffie.

Bugs Bunny just celebrated his 50th anniversary this year. Bugs' media backing more than doubled to $2 million, as the more heavily advertised Flintstones attracted about $8.2 million in media, down 33%.

Flintstones remained sales leader with a 15% share, unchanged from 1988. Bugs claimed No. 3 with an unchanged 5%. Private label products saturate the market. American Cyanamid's Centrum Jr. remained second at 6%, same as in 1988. New competition is afoot from McNeil Consumer Products Co. (Johnson & Johnson), which recently introduced Sesame Street.

Miles One-A-Day Vitamins for adults hasn't fared as well as its kiddie counterparts. One-A-Day's dollar volume dropped 5% as the company reduced media spending by 19% to $4.2 million. Its market share remained at 3%, third behind American Cyanamid's Centrum and Bristol-Myers Squibb's Theragran, both at 6%. Private label brands hold 60% of the market.

Sales of Miles' antiseptic-anesthetic Bactine remained unchanged in 1989, as ad support dropped 32% to $1.3 million.

Measured ad support for Miles home cleaning products—S.O.S pads and glass cleaners—was up 8% to $7.5 million. Zwiren, Collins, Karo, Trusk & Ayer of Chicago, which had the glass cleaner account, picked up S.O.S pads from Griffin Bacal.

Cutter insect repellents, also formerly handled by Griffin Bacal, went in-house. Cutter is advertised very little in media.

Miles' consumer healthcare products in July came under the supervision of new division president, Werner Spinner.

Bell Atlantic is putting its marketing muscle behind a rash of new services featured in the current running "We're more than just talk" TV ad campaign.

Caller ID, Call Block, Return Call, Call Waiting, Call Forwarding among others—all part of the Baby Bell's Intelligent Network—are setting up the company for long-term profits and, in the near-term, increased ad and marketing expenditures in 1990.

The residential campaign, created by J. Walter Thompson USA, is running in five of the nation's top markets—Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and, northern New Jersey-New York—except for spots touting Caller ID, in all but one. The service is banned in Pennsylvania.

Bell Atlantic is appealing the ban that had been pressed by consumer and civil liberty groups over issues of right to privacy. The service identifies the number of an incoming call.

Bell Atlantic "has been first in rolling out such phone services," said Frank Governali, VP, First Boston. "From a marketing standpoint, it's been a good strategy for raising awareness. Those services will have a long-term impact on the bottom line. It's good profit, but longer term."

The current corporate campaign, targeted to businesses, is designed to publicize Bell Atlantic's capabilities in systems integration and disaster recovery. There is also a vertical section—applications that are aimed at certain targeted segments such as banking, insurance and healthcare. Ads bear the "We're more ... " line.

Bell Atlantic spent $6.7 million, up 24% in 1989 on general promotion, a figure capturing a portion of the "We're more than just talk" campaign that began in September 1988. Prior to the campaign, the various operating units handled their own advertising with local agencies, but a restructuring shifted those responsibilities to the corporate level, leading to the appointment of J. Walter Thompson USA.

Yellow Page advertising overall remained flat at $16.6 million, virtually all in spot TV. New Jersey Bell Yellow Pages spending was $6.75 million in 1989, up 8.8%. Chesapeake & Potomac Yellow Pages spending dropped 5.5% to $5.2 million. Bell of Pennsylvania Yellow Pages advertising totaled $4.6 million, a dip of 4.2%.

Actor James Earl Jones appeared in Bell Atlantic Yellow Pages advertising continuing the "Matchmaker" theme. Lewis, Gilman & Kynett, Philadelphia, is the agency.

Bell Atlantic Mobile Systems ad spending grew to $316,000 in 1989, up 12.9% from $280,000 in 1988, all in outdoor. In 1989, the Mobile Systems division experienced an 88% increase in its customer base. Bell Atlantic signed contracts with retailers, including Sears and Macy's, to sell its service.

Bell Atlantic last year formed Bell Atlantic Europe S.A. in Brussels, to guide business development in Europe. The company is also pursuing opportunities in the Pacific-Rim.

■ Annual review

Bristol-Myers Squibb, which became a pharmaceutical juggernaut with the October 1989 merger of Bristol-Myers and Squibb Corp., moved to expand its marketing of OTC and consumer products—segments that have been saddled by sluggish returns the past two years.

Bristol, now the second largest pharmaceutical business in the world behind Rahway, N.J.-based Merck & Co., is much less consumer marketing driven after the merger. Some 26% of its sales are now pushed by consumer advertising compared to 39% in 1988.

The company has given no indication of downplaying its consumer product, toiletries and beauty aids and OTC drug lines. In fact, it stepped up advertising in 1989, and continues to reposition OTC products in 1990. Earlier this month, Bristol agreed to take a minority stake in France's UPSA Group and develop the Agen-based company's nonprescription drugs business worldwide. The deal will benefit Bristol on the Continent where it has little presence in OTC drugs. UPSA ranks No. 2 in Europe in analgesics and holds 30% of the French pain reliever market.

Bristol's haircare business generated more than $800 million sales in 1989, led by Clairol, the market leader in hair-color products with a 40% share. Media ad spending increased 4% to $65.6 million. Biggest Clairol line item spenders were Clairol Nice 'n Easy at $15.7 million, up 13.8%, and Clairol Ultress hair-coloring gel at $13.5 million, up 15.4%. Haircare products accounted for 32% of all media spending at Bristol, or $75.5 million, up 4.6%.

More ad dollars were pumped into analgesics lines, except for Bufferin, which dropped 10% to $16.5 million. Nuprin ibuprofen received $29.6 million, up 12.5%, while spending for Excedrin spiraled 36.5% to $25.8 million, according to LNA/Arbitron. The huge jump came largely from Excedrin PM, a pain remedy that aids sleep. It drew $7.6 million versus only $1.4 million in media in 1988.

Aspirin Free Excedrin was introduced nationally with TV support this August and positioned squarely against Johnson & Johnson's market leader Tylenol, which in 1989 had a 21% market share in the $2.1 billion analgesics market—the nation's largest OTC drug market comprised of aspirin, acetaminophen and ibuprofen products. Aspirin Free Excedrin's main ingredient is acetaminophen.

BEST AVAILABLE COPY

the same as in Tylenol.

The new product is riding the market trend of declining aspirin sales. In 1989 aspirin's share of the overall market declined to 39.5% from 43% a year earlier. In comparison, acetaminophens took 38% of the market, up from 37%.

Bristol's other aspirin product, Bufferin, was repositioned as Bristol dropped ads promoting Bufferin as a second heart attack preventative. Bufferin got new TV and print ads in fall 1989 featuring actress Angela Lansbury and targeting older consumers who suffer occasional aches and pains.

All aspirin marketers basically gave up on second heart attack claims because the market of people who suffered a heart attack isn't big enough to sustain growing sales. Bristol applied to the FDA in 1989 for approval of professional labeling that would allow doctors to recommend aspirin every other day to reduce the risk of primary heart attack.

Bristol, faced with lagging sales for its ibuprofen brand, Nuprin, switched its $30 million Nuprin account in July 1990 from Grey Advertising to J. Walter Thompson USA, New York. In August, JWT broke a new campaign themed "Tell Nuprin where it hurts," replacing Grey's longtime "Little Yellow Different Better" campaign.

Nuprin sales grew just 2% in 1989 to about $90 million, while Advil (American Home Products) sales grew to $230 million, up 19%, making it the nation's second biggest pain remedy behind Tylenol, according to Kline & Co., a Fairfield, N.J.-based consultant.

New player Motrin IB from Upjohn further hurt ibuprofen players, garnering some $19 million in sales in less than one year on the market.

Comtrex Liqui-Gels, a line extension utilizing a new technology to encase medicine inside a smooth gelatin shell, was introduced in the cough-cold market. The new product is said to be easier to swallow than caplets and tablets. It drew $6 million in media spending, mostly network and syndicated TV.

Bristol introduced Renuzit Freshell, an air freshener in shell casing, to push the Renuzit line spending to $11.3 million in '89, nearly double its '88 media exposure.

Following the merger, Jan Leschly, president of Squibb Corp., resigned. On June 1, Bristol executive Marvin H. Koslow became president of North American Consumer Products Group, from senior VP at the parent. He succeeded Ronald Ahrens, who left the company. Mr. Koslow is responsible for Bristol-Myers Products, Clairol and Drackett.

■ Annual review

Sluggish earnings and turmoil at the top translated into turbulent times for Campbell Soup Co. and its agencies in 1989 as the company appointed a new president and the future of the company's ownership became uncertain following the death of John T. Dorrance, son of Campbell's founder and a former chairman.

Plant closings, cuts in domestic workforce, agency dismissals, a reduction in the ad budget for fiscal 1991 and decisions to sell off units, including the proposed sale of U.S. Fresh Foods Group (Campbell's Fresh Produce, Mrs. Giles salads and Marie's dressings), were parts of a restructuring program instituted by Campbell last August.

The "back to basics" program is being spearheaded by new company President-CEO David W. Johnson, who joined the company in January to fill the position vacated in November by R. Gordon McGovern, who retired. Mr. Johnson came to Campbell from Gerber Products Co., where as chairman-CEO, he engineered a two-year turnaround.

Campbell in recent years has introduced a torrent of new products (300 between 1982 and 1987) and increased marketing spending at an average 15% annual clip; practices Mr. Johnson said he will re-evaluate.

Earnings meanwhile have been poor, compared with other food companies. A low rate of return for the stock has prompted one faction of the Dorrance family to press for sale of the company. John Dorrance's influence had kept the family, which altogether controls 58% of the stock, behind the company's directions in the past.

For fiscal 1991, which began July 30, the company's marketing budget will contract by 5%, according to Herb Baum, Campbell North American president who helped run the company before Mr. Johnson came on board. The new budget should be about $235 million worldwide for fiscal 1991.

Campbell moved toward greater agency accountability earlier this year as it concentrated its accounts with a few core agencies.

It transferred an estimated $25 million in billings for V-8 vegetable juice, Souper Combos, Swanson Frozen Foods and Mrs. Paul's seafood to incumbent shops FCB/Leber Katz Partners and BBDO Worldwide, New York. Losers in the consolidation were DDB Needham Worldwide, Hal Riney & Partners and Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising.

An agency compensation plan was introduced that tied compensation above a base rate of 13% to brand volume increase goals. Campbell also instituted a system giving agencies an 11.5% commission on in-store media.

Media-buying assignments were consolidated at FCB/Leber Katz Partners for cable and syndication; Backer Spielvogel Bates for spot TV, network and spot radio; BBDO Worldwide for prime time TV; and Ogilvy & Mather for daytime, kids and late-night TV, as well as unwired networks.

Campbell's strength remains its condensed soups, which hold a 66% share of that market. Ready-to-serve soups, such as Home Cookin' and Chunky soups, led the division in sales increases. Home Cookin' got $8 million in media backing, down 5%, and Chunky soups $10 million, down 16.9%.

Spending on red label condensed soups also declined 11%, to $25 million. Spending increased from $1.9 million in 1988 to $6.8 million for the Souper Combo microwaveable soup and sandwich line. Media for Special Request soups rose 106% to $4.4 million.

Mrs. Paul's seafood regained the No. 1 market share during 1990, according to company sources, with the help of ad spending of $8 million-$10 million. To do that it had to overtake General Mills' Gorton's brand at 22.6% compared with its own 20.3% share in 1989. The media portion of Mrs. Paul's budget was placed at $2.8 million (down 49.1%) by LNA/Arbitron.

Other strong performers were Prego spaghetti sauce, backed with $8.6 million, down 38.5%. Market share for Prego rose 1.7 share points to 24% of market in 1989 versus Ragu's 48.1%, down 2 points. Teddy O's and Sporty O's novelty-shaped pastas were added to the Franco-American Spaghetti O's line. The brand was backed by $2.2 million in media, up 59%.

Campbell's frozen dinner business continues to shift media emphasis from traditional Le Menu and Swanson offerings to Le Menu LightStyle and Swanson's Great Starts frozen breakfasts—the latter two receiving $12.1 million in media, up from $2.7 million in 1988. Great Starts was introduced in 1989. Le Menu LightStyle, a dollar cheaper than Le Menu but with lower fat content and fewer calories, entered the market in 1988. Campbell's Swanson and Le Menu lines held a 23.5% share of the $1.2 billion frozen dinner market at mid-year 1990, down from 27% at mid-year 1989.

Pepperidge Farm added a brownies line extension to its American Collection Frozen Desserts which went national in 1989. The line was backed with $3.6 million, up 70% from 1988 when it had limited distribution. Its frozen foods' line was backed with $5.3 million in media. Pepperidge Farm cookies and crackers drew $8.3 million. Pepperidge Farm's share of the cookie-cracker market dropped from 5.9% in 1988 to 5.5% last year, far off Nabisco's leading 45% share.

■ Annual review

Slowly sinking under the weight of $7.5 billion in debt, Toronto-based Campeau Corp. is in desperate need of a strong holiday selling season to prop up its financial house of cards. As a result, advertising will play a vital role in pulling customers into department stores operated by its two U.S. retailing subsidiaries, Federated Department Stores and Allied Stores Corp.

Although both subsidiaries filed in January 1990 for Chapter 11 bankruptcy, experts said Federated-Allied's retail units are likely to match 1989 ad spending, which was dominated by $144 million in newspaper ROP, accounting for 88% of measured expenditures. Overall, 1989 measured ad spending increased 14% over 1988 on the strength of an additional $20.5 million in measured ROP spending.

Campeau's Federated-Allied units operate some of the nation's premier department store retailers, each of which has its own in-house advertising department handling newspaper ROP, catalog and direct mail.

Among the larger units, Bloomingdale's outpaced other stores in 1989 ad spending with $39.5 million in media, up 31.7%; Rich's hit $24.6 million, up 7.4%; Jordan Marsh, $17 million, up 10.4%; and Abraham & Straus, $20 million, down 20.3%. Aside from heavy newspaper advertising, spot TV accounted for about 10% of media totals at Campeau stores.

Even a strong fourth quarter would leave Campeau struggling with the options of swapping debt for equity or selling off units piecemeal to satisfy a horde of impatient creditors, said retail analyst Kurt Barnard of New York-based Barnard Retail Marketing Report.

Before anything happens, Campeau must first establish its underlying value, which has been generally positive for the department store units, but disastrous for the corporation as a whole.

"A company losing billions isn't worth very much, but a good fourth quarter would certainly improve their prospects," Mr. Barnard said. This is the reason U.S. bankruptcy court in Cincinnati in August gave Campeau until the end of its fiscal year in February 1991 to file a reorganization plan for its troubled retailing subsidiaries.

The upcoming filing puts pressure on the individual operating units to perform well even in the face of draconian cost-cutting and an ailing U.S. economy. That is why advertising is so essential.

"While there clearly are attempts to economize, advertising is the life blood of a retailing operation. I do not see Campeau's retailing units cutting back, because you've got to have advertising to bring customers into the stores," Mr. Barnard said. However, individual units might experiment with shifting some spending from newspaper ROP to newspaper inserts, or to targeted uses, such as direct mail and catalog, he added.

"There is no question they'll maintain normal ad spending levels at least through December," said Carl Steidtmann, chief economist at Management Horizons, a Columbus, Ohio, retail consulting firm.

However, Mr. Steidtmann cautions that it is imperative to resolve Campeau's debt situation quickly, because a deteriorating capital base over the long term would spell disaster for Campeau's retailing units in terms of financing inventory, attracting and keeping quality personnel and continually upgrading stores.

Despite measures to reduce costs by combining the corporate staffs of Federated and Allied, offers to sell Campeau's Canadian real estate and a failed effort early in 1989 to sell Bloomingdale's, Campeau has been unable to staunch a sea of red ink.

"In a sense, the wealth has been destroyed and the markets are just beginning to realize the loss. But it doesn't make sense to liquidate these properties, because most have positive cash flow. The problem isn't in operations, it's on the balance sheet," said Mr. Steidtmann.

As for Robert Campeau, who orchestrated the two largest leveraged buyouts in retailing history, he was stripped of control over the retailing portion of his empire in January 1990 and was ousted in August as chairman-ceo of Campeau.

Annual review

Carter Hawley Hale Stores, which draws about three-fourths of its sales in California, learned the downside of operating in the fault-lined state when the October 1989 Bay area earthquake forced it to close 12 Emporium stores—a tenth of its outlets—in the beginning of the all-impo.'ant fourth quarter.

While 11 stores reopened within days, the company didn't repair and reopen its downtown Oakland, Calif., store till August 1990. When the earth moved, so did Carter Hawley's sales and profits. Earthquake expenses, coupled with aggressive discounting against a sluggish economy, resulted in a net loss and minimal sales gains for the first nine months of fiscal 1990.

Against that backdrop, Carter Hawley's measured ad spending dropped in calendar 1989 by 22% with spending at the 22-store northern California Emporium chain cut in half to $13.6 million, LNA/Arbitron estimates.

Estimated spending at Carter Hawley's 44-unit Broadway-Southern California, that region's largest department store chain, and 11-unit Broadway-Southwest chain elsewhere in the West fell 8.2% to $51.8 million.

Last year, 82% of Carter Hawley's measured spending went into newspapers, with spot TV capturing virtually the rest. In 1988, newspapers received 87% and spot TV, 12%.

In financial statements, Carter Hawley reported fiscal 1989 advertising media costs of $76.6 million, up 7% from $71.8 million in 1988. The fiscal year ended July 29, 1989, about three months before the earthquake disrupted Bay area business.

Carter Hawley runs 115 full-line department stores, all catering to middle- to upper-middle-income customers. Its four West Coast chains operate 89 stores, the fifth division, Thalhimers, maintains 26 stores in Virginia, the Carolinas and Tennessee.

All of the chains rank first or second in sales in their primary markets. Competitors include May Department Store Co.'s May Co. in southern California and Hecht's in Virginia; R.H. Macy & Co.'s Macy's in northern California and Dillard Department Stores' Dillard's elsewhere in the West.

While the stores carry similar merchandise and many of the same private label lines, each chain oversees its own advertising creative, media and production. Carter Hawley headquarters approves ad budgets.

Burdened by heavy debt, Carter Hawley has focused more on improving existing stores than adding new ones since undertaking a restructuring in 1987. From calendar 1988 to 1990, it has opened one store a year; next year, it plans four openings.

For the first nine months of fiscal 1990, Carter Hawley's sales increased 3% to $2.2 billion. Sales for stores open in both periods rose 2%.

Annual review

Chrysler Corp. restructured, sold Gulfstream Aerospace and set its sights on worldwide markets as it moved into 1990.

The company is seeking a venture with Fiat either to distribute its products or jointly develop and produce a sport utility vehicle or van for overseas markets after terminating a joint-production venture with Renault in Europe.

A minivan jointly produced by Chrysler with Steyr-Daimler-Puch in Graz, Austria, will hit European markets in 1991.

Marketing costs continue to escalate, driven by sales incentives that climbed to $1,200 per vehicle. Chrysler poured $2.1 billion into incentives last year and another $680 million into national and dealer advertising, according to Chairman Lee Iacocca.

Chrysler is shaving its overhead by $1.5 billion this year by closing two assembly plants and trimming 10%-15% of its salaried employees among widespread cutbacks.

Chrysler Corp. restructured Chrysler Motors Corp. from a holding into an operating company, and reorganized marketing operations by consolidating all marketing under John Damoose, VP-marketing. General managers of Dodge Car & Truck, Chrysler-Plymouth and Jeep-Eagle report to him as do corporate dealer and multi-brand ad managers. In early September James P. Holden, former sales operations planning director, became the new Chrysler-Plymouth general manager, succeeding Michael V. Howe who resigned to head Young & Rubicam Detroit, which handles Ford's Lincoln-Mercury account.

Advantage: Chrysler" became the umbrella marketing theme tag for its brands. Corporate boardroom-themed ads kicked off advert sing, which shifted to product comparisons with Honda and a campaign on air bags. Future forays will include more product comparisons. Divisions also place the tag on their specific brand campaigns.

Chrysler's biggest marketing push in 1991 will back its restyled bread-and-butter minivans now facing increased competition from General Motors and imports.

It will place emphasis on the high-volume, low-priced segment of the market in 1991 with a pair of under-$8,000 Dodge Shadow/Plymouth Sundance/America models. They're billed as the lowest-priced, air bag-equipped sedans in the U.S.

Chrysler spent $68.8 million to push its Chrysler named cars in 1989, the biggest single expenditure of $11.1 million backing Chrysler LeBaron, down 28.8% from 1988. The company spent $90 million on the Chrysler line in 1988, some $31 million of that going to the New Yorker, a brand that pulled only $7.9 million in 1989. New Yorker Fifth Avenue was added to the line in 1989, attracting $7.1 million in new advertising.

The Dodge division spent $140 million on cars and trucks in 1989, down 3%, with the largest expenditure of $24.6 million backing the new K-car replacement Dodge Spirit.

The Eagle line grew 15.7% in media to $30.9 million as the Eagle Premier pulled $14.3 million, down 20%. Jeep Cherokee drew $22.3 million in media, up 24.6% to pace total Jeep spending of $43.5 million, up 16.3%.

The new Plymouth Acclaim attracted $19.5 million in media to pace Plymouth line spending that measured $48.8 million, up 56.4%.

Incentive advertising encouraged a shift in spending by all company brands away from network TV, still its biggest media segment, to the more immediate spot radio. Magazine advertising grew by $26 million, a function of new car intros — the Plymouth Acclaim ($6 million in magazines), Plymouth Laser ($5 million), Dodge Spirit ($9 million) and New Yorker Fifth Avenue ($7 million).

New entries on the high end, Chrysler Fifth Avenue and Chrysler Imperial, accounted for 32,623 car sales.

Chrysler's sales and market share dropped steadily during 1989 and 1990. Its U.S. retail car sales of 1,019,693, down 14.4%, accounted for 10.4% of the market compared to 11.3% in 1988. Its U.S. truck sales of 984,354, while down 3.2%, retained a 19.4% share.

Its car sales in 1990 have fallen 17% to 403,078 in the first six months, and truck sales have slipped 7.3% to 363,226. Declines are uniform across the board.

Chrysler-brand cars had a 2.07% market share the first half, down from 2.24% for the prior-year period. Dodge held a 3.6% share, off from 4.77%. Eagle, an 0.62% share compared to 0.74%, and Plymouth, a 2.71% share, down from 2.91%.

Chrysler's market share erosion has been broad-based. In segments where it had exclusivity, such as minivans, it is now challenged by domestic and import manufacturers.

Annual review

Circuit City electronics chain, which took to the airwaves with its first major TV campaign last year, outperformed the industry in sales growth in 1989, although that isn't saying much. Its sales were up only 2% for comparable stores.

The past three years the once high-flying consumer electronics retail industry has trudged along at an average growth rate of 1%. Growth is now tied to replacement sales, multiple home installations and products with low household penetration. The industry is suffering from a dearth of "hot" new products.

Growth at Circuit City has been tied to store expansion as new stores in fiscal year 1990 gave the chain its overall sales growth of 22%.

Competition has become more intense not only from such consumer electronics outlets as Highland Superstores, Fretters, Silo, Best Buys and The Good Guys, but from department store offshoots, Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s Brand Central and Montgomery Ward's Electric Avenue. Most concentrate on price/item promos.

In a move to differentiate itself from its competitors, Circuit City in 1989 appointed its first outside agency, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, to handle broadcast advertising. A JWT campaign bearing the theme, "Welcome to Circuit City where service is state of the art," was introduced last year in 40 spot markets during the holiday season—a period that accounts for 33% of annual sales and more than 40% of operating income. The account is valued at $25 million.

Circuit City's print advertising remains in-house. ROP advertising accounts for about 40% of Circuit City's media expenditures, and spot TV most of the rest, according to LNA/Arbitron. A popular ad vehicle is the 8-to-10-page circular, largely vendor paid.

Advertising during the year, which may include spot TV and radio, stresses low pricing. Prices are set by local store operators. Circuit City is militant about pricing. On items purchased at Circuit City, the company guarantees to pay customers 110% of the difference between the price paid at Circuit City and a competitor's price if lower.

The only store concepts under expansion are Circuit City Superstores: units 25,000 sq. ft. or larger that carry household appliances in addition to the standard fare of TVs, VCRs and audio equipment. Appliances account for 19% of company sales. Construction on 25 new superstores is in various stages of completion. There currently are 125.

Expansion is only in the Southeast, mid-Atlantic and California/Nevada/Arizona regions—the current coverage limitation of Circuit City warehouses.

Four Impulse stores are in test in shopping malls. They carry small consumer products.

Annual review

Citibank, the emerging corporate title replacing Citicorp, is flying high as the nation's top credit card issuer, but watch out.

Aggressive nonbank companies with strong marketing skills and customer bases are jumping in, just at the time the market is becoming saturated. The result is a free-for-all which will make consumers happy, but will weaken profits for issuers.

In March, AT&T launched its Universal Card with no annual fee and a long-distance discount offer. Within six months, AT&T racked up 2.7 million cards outstanding. That's just a drop in the bucket compared with Citibank which leads the pack in the number of accounts with 22 million, followed by Chase Manhattan Bank with 8 million, First Chicago with 6.5 million and Bank of America with 6 million.

In terms of outstanding debt, Citibank is first with $28.8 billion, up 25% or $7 billion from the previous year. Far behind in second and third place are Chase Manhattan with $9.3 billion and Bank of America with $6.5 billion.

"For an operation the size of Citibank, it's remarkable it doesn't appear to be slowing down in growth," said Kurt Peters, editor of "Credit Card News," adding with a note of caution: "AT&T is not affecting the biggest issuers...yet."

Other new competitors include Prudential Insurance Co., a flurry of nonbanking companies and even the Japanese.

The credit card business is one bright spot in Citibank's portfolio. Citibank has been struggling with bad real estate and Third World loans, posting earnings of $498 million, down 73% from the previous year. Experts estimate Citibank's credit card business, meanwhile, was up to about $600 million in aftertax profits last year.

Citibank is attempting to firm up its image by presenting a consistent message to those whom Mary Ann Eger, VP-director, corporate advertising, calls "stakeholders"—customers, prospective customers, shareholders, government, media, suppliers and employers. "Image in the global marketplace drops down to the bottom line very quickly," said Ms. Eger. "Corporate advertising is increasingly becoming a more critical element in the effective delivery of a variety of messages to our many constituencies. And it is often doing a more efficient job than any of the other corporate communications alternatives," she said.

Part of that image is the name. Citibank since May has been switching from Citicorp to Citibank "because a bank is a more tangible entity," noted Ms. Eger. Previously, only the New York retail bank used the Citibank name.

Its marketing campaign, themed "Not just Visa, Citibank Visa," is centered on service, particularly in quick response to telephone bill inquiries. The company shifted its media for its image campaign in 1989, which drew $31 million, down 6%. Network TV got $20 million, down 23.1%, as magazine spending rose 60% to $8 million.

Annual review

Clorox Co is getting more aggressive in king on acquisitions, new line exten-ns and new categories, but one key oduct, Clorox laundry detergent, still sn't prove whether it ranks among suds duds.

Even before it completed the whopping 65 million purchase in August 1990 of ne-Sol and Combat from American anamid Co, Clorox put its stamp on brands by assigning them to agencies eady on its roster.

Young & Rubicam, San Francisco,
cked up the $6 million Pine-Sol media count and DDB Needham Worldwide, icago, the $5 million Combat media count, both from Carrafiello, Diehl & sociates, Irvington, N.Y.

Pine-Sol, the dominant pine cleaner
th a leading 10% share of the $1.1
llion household-cleaning products catory, is a powerful complement to orox's cleaning products line.

Combat represents a new product area
r Clorox. With an 11% share of the $450
llion household insecticide market, mbat is a distant second to S.C. John-n & Son's Raid (45%).

In new products, Clorox introduced mon-scented liquid bleach in early 89, boosting its healthy mainstay busi-
ss. Media spending for Clorox liquid each grew 18% to $15.1 million, spend-g on Clorox II all-fabric bleach opped 32.5% to $15.6 million.

In March 1990, Clorox went national th Take Heart, a cholesterol-free, low-t extension of its Hidden Valley Ranch lad dressings. By skipping the test arket stage, Clorox, the No. 2 dressing marketer at a 20% share, got a jump on the national rollout of Kraft Free, a fat-free line from Kraft USA, the dressing leader with about a 41% share.

Clorox supported its dressings with measured spending of $21.6 million in 1989, up 33.3%, and double the 1987 level.

Clorox leveraged its top-selling charcoal name in 1989 by entering Kingsford
Pro barbecue grill into test market. At $199, the grill's price is out of the norm for a marketer of small package goods.

Clorox hasn't extended distribution since expanding the detergent to 45% of the nation in May 1989. Amidst stepped-up spending from leaders Procter & Gamble Co. and Lever Bros., Clorox has invested heavily in promotions and advertising to achieve an estimated average
4% share in test markets.

Measured spending on the detergent in 1989 totaled $7.6 million, nearly double the 1988 level when fewer markets were in test. The company has given little indication on its long-term commitment to the category, although it seems to be pulling out all the stops, including reas-signing the detergent to lead agency
Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco, from DDB Needham, Chicago, in January 1990.

Clorox in March also took its first tentative step into health and beauty aids with test marketing of Satine, a translucent beauty soap.

Clorox in September 1989 sold its Olympic stain and Lucite paint business to PPG Industries, refocusing its attention on the grocery business.

In April 1990, Christian Leaders for Responsible Television, an advocacy group, called off a boycott launched in July 1989. The group had objected to some of the shows Clorox advertised on.
While the boycott prompted Clorox to revise its procedure for reviewing TV shows, Clorox did not tighten its broadcast sponsorship standards.

Robert A. Bolinghroke, a 28-year veteran, was promoted in July 1990 to president-cos, succeeding John W. Collins, who retired in 1989. Mr. Bolinghroke, 52, is in line to succeed Chairman-CEO
Charles R. Weaver, 61.

Annual review

The anticipated increase in marketing activity at Coca-Cola Co. failed to materialize with Ira Herbert's ascendancy to president of Coca-Cola USA, but that didn't hamper the company from broadening the market share gap separating it from archrival Pepsi-Cola USA.

Coca-Cola staked out 41.1% of the U.S. soft drink market, an increase of six-tenths of a point, while stealing away the high-profile Burger King and Wendy's fountain accounts. Pepsi-Cola stayed within 10 points, climbing four-tenths of a point to 31.1%.

The performances of Coca-Cola soft drink lines, which stretched their worldwide market share to 45% because of a 25% increase in international soft drink sales, were supported with $140 million in media, down 17%. Soft drinks claimed 68% of the company's media dollars in 1989, down from 78%. Most of the soft drink decline came from reduced spending in network TV.

Coca-Cola maintained its high market visibility with a $100 million summertime
MagiCan and MagicCup promotion backed by singing group New Kids on the Block. The giveaway promotion, launched to counter Pepsi's Cool-Can giveaway, at first was well received. The Coke program involved a technologically innovative can from which a rolled bill in denominations up to $100 popped out when the tab was pulled. Coke filled the randomly distributed cans with a non-corrosive, non-drinkable solution that had a foul taste and smell (it was not supposed to be drunk). The promotion was scuttled after Coke fell under considerable public pressure.

Coca-Cola revisited its "I'd like to teach the world to sing" campaign featuring a blending of the old and new.
While Pepsi jumped off the celebrity endorsement bandwagon, Coca-Cola allied itself with basketball phenom Michael Jordan and hockey great Wayne Gretsky for Coca-Cola Classic, a pop star combo featuring Paula Abdul and Elton John for Diet Coke and comedian Arsenio Hall for Sprite.

Corporate profits grew by 65%. Earnings received a boost when Coca-Cola unloaded its 49% stake in Columbia Pictures Entertainment for $1.55 billion and liquidated its ownership of Belmont
Spring Water Co. for $61 million.

The streamlining move was applauded by analysts, many of whom also believe the company would be more strongly focused without Minute Maid. The company is pouring $130 million into a two-year marketing campaign for Minute
Maid orange juice tied to the 1992 Olympics. Minute Maid holds a 23.6% leading market share to Tropicana's 21% in the $3 billion orange juice market.

Coca-Cola spent $46.6 million in media advertising on non-carbonated drinks in 1989, up 25%. Most of that advertising—
$41.3 million, up 21%—backed Minute
Maid orange juice lines. The remainder supported Hi-C.

Coke Classic retained its position as the top selling U.S. brand with a 20% market share despite losing a tenth of a point from 1988, according to John C.
Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities. That drop was relative compared to No. 2 Pepsi, which lost four-tenths of a point to claim 18.3%. Coke Classic was supported with $70.4 million in media advertising, up 7.7%.

The diet segment produced the winners in 1989. Diet soft drinks now claim 27.7% of the total market, a share that took off several years ago with the advent of Nu-traSweet. Diet Coke climbed six-tenths of a point to 8.7% share of the overall market, good for third, as it drew $55.3 million in media spending, up 3.8%. Diet
Pepsi remained No. 4 at 5.7%.

Caffeine-Free Diet Coke, No. 9 in the overall market, gained four-tenths of a point to 2.4%, while Caffeine-Free Diet
Pepsi held down No. 10 at 1.5%, according to Mr. Maxwell. The latter two products have been responsible for triggering the mercurial rise of caffeine-free soft drinks. Caffeine-free entries grew by 16% in sales in 1989, to account for 5.2% of total industry volume.

The non-cola sector was the only area of disappointment for Coca-Cola with Sprite maintaining its 3.6% market share from 1988, while Pepsi's Mountain Dew spurted to within one-tenth of a point at 3.5%. Sprite media advertising dropped
2.7% to $21.7 million.

Can a company get burned twice? The critics are watching as Coca-Cola test markets Coke II, an alias for the ill-fated
New Coke. New Coke, a slightly sweeter product, was envisioned to replace the original Coke recipe in a move that has become synonymous with Ford's Edsel it-seemed-like-a-good-idea-at-the-time syndrome.

■ Annual review:

Colgate-Palmolive's strategy for its U.S. business is to drive new-product growth with funds generated by brand lines. This has led the company to hold the line on costs, including clipping advertising and promotional support for sluggish brands.

The company scrapped its centralized ad functions directed by Clay Timon, vp-director worldwide advertising, who left this month. C-P says he left because of "deep philosophical differences." Global ad implementation remains in the hands of operating executives. Mr. Timon was responsible for consolidating most of Colgate's accounts with Young & Rubicam and FCB/Leber Katz Partners.

During 1989, an overall 30% cut in U.S. media spending led to substantial market-share losses within core categories, said Jay Freedman, analyst at Kidder Peabody & Co., New York.

Colgate also is sacrificing shelf facings—and perhaps incremental bargaining power at the retail level—to accomplish its goal of enhanced profitability, he noted. Shelf space does not go begging as retailers constantly search for products to replace slow-moving ones, the latter often resulting from reduced advertising. A higher slotting allowance may be required to keep a slower-moving product on the shelf.

Media slashing largely affected Fab 1 Shot detergent, said Michael Hoye, exec VP-marketing and sales effectiveness at Colgate. Support was pulled from the product after it failed to meet share expectations, he said.

But while $9 million indeed was clipped from Fab 1 Shot (from $16.8 million in '88), an additional $21 million in cuts were spread among other Colgate lines, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Colgate sliced $16.3 million in all from its detergent lines—$3 million from Ajax cleaning products, $4.3 million from Dynamo—leaving it with no measured spending in 1989, in addition to Fab 1 Shot cuts.

Ajax, Dynamo, Fab and Fresh Start brands now hold an 8.4% share of the $3.8 billion U.S. laundry detergent category, compared with 11% last fall. P&G claims 53.5%, up from 51.0%.

Colgate's share of the light-duty dishwashing liquid category remained stable, with Ajax, Palmolive, Crystal White Octagon and Dermassage combining for a 27% share, up slightly from 26.7%. Palmolive dishwashing liquid, supported with $7.7 million in media, a 3.6% decline from 1988, was reintroduced in 1989 with a richer formula. A refill pack for Palmolive is in test.

Media spending on Palmolive automatic dishwasher liquid plunged 43%, producing a time-release effect on market share. The product gained half a share point to 12% in the $500 million category in 1989 but by summer 1990 had eroded to 9.5%. P&G's Cascade leads with a 55% share.

Spending slipped 4.4% on Colgate toothpaste brands as a whole. The company exited the year with a 29.5% share of the $1.05 billion U.S. toothpaste category, off from 33% in 1988. Viadent, acquired from Vipont Pharmaceutical in 1989, holds a 1.2% share. Colgate brand holds 42% of the $2.6 billion worldwide market.

The company in mid-1990 broke a $30 million "Colgate Smiles" umbrella campaign, replacing "Wisdom Tooth" ads featuring actor Pat Morita. The umbrella campaign will be supplemented with ads for individual brands.

A new Colgate Plus toothbrush for sensitive gums was introduced in the U.S., and "Smile-O-Saurs" characters were added to the Colgate Junior toothbrush line. Colgate in mid-1990 began distributing Colgate Gum Protection Formula, an anti-plaque toothpaste, in six countries. The product awaits FDA approval.

In food stores, Colgate is volume share leader in the toothbrush category, according to syndicated scanner data.

Colgate cut media spending 65% for mouthrinse to $5.5 million. The brand currently holds a 1.7% share of the $550 million U.S. mouthwash category, down from 5% last year.

Media outlays dropped 7% on bar and liquid soaps in 1989 as Colgate claimed 9.5% (same as in fall 1988) of the $1.35 billion U.S. liquid and bar soap market with its Palmolive and Irish Spring bar soap and Softsoap liquid soap. Softsoap accounted for 3.5 of the percentage points. Spending behind Softsoap declined 19.9% to $1.4 million.

Softsoap Enterprises in mid-1990 introduced nationally a line of effervescent aromatic bath tablets in three fragrances under the Village Bath name. Nelson Henry, Minneapolis, handles on a project basis. The tablets seemed to blunt a move by Andrew Jergens Co. to introduce Actibath tablets.

Sales of Hill's small animal dietary products grew 41% to $500 million in 1989, with Hill's benefiting from two well-established lines—Prescription Diet, dispensed by veterinarians, and Science Diet, sold by authorized pet shops, pet professionals and veterinary hospitals.

Colgate strenghtened its Hill's Pet Products by acquiring the veterinary distribution business of McKesson Corp. in 1989.

Annual review

Food giant ConAgra has significantly increased its profile in supermarkets and with consumers with two key steps: the introduction of Healthy Choice frozen foods and acquisition of Beatrice Co.

The acquisition of Beatrice this August made ConAgra the second largest U.S. food company, behind Kraft General Foods. Together, ConAgra's $15.5 billion and Beatrice's $4.3 billion in sales nearly totaled $20 billion last year. ConAgra paid $1.34 billion in cash and stock for Beatrice, and assumed $1 billion in debt from previous owner Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co.

ConAgra's far-flung divisions, ranging from frozen foods and agri-products to pet products and direct-marketed beef, are relatively new to big-budget consumer advertising; the $12 million budget that supported the Healthy Choice rollout represented most of ConAgra's $15 million in measured-media spending last year.

But adding Beatrice's three divisions—Beatrice/Hunt-Wesson, Swift-Eckrich and Beatrice Cheese—means adding businesses that rely on media exposure, which last year totaled $74 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Most of Beatrice's brands—which include Butterball turkeys, County Line cheese, Eckrich hot dogs and lunchmeats, Hunt's tomato products, Orville Redenbacher's popcorn, Wesson oils—seem in relatively good shape despite a roller coaster ride through three different owners and a leveraged buyout in the past four years.

Among the stellar performers are Orville Redenbacher's, which has a leading 41% of the $500 million popcorn market, and Wesson oil, with 24.1% of the $1 billion cooking oil market. More troublesome are some of the Swift and Eckrich meat lines, with relatively small market shares, and newer products like Hunt's spaghetti sauce and barbecue sauce, and Minute Gourmet dinner mixes.

In addition to maintaining No. 2 market shares in the U.S. beef (25%), pork (13%) and poultry (10%) markets, ConAgra increased its presence in value-added foods with Beatrice. Although its agri-products and commodities divisions are large, ConAgra takes in 71.2% of its sales and 63.5% of its profit from prepared foods; the percentage of sales should increase to more than 75% with Beatrice officially added to the corporate ledger.

ConAgra's method of market growth has largely been through acquisition. Just as Beatrice gave it instant market share in the dry grocery section of supermarkets, a series of acquisitions in the 1980s made it the largest marketer of prepared frozen foods.

Last year was a turning point for ConAgra Frozen Foods, which was ranked No. 2 in the $3.2 billion entree market in 1989 with a 14.26% share behind Nestle's Stouffer lines with 24.35% and ahead of Kraft General Foods' 11.60%, Heinz Weight Watchers' 10.5%, Tyson's 6.49% and Campbell's 2%. It moved away from simply building its acquired product lines—Banquet, Morton, Patio, Chun King and Armour—to developing its own brands. The landmark brand was Healthy Choice, a line of frozen dinners low in calories, cholesterol, fat and sodium, that reached national distribution in the fall of 1989. Even without full distribution for the whole year, Healthy Choice became a nearly $200 million brand in ConAgra's fiscal 1990, ended May 28. Following the dinners' success, ConAgra introduced a line of Healthy Choice entrees late last year, and plans to look for other opportunities to expand the Healthy Choice name.

ConAgra bolstered its leading Banquet brand name earlier this year with the national rollout of Kid Cuisine, frozen dinners for 3-to-9-year-olds. It also broadened the distribution of Zap microwaveable snacks—pizza, sandwiches and french fries—into more midwestern markets.

Reflecting the trend toward fresh branded meats, ConAgra's poultry division last year hired DDB Needham, Chicago, to produce a $10 million TV and print campaign for its Country Pride chicken line. Ads are tagged, "It's hard to be humble when you're serving Country Pride." The company tested products to add value to the Country Pride name, including ground chicken and marinated chicken parts.

In April, Armour Food Co. resuscitated its 20-year-old jingle, "What kind of kids eat Armour hot dogs?" in a TV, radio and print campaign from Bernstein-Rein, Kansas City, Mo., named Armour's agency of record last year. Armour also introduced a lower-fat, lower-salt hot dog last year.

ConAgra Pet Products, maker of Geisler pet health products and accessories (using Snoopy as spokesdog), last year acquired the Sergeant's line of pet products from A.H. Robins Co. This summer, ConAgra broke a spot TV, print and promotional campaign timed for flea and tick season, central to the promotion was an 18-minute video featuring explanations of and tips on avoiding Lyme disease. Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Minneapolis, handled creative on a project basis.

As a sign of its growing seriousness in marketing value-added prepared foods, ConAgra hired James Tindall as president-coo of its prepared foods division. Mr. Tindall, formerly senior VP-general manager of Quaker Oats Co.'s North American Foods division, also is heading up the ConAgra division's frozen foods unit for the present.

■ Annual review
The holding company for Continental and Eastern Airlines is entering a new era after a year of major changes in ownership, top management and ad agencies.

Even the name, Texas Air Corp., has been changed to Continental Airlines Holdings to reflect a new focus on primary business units.

Most significantly, Chairman-CEO Frank Lorenzo in August said he would sell most of his investment in Continental Holdings to Scandinavian Airlines System, already a 9.9% owner. The sale, awaiting government approval, means that Mr. Lorenzo will step down from chairman of the holding company and the Continental unit.

Mr. Lorenzo was expected in many quarters to be replaced by SAS President-CEO Jan Carlzon as chairman of the holding company. Instead, Carl Pohlad, a Continental director, banker and owner of the Minnesota Twins baseball team, was given the reins this month. Hollis L. Harris also was named chairman of the Continental Airlines unit. He was president-coo at Delta Air Lines.

Eastern Airlines has been under federal bankruptcy protection since March 1989. The court took operating control from Mr. Lorenzo and the parent company (then Texas Air) this April. Continental Airlines Holdings remains Eastern's largest shareholder.

The bankruptcy judge appointed Martin Shugrue as Eastern trustee with the mission of turning around the troubled airline, whether through existing or downscaled operations.

Philip J. Bakes Jr., Eastern president-CEO, left the company almost immediately after Mr. Shugrue's appointment. Mr. Shugrue dismissed agency of record Lintas:New York and hired Ogilvy & Mather, New York, for the $45 million account.

Under Mr. Shugrue's guidance, the agency and airline marketing staff put together a "100 Days" TV campaign to position the carrier as one with new leadership. The campaign message allowed former frequent fliers to criticize Eastern in TV spots, demonstrating the company's new openness and strategy to make change happen.

A fall campaign will center on a new business-class program involving a doubling of first-class seats. The goal is to offer executives first-class service at fares below those of competitors.

Continental Airlines in late January dismissed agency of record N W Ayer, Houston and New York. After a review, it named Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, to handle the $40 million-to-$50 million account.

Shortly after the review, James O'Donnell, senior VP-marketing and Continental marketing veteran, was abruptly fired. His position has not been filled but John Nelson, exec VP-marketing, has assumed advertising and marketing responsibilities.

Continental continues its strategy to upgrade its image among business travelers. A new corporate image program is in the works.

The once high-flying Texas Air Corp. held nearly a 20% share of total revenue passenger miles in 1987. The machinists strike that crippled Eastern reduced the carrier's presence while Continental's share has dropped somewhat.

Now the combined shares of the two carriers is 12.8%. Continental overall ranks No. 5 while Eastern is No. 9, based on PaineWebber figures for revenue passenger miles.

For the first seven months of 1990, Continental held an 8.7% share, down from 9.3% for the same period in 1989. Eastern grew to 4.1% from 2.3% in 1989 when the strike did the most damage.

The two airlines, which virtually split the $99.1 million in media advertising for the holding company in 1989, concentrated more than 80% of their ad dollars on newspapers and the rest on spot TV and spot radio. Network TV advertising has never been a big factor in spending by either airline.

Annual review

Adolph Coors Co. outpaced the stagnant beer industry in 1989 as its shipments rose 7% to 17.7 million barrels, volume growth spurred by double-digit movement from Coors Light (up 18% last year to 10.5 million barrels), and unexpectedly strong sales from Keystone and Keystone Light—its first entries in the popular-price category.

Coors early this year shot past Stroh Brewery Co. as the nation's third largest brewer. Analysts predict shipment growth of 10%-12% in 1990.

Measured media advertising rose a modest 2.9% mostly from its new $7.3 million expenditure backing Keystone brands, which captured an unexpected 3% market share.

Barrelage gains left Coors short of brewing capacity. It solved the dilemma by buying Stroh Brewery Co.'s Memphis brewery. An effort to buy all of Stroh's was nixed by the U.S. Justice Department.

Coors Light passed Bud Light to become the nation's third best-seller among light beers, but it dropped from eighth to ninth among all brands. Its continued deterioration (down 19.7% to 5.1 million bbls.) in 1989 forced the company to switch from a national to a market-by-market approach and to a new campaign from GSD&M. In fact, Coors set up four regional marketing offices for all brands which directed their own local promotional and ad campaigns.

Once-hopeful Coors Extra Gold stagnated to the 2 million bbls. level as rival Miller Genuine Draft set growth records. Coors cut Extra Gold support from the normal $20 million-a-year level to just $2 million through midyear, tested advertising approaches and at mid-year finally moved the ad assignment from GSD&M to Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago.

Coors quietly pulled the plug on Herman Joseph's and Herman Joseph's Light, its entries in the superpremium category, apparently to concentrate on Killian's Irish Red in the segment. It canned Turbo 100, its malt liquor, thereby dropping Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, as a Coors agency. Testing began on the Coors Rocky Mountain Spring Waters product.

Ironically, growth in shipments coupled with beer price wars hurt its bottom line, although more than half the 72% decline in earnings was due to writing down some non-brewing businesses. As of mid-year 1990, the company was reporting a 16% increase in revenues and a near tripling of profits.

Continuing efforts to expand from its brewing base into industrial ceramics and packaging materials influenced Coors adoption of a holding company format in 1989 with three semi-autonomous units—Coors Brewing Co. under Peter Coors; Coors Technology Co., under Jeff Coors, and Coors Ceramics Co., led by Joe Coors Jr.

Annual review

CPC International's brand franchises, which include Hellmann's mayonnaise, Mazola corn oil and Knorr soups, sauces and flavorings, continued to gain in market share as the company rolled out new products and acquired companies that parallel CPC's existing products.

Its core brands are being aggressively promoted and backed by an estimated $34 million (with $21 million for Hellmann's mayonnaise and $13 million for Skippy peanut butter) in consumer ad spending this year, according to Robert Gillespie, CPC's Best Foods division president.

Flagship brand Hellmann's benefited in what had been a declining category from its introduction of cholesterol-free and lighter versions of its mayonnaise product. The company sells mayonnaise under the Hellmann's label in the eastern U.S. and Best Foods logo in the West.

Backed by close to $19.5 million in media spending in 1989, up 40.3%, according to LNA/Arbitron, with $15 million promoting the lightened versions, Hellmann's (39.3% share) and Best's (15.6%) command nearly 54.9%, up from 50% last year, in the $693 million mayonnaise market in dollar volume, well ahead of Kraft General Foods at 24%, up from 23% last year. Private label brands held a collective 8.2% share.

This year the health-watcher segment is expected to account for 35% of total mayonnaise sales—although sales of lightened version of mayonnaise appear to be softening, according to Alan Miller, a consultant with Arbitron/SAMI who estimates the total mayonnaise market at $693 million retail.

Skippy peanut butter strategy continued to focus on augmenting uses of the product. Advertising, which totaled $13 million in 1989, up 130%, promoted "Skippy Dippin," the immersion of vegetables, fruits, pretzels, etc., in Skippy. A new 4-pound-size container was introduced to facilitate both dipping and consumption, and as a response to consumer interest in larger containers. The name was licensed for Skippy peanut bar ice cream to be manufactured by Hood Ice Cream Co. Pillsbury Co. uses Skippy in its cookie mix.

Jif peanut butter led the category as of mid-July, with a 29.7% share of the market, up 2.3 percentage points. Skippy followed closely at 24.2% based on sales of $229 million, up 5%. Category sales totaled just over $1 billion retail, according to Arbitron/SAMI.

BBDO Worldwide, New York, was awarded both the Skippy and Hellmann's/Best accounts, a total of $34 million, from Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. In April of this year, Saatchi & Saatchi resigned its $10 million Mazola corn oil account, its last in dwindling business at CPC. The Mazola products were picked up by Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York, which already had Thomas' English muffins.

Mazola corn oil placed third in the $590 million vegetable oil market, with a 17% share behind Procter & Gamble's Crisco and Puritan at 25%, and Beatrice Hunt-Wesson's Wesson brands at 23%. Mazola leads the corn oil segment of that category with a 60% share. The Mazola product line got $11.1 million in measured media, up 18%.

CPC pulled out of the American Heart Assn.'s Heartguide labeling program because of FDA's objections to overall program product claims. The corn oil marketer had been Heartguide's largest participant. Advertising continues to emphasize the health benefits of diet modification that includes the use of corn oil.

The umbrella concept in advertising and package graphics helped build a Mazola identity for brand-name spinoffs, margarine and cooking sprays.

CPC's most extensive product line, Knorr soups, sauces and flavorings, accounted for $1.1 billion of CPC's total sales in 1989, $800 million of which came from European markets and only $100 million from the U.S.

Its U.S. strategy with the line is building on its Old World image of family and fine dining, and also targeting Hispanic consumers, many of whom were exposed to the Knorr name in their native countries.

Thomas' English muffins, part of Best Foods Baking Group, enjoys market leadership in its category, bolstered by the introduction of an oat bran version at the end of last year. Advertising spending totaled $8.5 million in 1989, up 41.7%. Sahara Pita and Arnold Bakery Light breads address consumer preference for low-fat, high-fiber foods, a successful niche in today's market.

Mueller's is America's largest single brand of pasta. Targeting the kiddie sector, Mueller's unveiled "Super Shapes" this year, a dry pasta product in the shape of dinosaurs, outer space characters, jungle animals and monsters.

Annual review

The marketing emphasis at Mercedes-Benz of North America, the U.S. subsidiary of Daimler-Benz AG, detoured from image to product attributes in 1989.

Interrelated factors of new competition in the luxury segment, a decline in Mercedes sales, a sluggish car market and upward pressure on prices due to currency shifts influenced the West German carmaker to shift its focus to safety, durability, resale value, dependability and overall brand leadership for its three basic tiers of cars.

Mercedes boosted its measured ad spending in 1989 by 15.9%, spreading its ad message through network radio, magazines, newspapers and TV, the latter (spot and network) accounting for the largest media increase of 40%. Mercedes also used local media for advertising funded jointly by Mercedes and its dealers. Heaviest media allotment of $32 million backed non-line-specific Mercedes-Benz passenger cars, up 19.4%.

The shift in marketing focus came when Mercedes car sales were dropping to 75,714 cars, down 9.6% from 1988, and far below 1986's high water mark of 99,314. The decline has since been reversed.

Mercedes, unlike some of its luxury competitors who cut prices on 1990 models, raised prices about 2.2%.

This summer, Mercedes re-introduced the four-cylinder 190E 2.3, which was dropped from the U.S. line for the 1989 model year. The car is the only Mercedes priced to compete against the under-$30,000 offerings from BMW of North America and Infiniti, Nissan Motor Corp.'s luxury division. Mercedes expects to sell 6,000 to 7,000 of the sedans this year.

For the first half of 1990, sales stood at 37,707 units, up 2.9% from the same period the year earlier, led by the top-of-the-line S-class series ($60,000-plus) and mid-range 300 class ($39,000-$56,000). The entry-level 190 ($32,000) class dropped by 5.1%.

Mercedes had feared that S-class sales would drop off as customers waited to buy the re-designed 1992 model. Mercedes offered special lease deals on its S and 300 class lines, which account for about 70% of its total sales volume.

Two new convertibles contributed to the sales gain. Through May, SL sales were up nearly 15% to 3,776, with 10,000 SL models a year expected when supply catches up with demand next year.

Mercedes also introduced two diesel models, engineered to be quicker, quieter and cleaner than earlier diesels. A third diesel model will be added in 1991.

Mercedes is counting on its new diesel engine to help it meet current federal standards for corporate average fuel economy and more stringent tail pipe emission standards in a new clean-air bill. Mercedes paid penalties for several years for failing to meet federal fuel economy standards. Nearly 80% of Mercedes' sales in early 1980 were diesel-powered.

Mercedes is in the midst of an overhaul of its product line. Future product plans include a replacement of its S-class in 1992, its entry level 190 series around 1992 and its 300 class in the middle of the decade. Plans also include the addition of the Daimler-Benz Gelaendewagen sport utility vehicle and possibly the addition of a minivan.

During 1989, the company backed its 190 series with $6.3 million in media, down 64%. Sales for the 190 were $14,503, down 13.4%. The 300 series attracted $20.1 million in measured ad spending, down 14.9%. Sales were 22,650, up 7%. The upscale 560 series, with prices ranging from $73,000 and up, got only $1.5 million in media, down 57%. Sales were 7,477, down 36.9%.

■ Annual review

The purchase of Chicago-based Marshall Field & Co. this April by Dayton Hudson Corp. has newspaper executives shaking in Field's major marketing areas of Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin and Texas.

Cutbacks appear imminent now that Field's has been linked up to DH's "Dayton Hudson Today" Sunday newspaper color insert issued 26 times per year. Such use of inserts by Hudson's in the Detroit area has carved in half the ROP linage previously used there. Newspaper ROP is about twice the expense of inserts.

The Field's equivalent insert, "Marshall Field's Today," will hit the Chicago market in November.

In all, Field's spent $33 million in measured media in 1989, up from only $8.4 million in 1988. Some $26 million of Field's '89 media spend was in national newspaper advertising, according to LNA/Arbitron. Field's spent $15 million alone with the Chicago Tribune last year.

The Minneapolis-based retailer, with 37 department stores primarily in Michigan and Minnesota, acquired Field's from Batus Inc., the U.S. subsidiary of B.A.T. Industries PLC, London, for $1.04 billion after a management-led buyout attempt failed. Its chairman, Philip Miller, left to head up Saks Fifth Avenue.

Marshall Field's 1989 revenues of $1.1 billion from 24 stores enables Dayton Hudson to pass May Co. as the largest department store chain in the Midwest.

The acquisition resulted in the elimination of an estimated 1,000 Field employees from the company's central organization. Included in that figure is the 100 people Field's employed in its in-house ad agency, Creative Field's.

Advertising for Field's is now handled by the 100-person in-house DH department in Minneapolis. Remaining in Chicago will be the 12-person Field's public relations department to handle special events for the chain.

Dayton Hudson's three major units spent $124 million in media advertising in 1989, up 19% over 1988 levels when eliminating $14 million credited that year to Lechmere, a unit sold last November.

Field's and DH are a good fit, says Harry Mortner, consultant with C.J. Lawrence, New York. "In the back room, a lot can be added in terms of merchandising, distribution and finance. Savings will be realized in many areas. Dayton Hudson might teach Field's a few tricks about merchandising, or buying in mass," he said.

The price of $1 billion was a good value, he noted, particularly good because Field's was the No. 1 franchise in a city the size of Chicago.

More than half DH sales and a third of the corporate media total ($48 million) in 1989 were accounted for by Target, the discount operation specializing in nationally branded and private label active and casual apparel. In 1989, Target opened 31 stores in the Southeast and 29 elsewhere bring the total to 399.

Target handles advertising in-house. Its measured spending increased 17.3% to $48 million in 1989. Virtually all the increase came from spot TV, which rose from $11 million to $19 million in 1989.

Mervyn's, DH's 221-unit moderate-priced department store chain, recently starting upgrading its private label stock, which accounts for 50% of sales.

Mervyn's reissued this past March its now year-old TV ad campaign themed "For the clothes you love to live in." Previous executions emphasized price. The campaign, handled by Cohen & Johnson, Los Angeles, runs in series of three during 30-minute programs. Of the DH units, Mervyn's advertised most in spot TV at $19.9 million, up 99%. Its overall media spend was $43.2 million, up 22.7%.

Mervyn's print advertising (exclusively in newspaper), which declined 8% to $23.3 million, is handled in-house. This year, the chain shifted from b&w to color newspaper inserts distributed to 12.5 million households per week.

Delta Air Lines took an important step in becoming a truly national carrier by inaugurating transcontinental service in June. The nation's No. 3 carrier also expanded its presence on the West Coast after the 1987 merger with Western Airlines.

"We see a lot of growth out of Los Angeles," said Judy Jordan, Delta assistant VP-advertising and sales promotion. "Offering transcontinental service will go a long way in reinforcing our position that we're a major airline."

The carrier used this new Newark-to-Los Angeles nonstop service to launch its Person-to-Person business-class program in late May. A multimedia ad campaign from BBDO, Atlanta, touted inflight amenities such as complimentary champagne, silver-tray service in first class, free newspapers and multicourse meals.

Delta is developing expanded terminal facilities in Atlanta, Dallas/Fort Worth, Cincinnati, Orlando, Portland and Salt Lake City. The largest project is in Orlando which will include six international arrival gates.

Dovetailing with domestic system growth is a recent regional marketing strategy to supplement the national program. Marketing pushes to promote new and existing service at important hubs got under way in 1990.

Ad spending is up about 20% this year, influenced by a network buy on the Super Bowl broadcast that showcased new creative. Last year, Delta's media spending reflected its growing presence as a national airline as network TV more than picked up the decline in spot TV spending, and consumer magazines became a major medium for the airline with spending of $3.1 million.

For the first seven months of 1990, Delta slipped to a 13.2% share of the total domestic market (in revenue passenger miles) from 14.4%. Analysts attributed Delta's 1989 share gains to Eastern Airlines' bankruptcy filing, a temporary boon to Delta and others.

Still, Delta remains a solid third to American Airlines at 16.9% and United Airlines at 16.6%, according to Paine-Webber.

The airline was taken by surprise by the August departure of Hollis L. Harris, president-coo, who was named Continental Airlines' new chairman. Mr. Harris had been with Delta for 36 years.

Delta Chairman-CEO Ronald Allen assumed Mr. Harris' responsibilities and the added title of president. At the same time, W. Whitley Hawkins was promoted to exec VP-marketing & stations from senior VP-marketing.

■ Annual review

Walt Disney Co. expanded the boundaries of its communications kingdom in 1989 and 1990, launching a second record label, a third motion picture banner, a fast-food restaurant and a new children's magazine.

But with the rising cost of movie production and the pervasiveness of Disney characters, observers expect Disney's growth to slow in the early 1990s. That follows a period of explosive growth that began when Michael Eisner took the Disney helm in 1984.

Disney looked to offset its marketing costs by lining up cross-promotions with its films, home video releases, syndicated TV product, theme parks and consumer products.

On a corporate level, Disney this January signed a 15-year worldwide marketing agreement with Coca-Cola Co. giving Coke first rights at negotiating joint promos in several categories. Disney also linked with Nestle, allowing the marketer to create branded food products and promotional packages in Europe and the U.S.S.R.

Other major cross-promotions linked the theatrical release of "The Little Mermaid" with McDonald's Corp., the "Dick Tracy" film with McDonald's and Quaker Oats, the home video release of "Peter Pan" with Nabisco Brands crackers and the syndicated "Disney Afternoon" with Kellogg Co. and McDonald's.

The "Disney Afternoon" cross-promo is part of a new brand-management approach at Disney's Buena Vista Television, under which the syndicator will buy consumer media and design consumer promotions for its syndicated shows. Traditionally, syndicators have furnished on-air promotion packages to stations and left it to stations to market the shows to viewers.

Also in conjunction with the "Disney Afternoon," Disney will launch in October Disney Adventures, its first ma consumer magazine.

Disney's share of the record $5.02 million U.S. and Canadian box office fell to 13.9% in 1989, from 19.4%, making it the No. 4 film studio in box office draw. Nevertheless, Disney had a solid year theatrically by counterprogramming other studios' typical summer action blockbusters with "Honey, I Shrunk the Kids," "Dead Poets Society" and "Turner and Hooch," and by marketing its holiday animated film, "The Little Mermaid," to adults as well as children.

Disney supported its 18 films (the same number as in '88) with $85.6 million in media in 1989, up 31%. Seven films received over $5 million in media backing, led by "Dead Poets" with $8.7 million. Network and spot TV pulled the dominant share of ad dollars for film.

In the first half of this year, Disney rebounded with an 18.4% share, a surge mainly due to the surprise hit and top film of the year at presstime, Touchstone Pictures' "Pretty Woman" ($167 million gross receipts) and Touchstone's comic book action film "Dick Tracy" ($103 million).

The first film from Disney's Hollywood Pictures unit, "Arachnophobia," opened in July and by mid-August had taken in a respectable $45 million.

Disney in early 1990 used its muscle to ban paid screen ads before movies distributed under the Disney, Touchstone and Hollywood Pictures banners. The major U.S. theater chains are complying with the ban.

Measured ad spending in 1989 for Disney's theme parks, hotels and resorts increased only 15% to $62.9 million, after a 45% leap in 1988, despite the opening in May 1989 of its third Florida attraction, Disney-MGM Studios.

In May 1990, MCA Recreation Services opened Universal Studios Florida, just 12 miles down the highway from the Disney complex. Operational problems at the MCA park made it little competition for Disney-MGM studios, despite the fact that it is twice as large as Disney-MGM and by many reports, twice as entertaining. Disney plans major theme park and real estate expansions in both southern California and Orlando.

Disney Consumer Products, once a sleepy division, has opened Mickey's Kitchen, a prototype restaurant next to a Disney Store in Montclair, Calif. It's also expanding the Disney Store chain to 50 stores, with 100 stores planned by the end of 1991.

Walt Disney Records formed a live artists division and in 1990 released its first recording "Minnie 'n Me," accompanied by a push for Minnie Mouse licensed merchandise. Disney also formed Hollywood Records, a mainstream record label.

Dow Chemical Co. expanded deeper into consumer markets in 1989 as it entered joint ventures with two huge pharmaceutical companies: Eli Lilly & Co. and Marion Laboratories.

The alliances will join the DowBrands unit in the consumer specialties group, ballooning the group's total sales to more than $5 billion in 1990, up 47%. DowBrands, meanwhile, spent heavily, launching new products that virtually created a new home cleaning category.

DowElanco, formed in April 1989, represented the merger of Dow and Lilly's agri-chemical businesses. The resulting company, to be headquartered in Indianapolis, will have sales of $1.5 billion in 1990, ranking it No. 1 in the $5 billion U.S. agri-chemicals business and sixth in the world. Dow owns 60% of the venture.

In July 1989 Marion Merrell Dow was formed when Dow merged its Merrell Dow division with Marion Laboratories. The venture had $1.4 billion in sales in 1989, ranking it 13th among U.S. pharmaceutical marketers. Dow, which took 67% of the venture, expects $2.2 billion in sales in 1990. The new company is a separate publicly held company.

DowBrands boosted its home cleaning product advertising by 53% to $45.2 million with some $19.3 million to roll out Spiffits, dispenser-packed disposable cleaning towels in five varieties: bathroom, glass, multipurpose, soft scouring and furniture.

Spiffits proved a double-threat success. It created a new household cleaner segment now worth an estimated $100 million. It inspired its DowBrands corporate cousins at Fantastik to create their new Fantastik S'wipes multipurpose moist cleaning towels, which debuted this May with a national print and couponing campaign from Henderson Advertising, Greenville, S.C.

DowBrands' second product area, food care, rose to $28.5 million in ad spending, up 13.7%. Of that, $5.7 million was for Freezloc heavy-duty plastic freezer wrap with Cling Strip, introduced October 1989. Network TV got $5.1 million of the total. Saran Wrap drew $4.4 million in media, down 29%, while Ziploc bags got $18.4 million, even with the prior year.

The consumer division's personal care line dropped $7.5 million in advertising as support dropped for the Textra care line which drew $5.2 million in 1988. Perma Soft brand of conditioners, cleaners and gels continued to be the big ad draw, with $4.6 million, down 34%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Pharmaceutical ad support at Dow was down 7.9% to $24.8 million. Marion Laboratories' 1989 totals would have doubled pharmaceutical ad support had the Marion Merrell Dow marriage been consummated by the end of the year.

Receiving a 22% cut to $1.6 million was Cepacol mouthwash, No. 5 among the top U.S. brands with a 4.5% market share. Citrucel, bulk laxative, the orange-flavored methyl-cellulose competitor to Metamucil, dropped 54% in ad spending to $1.6 million.

The former Lakeside Pharmaceutical unit of Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals climbed 14.7% in 1989 ad support to $6 million. Nicorette smoking cessation chewing gum, in Lakeside's product array prior to the Marion Merrell Dow linkup, got a year's ad budget of about $6 million in 1989 with the kickoff of a new print program that promoted the prescription gum by name, contrary to the standard practice for ethical drugs.

The "Dow lets you do great things" corporate image campaign that received $14 million in 1988 support, dropped to $7.6 million, including network TV at $6.5 million. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., continues creating the series, now in three versions: "Baseball," touting recycling—a strong theme now for plastics-maker Dow, "Corporate Angel," showing the role of a corporate jet in aiding the ill, and "Discovery," depicting a children's learning museum.

The creation of Marion Merrell Dow, amidst numerous other mega-pharmaceutical combinations industrywide, involves changes in structure and shifts of product lines: Lakeside Pharmaceuticals' name was changed to Marion Merrell Dow Consumer Products Division. While keeping its popular Cepacol, Novahistine and other OTC lines, it lost Nicorette and other prescription lines.

In another company change, DowBrands' Home Care Products Division, once Texize Inc., relocated in October 1989 from its original Greenville, S.C., base to DowBrands' headquarters in Indianapolis, where it joined the Food Care Products Division to form the new Household Products Division of DowBrands.

Agency changes include DowElanco's dropping Vitt Media, New York, for media planning and adding Carmichael-Lynch, Kansas City, Mo., for its professional turf and ornamental advertising.

■ Annual review

Dr Pepper/Seven-Up Cos. is chipping away at the cola segment by positioning its products as taste alternatives and, through separate marketing efforts, the company is placing greater emphasis on its diet products.

The Dallas-based company commands about a 10% share of the total soft drink market. Its Dr Pepper products rose 0.2 share points to 5.4% of market in 1989. By contrast, Seven-Up products slipped 0.4 share points to 4.1%, according to John Maxwell, analyst at Wheat, First Securities. The two companies operate independently of each other.

Share movement by the two companies also tracked ad spending movement in 1989. Media spending for Dr Pepper brand rose 10% to $27.2 million, while Seven-Up brand's media total hit $37 million, down 24.9%, according to LNA/-Arbitron.

Seven-Up's return to a core brand focus this year has helped the lemon-lime leader stabilize its market share, ending a six-year downward spiral. Among key developments has been the relaunch of Diet 7UP that includes a taste reformulation and ad theme, "Break the ice."

To capitalize on the popularity of diet drinks, Seven-Up plans to boost its 1991 media plan by 47% over 1990 media buys, said Russ Klein, Seven-Up senior VP-marketing. A series of five humorous commercials in 1991 will invite consumers to rediscover Diet 7UP.

For brand 7UP advertising, the company will continue to rely on its animated character called "Spot." Created from the red dot on the 7UP logo, Spot will be the centerpiece of the brand's entire ad effort including promotions. Licensing efforts, most notably to Virgin Mastertronic for a Nintendo videogame in the summer of 1990, are helping to build 7UP brand awareness among virtually all age groups.

Seven-Up next year hopes to revive Cherry 7UP, a huge success in 1987 when it was introduced. It quickly captured about a 2% share of the total market but by 1989 its share had slipped to 0.2%. The company is making local funds available to bottlers to tap opportunities by market.

Regular Dr Pepper, the No. 5 soft drink, is the leading non-cola with a 4.4% market share. Dr Pepper Co. is implementing a strategy of targeting light-to-medium Dr Pepper users to boost overall consumption.

"We have positioned Dr Pepper as the product that makes good things happen," said John Clarke, Dr Pepper senior VP-marketing. The company is continuing its ad theme, "Just what the doctor ordered."

The company last year changed its Diet Dr Pepper advertising by giving up comedienne Judy Tenuta as spokeswoman but keeping the theme "Like nothin' else."

Like its sister company Seven-Up, Dr Pepper plans aggressive growth for Diet Dr Pepper. "For the next two to three years, our goal is to lead the non-cola charge in the diet segment," said Mr. Clarke. "We want to establish ourselves as the No. 1 diet non-cola."

■ Annual review

Du Pont struck joint ventures in pharmaceuticals and paints, and began to phase out ozone-depleting chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and its Orlon fiber businesses in 1989.

The moves to discontinue its CFC and Orlon product lines, in particular, will be costly. Earnings were down for the first six months of this year because of costs associated with those phase-outs and with reduced market activity for its other apparel and carpet synthetic fibers.

Du Pont as in the past spent the lion's share of its media advertising on carpets, particularly Stainmaster. Of the $34.7 million (up 8.4%) in carpet spending, Stainmaster drew $32 million, same as in 1988 and mostly in network TV for both years. Corporate general promotion media spending hit $11.5 million, about the same as in 1988, and agricultural chemicals reached $3.1 million, up 107%.

Among Du Pont's fiber brand names, Teflon stain repellent drew $4.7 million, down 20%, and Lycra fibers got $4.3 million, down 8.5%. Du Pont provides heavy co-op spending for its fibers. Lycra, for example, is touted by such brand names as Maidenform bras and Fruit of the Loom underwear. Teflon is promoted in ads for home furnishing by Serta and Simmons bedding.

Du Pont continues to advertise Silverstone coating, supporting the brand with $950,000 in 1989, up 55%. The company basically provides maintenance spending for its brands like Silverstone once they catch hold in the market. In the mid-1980s when the coating was relatively new, Silverstone drew more than $9 million in media support as a tagline to ads for such cookware brands as Sunbeam and Regal.

Joint venture deals are being struck by a number of leading pharmaceutical companies to share the burden of research and development and marketing, a need that led to the agreement between Du Pont and Merck & Co. to created Du Pont-Merck Pharmaceuticals.

The venture, headquartered in Wilmington, merged Du Pont's blood pressure and congestive heart failure medications and Merck's Parkinson and blood-pressure preparations. The merger combines Du Pont's strong pharmaceutical network with Merck's huge research and international drug marketing structure. The unit will operate with a research staff of about 1,500, sales staff of 600 and R&D budget of about $230 million. It is projecting first-year sales of $700 million.

Du Pont's diagnostic, biotechnology systems and X-ray products, producing more than $1 billion in sales, are not included in the venture with Merck.

Merck earlier in 1989 struck a deal with Johnson & Johnson to develop and market OTC versions of Merck's ethical drugs.

Du Pont also entered into a joint venture with Japan's Kansai Point Co., the first such linkup here between American and Japanese paint producers. The venture will develop and market paints for Japanese auto and auto parts makers in the U.S., Mexico and Canada.

After 40 years of producing Orlon acrylic fiber, a prime yarn ingredient for socks, sweaters and other knit goods, Du Pont reported this June that it was leaving the business—though not the whole field of acrylonitrile production.

The company generated sales of $200 million from Orlon in 1989, a drop in Du Pont's fiber bucket that produced $6 billion in sales. Cotton and polyester competition had cut increasingly into profits from Orlon, its acrylic brand name.

Du Pont has never spent heavily to support Orlon in co-op advertising. The fiber drew only $127,000 in spending in 1989, all in consumer magazines, according to LNA/Arbitron. Burlington and Wigwam sock lines have been big Orlon users.

■ Annual review

Eastman Kodak Co., which has been stumbling under the heavy debt incurred from its $5.1 billion acquisition of Sterling Drug in 1988, is starting to show signs of financial recovery.

Kay Whitmore, who in June replaced Colby Chandler as Kodak's chairman-CEO, said the brighter financial picture can be traced to "actions initiated in 1989 to sharpen our focus on the value-adding parts of the business."

The cost-cutting moves in 1989 included eliminating more than 4,500 employees worldwide, restructuring business operations and demanding its 28 advertising, promotion and public relations agencies be more cost-efficient.

The restructuring consolidated business operations into four core businesses: consumer imaging (photographic products and batteries); health (Sterling and Lehn & Fink); information systems (business products and electronic imaging products); and chemicals.

Kodak trimmed its overall ad budget by 1.8% as spot TV took the hardest hit, dropping 31% to $15 million. Kodak, which has said it will continue to trim any ad fat, reported its 1990 ad budget will be flat to slightly down.

Kodak this May launched a joint promotion with Walt Disney Co. for its Kodacolor Gold film that was backed by a major ad campaign. It had signed in 1989 a 15-year, multimillion-dollar deal with Disney to become the exclusive supplier of photographic products to Disney's theme parks.

That and other marketing efforts behind its film products hurt Polaroid's entry into the conventional film market with its OneFilm brand. Polaroid said extensive counterattacks by Kodak and, to a lesser extent, Fuji Photo Film USA, slowed OneFilm's entry.

Kodak has an estimated 80% of the U.S. conventional film market, Fuji has an estimated 11%, and Polaroid's OneFilm, less than 3%.

Yet, Polaroid appears committed to the brand and a fight on the film front should reheat again in 1991.

This fall Kodak will introduce a line of low-priced amateur 35mm cameras backed by an estimated $7 million ad campaign from Young & Rubicam, New York. Camera advertising claimed $9.5 million in media spending, up 23% from the prior year. J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, handles film. Film advertising in media grew by 22% to $45.6 million, virtually all new dollars coming in consumer magazines, up from $4.9 million to $12.9 million.

New products out of the consumer imaging division in 1989 and 1990 included line extensions to Kodak's popular Kodacolor Gold film line, new batteries, new single-use cameras and new professional films.

Kodak in 1990 also kept up its sponsorship deals, signing on with the Goodwill Games and CBS-TV as the exclusive film advertiser on the 1992 Winter Olympics telecast.

In its health group, Kodak's Sterling Drug unit, like other aspirin marketers, dropped efforts to promote aspirin as a second heart attack preventative and turned to pain relief themes. Bayer, from Sterling's Glenbrook Laboratories, was repositioned as the aspirin for "adult-size" headaches in an ad campaign in late 1989 featuring Robert Urich. Bayer drew $25.3 million in media, down 22% from 1988 when virtually all aspirin marketers boosted budgets to push second heart attack preventative claims. That claim turned out to address a limited market.

Glenbrook's leading products are Bayer, Phillip's Milk of Magnesia, which drew $6.5 million in measured media, up 10%, and Midol menstrual relief products, backed by $3.2 million in media, down 43%.

Sterling in 1989 switched advertising agencies for its Neo-Synephrine brand and other nasal products from N W Ayer to Slater Hanft Martin, both New York. Advertising for Neo-Synephrine dropped to less than $1 million from $3.8 million in 1988.

Lehn & Fink in 1989 added a "light scent" variation to its Lysol spray disinfectant and Lysol Bathroom Touch-Ups disinfectant cleaning wipes. Despite a 10.3% decline in Lysol brand media spending, it remained Lehn & Fink's heaviest supported brand at $33.2 million in measured media in 1989.

The unit also introduced Glass Mates, premoistened towelettes for cleaning shiny surfaces, backed by $5.8 million in media spending in network and spot TV.

L&F continued to put considerable media clout behind its do-it-yourself product lines, including Formby's wood care products, $2.3 million, down 28%; Minwax, $5.7 million, down 5% and Thompson water seal products, $11.3 million, down 7%.

With restructuring costs factored in, Kodak's net earnings in the second quarter 1990 were $304 million (restructuring resulted in a charge of $80 million against earnings) compared to $77 million for the prior-year period.

Still looming over the company are the damages it must pay Polaroid Corp. for infringing on Polaroid's instant photography patents in the early 1980s. Polaroid is seeking $14 billion in damages; Kodak is suggesting under $200 million. Industry observers estimate damages will run $1 billion to $2 billion.

Annual review

Ford Motor Co., the No. 2 domestic automaker, stepped up ad spending in 1989 as it felt the effects of slowing car sales and increased competition. Its earnings dropped 28% for 1989 after three straight years of record returns.

Ford sold some of its operations in late 1989 and 1990 to put its resources into its two core business units, automotive and financial services. Sold between yearend and this month were Ford's Rouge Steel subsidiary, the Ford Aerospace unit and Ford-New Holland tractor and farm equipment operation. Ford still holds a 20% stake in Rouge Steel and Ford-New Holland.

Ford purchased British luxury carmaker Jaguar in November 1989 for $2.5 billion and said goodbye to Chairman Donald Petersen, who announced in November 1989 he would take early retirement. He was succeeded by Harold Poling, former vice chairman-COO. Philip Benton, formerly president of the Ford Automotive Group, succeeded Mr. Poling as COO and gained the title of company president.

Ford introduced a redesigned Lincoln Town Car and four-wheel-drive versions of its Aerostar minivan in the fall of 1989. It also introduced several new products in 1990 including the new Ford Escort, the best-selling car of the 1980s, the Ford Explorer sport utility vehicle (which replaced the Bronco II) and the Australian-built Mercury Capri convertible. Ford said it will spend more on new products and facilities in the next five years than the $23 billion it spent in the last five.

Ford sold 2,205,598 Ford, Lincoln-Mercury and Merkur cars in 1989, down 2.5% from 1988. Its car market share increased to 22.4% in 1989 from 21.6%. Ford truck sales of 1,466,929 declined 3%. Its market share decreased slightly from 29.12% in 1988 to 28.76% in 1989.

Ford light trucks, market leader, lost share points to Chevrolet in 1989. Chevrolet began running ads in the winter of 1989 that showed people in rural Ford County, Ill., prefer Chevrolet trucks over Ford's. Ford argued that it sold more trucks in Ford County and ran a TV spot to counter the claim.

Ford's truck sales got a boost in March when Ford introduced its four-door and two-door Explorer. The Explorer is designed to compete with the Jeep Cherokee and four- and two-door versions of the Chevrolet Blazer. Ford is predicting Explorer will double its sales in the sport utility category in the future. Ford also launched an overall truck campaign themed "The best never rest" in April 1990.

The company's car business continues to give mixed results. Despite domestic leadership in car sales for the Ford nameplate for both the 1989 model and calendar year, Ford is in a tight battle for the 1990 sales crown. Chevrolet, buoyed by its Geo import car lineup, beat Ford sales by nearly 45,000 units for the first half of 1990.

Ford is counting on its 1991 redesigned Escort that went on sale this April. The new Escort, based on the Mazda 323 subcompact, is being called the most important launch in its history. Ford is spending an estimated $65 million-$70 million in advertising to launch the Escort redesign. The car is important to Ford to continue high sales volumes of small cars so it can meet tougher fuel economy standards in the future. The fuel-efficient Escort is important to keep Ford's average low and meet the corporate auto fuel economy (CAFE) standard.

Ford Division continued to use its age-old theme line "Have you driven a Ford lately?" in both print and TV for its cars.

During 1989, the heaviest advertised Ford car was the Ford Taurus at $25.7 million, down 20.2%. Ranger received the most ad support for a Ford truck with $47.8 million, up 72.6%. Ford Division spent $260 million in media advertising for both cars and light trucks in 1989, up 6%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Two new cars at Lincoln-Mercury, the Mercury Capri and Escort's sister, the Mercury Tracer, entered the market this summer. Both are designed to bring in younger buyers to L-M showrooms. Mercury continued with its year-old theme line "Nothing moves you like a Mercury" showing a live cougar jumping into block letters spelling Mercury.

L-M dropped its Merkur brand in October 1989 after five years of unsuccessfully trying to crack the European import segment with its Ford of Europe-built XR4Ti and Scorpio cars. Dealers and industry analysts applauded the move.

Lincoln enjoyed increased market share from 1.81% in 1988 to 2.01% in 1989 and increased sales so far in 1990, thanks to more interest in luxury cars and its redesigned Town Car for 1990. Golfer Jack Nicklaus appeared in several Lincoln ads as Lincoln continued to use its ad theme, "What a luxury car should be," in both print and TV.

L-M measured advertising rose 3% to $98 million for its cars, including Merkur cars, in the 1989 calendar year. The Mercury Cougar pulled the largest media expenditure of $34.4 million, up from only $11.3 million in 1988, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Ford signed a $43 million deal for commercial time during the 1992 and 1994 Winter Olympics.

Ford Financial Services announced plans in April 1990 to purchase Marine Midland Automotive Financial, the fourth largest automotive financing unit. It also formed Ford Holdings to raise capital for its purchase of Associates Corp. and serve as the holding company for its leasing and insurance subsidiaries.

Its pan-European auto replacement parts account was shifted to Ogilvy & Mather in September 1989 from Lintas' CM:Spectrum.

Annual review

NBC Television Network's efforts to build viewership for its new fall schedule in a first-ever joint sweepstake promotion with Sears, Roebuck & Co. apparently worked well enough to prompt the leading network to try it again—this time with an even more seasoned promo artist, McDonald's Corp.

NBC, now General Electric's biggest advertised division, and McDonald's Corp. will give away some $35 million in cash during a four-week, watch-and-win game called "McMillions on NBC." NBC has been mum about the success of the Sears venture. However, CBS, which linked with K mart in a similar effort, credited its promotion with helping boost viewership of its new fall prime time shows by more than 20% over premiere showings in 1988.

Until last year, GE spent more media ad dollars on general GE corporate promotion. That spending declined 24.4% in 1989 to $28.8 million, compared with NBC spending of $33.1 million, down 4.3%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The company also cut media spending on its GE appliances by 36.9% to $11.8 million, most of the decline coming out of general promotion for major appliances. Among its itemized appliances mix, the company nearly doubled advertising for refrigerators/freezers to $5.4 million in 1989.

The restructuring of GE in the 1980s has left the company with less of a consumer orientation. This translates into reduced ad spending. This year's 12.9% companywide decline in measured media erases last year's 3% increase and continues an ad reduction trend that started in 1986.

Few if any products spent more in media in 1989 than in 1988, one exception being home light bulbs, which grew 20.9% to $8.1 million.

NBC remained the ratings leader for the 30-week season ended April 15, but its 14.6 rating was off 17% from the previous year. The three-network average prime-time share of total TV viewers during the 1989-90 TV season dropped slightly to 66%.

NBC still commands more ad revenue than its competitors although prior-year figures reflect heavy spending on NBC and ABC by Olympics advertisers. NBC's network revenue in 1989 hit $3.68 billion, down 3.7%; ABC revenue came in at $3.02 billion for both years, and CBS claimed $2.86 billion, up 4.4%.

Once again NBC led the three networks with about $1.5 billion in sales during the record-setting $4.3 billion upfront prime-time selling season for the 1990-91 TV season.

Earlier this year NBC merged its ad sales operations for broadcast and cable TV. The NBC sales force now oversees ad sales for CNBC and SportsChannel America, which NBC co-owns with Cablevision Corp. The set-up helped NBC complete a $500 million-$750 million, three-year upfront ad deal with General Motors Corp. that includes advertising on NBC's prime-time programs and sports and its cable properties.

NBC executives called the deal "the largest single commitment made by any advertiser in the history of television." Both parties said the agreement extended what had become an established buying pattern on NBC by the nation's No. 1 automaker.

CNBC, launched in April 1989 with 13 million subscribers, had 16.8 million subscribers by June 1990 but is still far short of its 30 million subscriber break-even point. In July, Albert F. Barber, exec VP-CFO of NBC, took over the presidency of the cable network, replacing Michael Eskridge.

NBC also is banking on cable TV to help the network defray the $401 million telecast rights fees and maybe reap a profit on the 1992 Summer Olympic Games in Barcelona. The network initially talked about offering a special cable pay-per-view package for about $150 which would give an Olympics fan around-the-clock coverage on as many as three channels for two weeks. Those plans could change as the network attempts to maximize its Olympic investment.

Annual review

General Mills spent the last year racing to keep production up with demand for its popular cereal lines, expanding its restaurant chains and new foodservice concepts and finalizing plans to enter the European market with Big G cereals.

General Mills linked with Nestle S.A. to create a worldwide breakfast cereal business, Cereal Partners Worldwide (CPW), that promptly purchased the U.K. breakfast cereal business of Ranks Hovis McDougall PLC. That foray gave CPW 15% of the $1 billion U.K. cereal business, RHM's market share.

Though second only to Kellogg in the $6 billion U.S. cereal market, General Mills had been a minor player compared to Kellogg in Europe. Sales of cereals are estimated at $1.6 billion there, and are expected to quadruple by the year 2000.

In the U.S., General Mills cereals hold a 27% dollar share of the ready-to-eat cereal market based on its fiscal 1990 cereal sales of $1.6 billion, up 19.5%. Growth came despite production capacity limitations which forced a delay in new-product introductions. Relief will come from a new plant that began production in April and four other plants to come on-line in 1991.

Established brand lines Cheerios and Total accounted for nearly half of General Mills' cereal business. Each line introduced an extension—Apple Cinnamon Cheerios and Total Raisin Bran.

The 49-year-old Cheerios is the country's leading cereal, while 10-year-old Honey Nut Cheerios is third. Apple Cinnamon Cheerios is 14th in dollar sales at 1.5% share. The entire brand commands 9.7% (up from 8% in 1988) of the ready-to-eat cereal market. General Mills is test marketing Cheerios to Go, a package of six snack-size packets of the brand's three flavors. The Cheerios line was backed by $68 million in media last year, a 35% increase, according to LNA/Arbitron. Total, which claimed 2.6% of the market in 1989, down 0.1 points, received $42 million, up 49%.

McDonald's Corp. this March tapped Cheerios and Wheaties for its breakfast menu. If the cereals catch on, they could quickly generate additional revenue of up to $200 million.

Kellogg's market share is estimated at 39.5% to General Mills' 27% of the ready-to-eat cereal market. In hot cereals, General Mills' 8% share ranks third, far behind Quaker Oats' 61% lead. The company introduced a new hot cereal, Undercover Bears, nationally in September, supported by a $10 million network and spot TV campaign from Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Minneapolis. Targeting kids for its hot cereal products has been General Mills' longtime strategy.

Psyllium-based Benefit and line extension Raisin Oat Bran were dropped.

New product rollouts dominated General Mills' activity in the $298 million fruit snacks market, which it leads with a market share nearing 44% compared to 37.8% for runner-up Thomas J. Lipton Inc. The bite-size segment of the market continues to grow as fruit rolls and bars decline. New products included Thunder Jets and Surf's Up fruit shapes and Garfield & Friends fruit rolls with peel-out cartoon characters.

Red Lobster USA, whose sales represent 25% of the $5.3 billion U.S. seafood dinnerhouse segment, increased measured ad spending to $58 million, up 13.7%. Its advertising highlighted special meal promotions in its 460 restaurants. While Red Lobster added 20 units, General Mills' Olive Garden Italian restaurant added 55. Backed by $3.6 million in measured spending and its first promotional event, "The Carnival of Venice," Olive Garden's 200 restaurants claimed a 10% share of the $4.5 billion Italian dinnerhouse segment.

Combined sales for Red Lobster and Olive Garden are expected to reach $3 billion by 1993, as General Mills adds 45 to 50 units per year to each chain.

China Coast, a dinnerhouse concept in test in Orlando, is bringing Oriental food to an audience aged 45-64, the population segment that frequents full-service restaurants the most, said General Mills. China Coast's menu features three popular Chinese regional cuisines, and meals are prepared to be free of cholesterol and MSG.

General Mills is testing a foodservice concept in Minneapolis called Bringer's, which provides home delivery of hot prepared foods, salads and appetizers. With its moderate pricing—the average entree costs $5.50—and a delivery time of 19 minutes, Bringer's is promoted as an alternative to pizza.

APPLE GO NETWORK.

There are two kinds of innovations in the computer business. The ones you just talk about. And the ones you actually use.
Introducing 103 of the latter.

Introducing the Mac that gets business communicating at its best.

When Apple Computer and its agency BBDO/LA wanted to reach serious computer buyers to introduce their new "wicked fast" Macintosh IIfx, they went primetime with the Ziff-Davis PC Network. What better way to launch a computer that's a serious rival to the PC standard.

Communicating with the best buyers.

With a combination of flexible media schedules in three publications—PC Magazine, PC Week and PC/Computing—Apple can go right to the top of the ratings with 1.5 million computer buyers, reaching circulation numbers and demographics that only the business books used to offer.

Says Ron Harrison, BBDO/LA's Senior Vice President/Director of Media Service, "With the Network, we can appeal to buyers through their different 'points of view'. There is no larger group of buyers than those reached by these three complementary publications. The Network breaks new ground for Apple and helps influence markets that are critical to their success in the 1990s."

Apple, the Apple logo, Macintosh and IIfx are registered trademarks of Apple Computer, Inc. "Wicked fast" is an official sound bite of Frank Casanova and the Macintosh IIfx development team.

McDonald's financials biodegradable

McDonald's, which printed its 1989 annual report on recycled paper generated 100% from its own operations, moved this year to counter criticism of the amount of garbage its packaging creates by avowing to step up its use of recycled paper well beyond annual reports and by testing regionally a promotion that distributed tree seedlings to elementary students. In the latter promotion, McDonald's also provided educational materials on the environment to grade school teachers.

Annual review

The beginning of the Robert Stempel era and an apparent bottoming-out of a harrowing slide in market share provided optimistic notes as General Motors Corp. entered the last quarter of 1990.

The new management team that took office Aug. 1 was led by Mr. Stempel as chairman and Lloyd Reuss as president. Both came up through GM's engineering ranks, leading observers inside and outside the company to predict a new emphasis on product at GM. Mr. Stempel replaced Roger Smith, who retired. Like most of his predecessors, Mr. Smith advanced through the financial side.

GM's share of the U.S. new vehicle market, including cars and light trucks, plummeted from 45.7% units in 1980 to 35.1% in 1989. Each share point in 1989 represented about $2 billion in sales. The 1989 share was down from 35.6% in 1988. Total 1989 U.S. vehicle sales for GM were 5,106,224 units, a decline of 7.4% from the previous year.

But for the first seven months of 1990, GM's share rebounded to 36% as the market itself diminished. GM's unit sales for the period also declined, by 1.8% compared to the previous year.

Worldwide factory sales of GM vehicles fell to 7,946,000 in 1989, off 2%. In the U.S., GM sold 3,437,251 cars, down 10.1%, and 1,668,973 light trucks, down 1.2%. Buick maintained a 5.5% share of the U.S. car market; Cadillac rose to 2.7% from 2.5%; Chevrolet dropped from 14% to 13.7%; Oldsmobile fell to 6.1% from 6.8% and Pontiac declined to 6.9% from 7.4%.

In the light-truck market, Chevrolet increased its share from 27.4% to 28%, and GMC went up from 7.2% to 7.6%. Pontiac and Oldsmobile became players in the light-truck market with the late 1989 introduction of new minivans and finished the year with a combined 0.1% of the truck market.

For 1989, Buick media spending declined 2.4%, to $115.4 million; Cadillac boosted its spending by 19.6%, to $57.8 million; Chevrolet spending was up 18.6% to $358.6 million (includes cars, trucks and Geo brand); GMC Truck raised spending 4.9% to $27.3 million; Oldsmobile declined 4.7% to $133 million and Pontiac was up 17.6%, to $111.6 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

GM tightened its belt in early 1990, lopping an estimated $80 million out of first-half divisional budgets in reaction to the industrywide slowdown in sales. Some of the funds were channeled into a new corporate campaign, themed "GM puts quality on the road," an effort that originated after surveys indicated that perception of GM quality was worse than reality. GM also sought to hold on to owners of GM vehicles built in the mid-1980s by assuring them that quality had improved.

Chevrolet in the fall of 1989 revamped its strategy for its Geo-branded line of cars and sport utility vehicles, settling on a single ad campaign, "Get to know Geo," from Lintas:Campbell-Ewald. The campaign replaced two separate campaigns that had been used regionally, one from Lintas:Campbell-Ewald and the other from West Coast agency Vic Olesen & Partners. Through mid-August, Geo sales were up 46.6% from the same period in 1989, a key reason Chevrolet has overtaken Ford in the race for the 1990 car sales crown.

Buick attempted to capitalize on several high finishes in quality surveys by marketing consultancy J.D. Powers & Associates. Buick first used a new theme line, "The new symbol for quality in America," in July 1989. A year later that line became the predominant theme in Buick campaigns. The former tagline "The great American road belongs to Buick," was kept only as an instrument Buyers depend on the advertising they read in computer publications.

And why else does Apple choose these publications? Because 70% of the people who buy computers rely most often on computer publications as their source of information. Which explains why the 1989 MediaTrack IQ syndicated research study shows that computer product advertising in the Network publications is read three times as closely as the same advertising in the four leading general business publications.

musical theme.

Cadillac was one of several marketers to put new emphasis on safety in the 1990 model year. When ads touted safety features, the theme line "Building a safer automobile, Cadillac style" was brought into play. "The only way to travel is Cadillac style" line remained the overall theme.

Oldsmobile tried to build confidence in its products by announcing in September 1989 that it would permit dissatisfied owners to return cars for full credit toward another vehicle. "The new generation of Oldsmobile" remained the theme line for the 1990 model year, but Olds dropped the well-known copy line, "This is not your father's Oldsmobile," a line criticized in some quarters as patronizing to the division's older buyers.

GM was preparing to launch in late October 1990 the first two models from its Saturn subsidiary, created to battle Japanese imports and to experiment with new manufacturing and marketing strategies. A teaser campaign scheduled to break this month was to explain the company's background by profiling employees and dealers. "A different kind of company. A different kind of car" is the theme.

GM announced in April 1990 that it would go into production at an unspecified date with an electric car, based on its Impact prototype that accelerates from zero to 60 mph in eight seconds, has a top speed of 110 mph and a range of 125 miles between battery charges.

On the media front, GM in April 1990 struck a three-year, estimated $750 million agreement with NBC assuring the automaker access to top-rated, prime-time shows and sports programming. NBC said the deal was the largest commitment ever made by an advertiser in the history of television.

■ Annual review
Gillette Co. made a big splash in 1990 with its Sensor razor which grabbed a 5.8% share of the $700 million-plus U.S. wet-razor market by April, its fourth month on the market.
Sensor will boost Gillette's dominance in the wet-razor category, despite anticipated cannibalization of other Gillette brands like Atra Plus. The category is expected to grow by $100 million within the year because of Sensor, industry analysts say.
The Boston-based company in 1989 had an estimated 64% share, followed by Warner Lambert Co.'s Schick with more than 16%. Bic, which markets disposables, had 9.8%, and Wilkinson had 2%.
Gillette ran into supply problems after sales responded to teaser ads for Sensor during the Super Bowl. Sensor's launch in Italy and Spain was postponed. Gillette even shaved part of Sensor's ad spending allocated for the first half to the second when supply improves.
Sensor, Gillette's only shaving system advertised in 1990, was scheduled to have a worldwide marketing budget of $175 million. But with sales continuing to soar, industry observers now question whether Gillette will shell out the entire amount, especially since inventories are still low.
Andrew Shore, first VP at Prudential-Bache Securities, estimates Gillette spent $60 million on Sensor advertising, so far. "There is no way Gillette can spend, or should spend, the remaining $115 million marketing dollars."
Whether Sensor's advertising kicks back in or not, the product will push Gillette's 1990 ad volume far above 1989's $185 million, up 17%. Gillette concentrated its media spending once again on network TV (47.7%) and in magazines (27%), the latter medium getting a 74.3% increase in 1989 to $26.7 million.
In the blade and razor business, Gillette Atra drew the biggest expenditure, $15.1 million in 1989, down 35%. With Gillette moving toward shaving systems in its men's lines, Good News disposables drew no media spending versus $4 million in 1988. Daisy disposable shavers for women pulled $6 million, up from $2.7 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.
Gillette tried to expand its disposable business by acquiring Wilkinson Sword's U.S. disposable razor business from Swedish Match A.B., but the Justice Department nixed the move on antitrust grounds. Wilkinson's international business outside the European Community was acquired, which also quieted a loud dispute over comparative ad claims Wilkinson made against Gillette in TV ads for its Ultra Glide system.
Gillette refocused its toiletries and cosmetics business in early 1990 by divesting several European skin and haircare operations, including such brands as Silkience shampoo and Aapri skincare. The company also merged its toiletries and blade and razor divisions, forming the North Atlantic Shaving and Personal Care Division.
Gillette pared media spending on its major toiletries lines. Dry Idea antiperspirants measured $3.6 million, down from $11.8 million. Right Guard drew $8.1 million, down 32% and Soft & Dri attracted $8.8 million, down 1.5%.
Gillette plans to extend its popular White Rain haircare line to body lotions. White Rain now has a 4.4% unit share of the haircare market, second to Helene Curtis' Suave. Its 1989 media spending was only about $1 million compared to $8.5 million for Suave. In supermarkets, White Rain's share in conditioner/rinses carried it to a 4.1% dollar share, up from 3.6% in 1988 as Suave dropped from 8.7% to 8.1%. White Rain's shampoo dollar share in supermarkets was 3.3% in 1989, down from 4.4%.
Among stationery products, Waterman pen got its first TV commercial since Gillette acquired the brand in 1987. Waterman's media tally was $5 million, up from $1.8 million. McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, handles.
Gillette in late 1989, named Ayer Direct, the first direct marketing agency of record for personal care products.

■ Annual review
As Goodyear's 35% share of the North American new tire sales market, worth an estimated $18.3 billion, began to erode last year in the wake of a slump in new car sales, company officials stepped up efforts to increase consumer brand awareness in the replacement market.
Goodyear, still No. 1 in the U.S., lost its position as the world's leading tire marketer when France's Groupe Michelin bought Uniroyal-Goodrich earlier this year producing a combined total share of 20.5% compared to Goodyear's 17.5%. The conglomerate has an estimated 26% share of the North American market.
The decision to emphasize brand building led Goodyear to pull its $40 million domestic ad account from Young & Rubicam late last year and return it to J. Walter Thompson USA, Detroit, which had lost the account in 1987. JWT never lost the estimated $12 million-to-$15 million performance tire account.
JWT's first efforts in the brand-building campaign were a series of four 30-second spots that began airing on network TV earlier this year. The emotion-laden ads were based on the theme, "The best tires in the world have Goodyear written all over them."
Under Y&R's tutelage, Goodyear became a major spender on network and spot radio and newspapers—intimate media suited for building sales in the replacement market—at the expense of network TV. The 1989 surge in the three media contributed $24 million in new ad dollars to the media mix, as network TV declined $5 million.
The company's concentration on moving tire sales is reflected in its media swing away from service centers. The centers, which drew 40% of the measured total in 1988, dropped to 27% in 1989, as Goodyear and Kelly-Springfield brand tires claimed the rest in both years.
According to tire industry analyst Harry W. Millis of McDonald & Co., Cleveland, Goodyear's tire sales increased 11.9% worldwide and 3.3% domestically in the first quarter of 1990.
In the face of a 27% drop in original equipment sales, Mr. Millis said, those sales increases indicate that Goodyear has made sharp gains in the replacement tire market. The volume of original equipment sales is inexorably tied to car sales, which in late 1989 began to drop due to a glut of new cars and consequent cutback in production.
The U.S. tire replacement market for passenger cars in 1989 was led by Goodyear brands (including Kelly-Springfield and others) with a 30% share.
James DeVoe, who had been VP-advertising worldwide, left Goodyear this past spring to become president of Jayme Organization in Cleveland. His duties at Goodyear were assumed by Davis Jones, director of retail advertising, and Donald Clark, director of international advertising.

motional spending for 1989 went to bolster the brand identity of the newly-acquired No. 2 fast-food giant, Burger King, as well as Pillsbury, Green Giant and Haagen-Dazs brands.

The company succeeded in divesting several sizable food groups to ease its corporate debt, but failed to sell Alpo Petfoods, which it had put on the block. Alpo is now back in the Grand Met camp.

The largest single advertisers among Grand Met U.S. holdings, Burger King, with $170 million in measured spending, saw an 11.5% jump in its media budget. Burger King's advertising reflected the new marketing strategy of making repeated and significant menu changes.

The effort features other brand name products at the restaurants, such as (Paul) Newman's Own salad dressing and Domino's pizza, along with special versions of its hamburger and sandwich offerings. Burger King also secured the service of the animated spokesfamily The Simpsons.

The fast-food marketer ventured into the public service arena with a campaign of docu-ads with a "stay in school" message targeted at teens on Whittle Communications' Channel One in-school TV network.

New Pillsbury Foods COO Paul Walsh, formerly exec VP of Grand Met's U.S. operations, targets a 60% ad spending increase for his division, which includes the independent operating units of Pillsbury bakery products, Green Giant vegetables, Pizza and Haagen-Dazs ice cream.

To help boost Pillsbury's core baking businesses, Grand Met launched a $30 million ad campaign featuring the Pillsbury Doughboy, who was newly energized courtesy of state-of-the-art animation. The campaign, representing the company's first multi-product coordinated effort in six years, was orchestrated by Leo Burnett USA. Unleashed in the third quarter 1989, it featured refrigerated dough products, quick bread mixes and cake mixes.

Green Giant doubled its ad budget to $15 million during 1989, and has targeted an additional increase in spending to $20 million for fiscal year 1991, which begins Oct. 1, 1990, according to division President Gary Klingl.

Grand Met's drinks sector, International Distillers & Vintners, accounted for seven of the top 34 selling alcoholic beverages in the country. Its leader is the No. 2 liquor brand—Smirnoff vodka—a Heublein product. With 7.8 million case depleted, it is just slightly behind top-selling Bacardi rum with 8 million cases depleted, according to figures compiled by John C. Maxwell Jr., Wheat, First Securities analyst. Total measured spending on Smirnoff, the top-selling vodka in the $3 billion category, climbed by 79% to $10.7 million.

As a group, International Distillers & Vintners is the country's leading liquor marketer, though Seagram Co. has the largest individual company share with 14%. Heublein is second with 13.8% while Carillon is eleventh with a 2.2% share. Measured spending by IDV operating companies, Paddington, Carillon and Heublein, increased by 1.2% to $67.3 million.

Mid-1990, Heublein, citing a desire for "a new strategic direction for the brands as the beverage alcohol business becomes increasingly competitive," severed ties with longtime agency Young & Rubicam. It awarded its account to Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, San Francisco.

While solidifying its position in key market segments, Grand Met also has moved to improve its cash position by streamlining some of its holdings in softening markets.

In mid-1989, it sold Pillsbury's Bumble Bee Seafoods and Van de Kamp's Frozen Foods, which company officials did not see as being a key strategic fit with other Pillsbury operations. Earlier this year it disposed its All Brand Importers, which markets Foster's Lager, Moosehead and Dos Equis, to Guinness Import Co. The brands had been hurt by declines in the $3.5 billion imported beer market.

Alpo Petfoods, long part of Grand Met's U.S. properties, spent heavily in advertising to launch Alpo's venture into cat food late last year. The company moved into both canned and dry cat food with licensed cartoon character Garfield as presenter. Alpo Premium (canned) and Alpo Gourmet Dinner (dry) claimed sales of $17.7 million and $7.4 million, respectively, representing about 1% of the $2.4 billion cat food market, according to Mr. Maxwell.

The move into cat food by Alpo put it into a faster-growing pet category than dog food, which grew only 3.8% to $3.63 billion in 1989, although volume levels declined. Cat food increased 6.4% in dollars.

Alpo canned dog food held off a strong surge by Kal Kan Pedigree to claim top spot in that $1.06 billion segment with sales of $273.5 million, up 4.2%, for a market share of 25.9%, slightly down from 26.5% in 1988. Pedigree moved up from a 22% to a 24.5% share. Alpo was backed by $15.2 million in media advertising, down 19.6%. Kal Kan Pedigree spending was $16.3 million.

Hallmark Cards' continued success i an otherwise flat industry appears t come from its blend of conservative yo aggressive card playing.

Despite maturity in the industry, th privately-held greeting card marketer has made consistent gains through acqui sitions, new products and creative mar keting tactics.

Hallmark's share of the $5.5 billio greeting card market is believed to hav increased to 44% in 1990 from 40% th previous year, a feat considering overa stagnation in the industry.

The company's relationship with Le Burnett USA, Chicago, appears to be contributing factor in the card marketer success. Burnett won Hallmark's accoun in late 1988.

In 1989 Hallmark launched a Hallow een campaign targeting adults for th first time with TV spots. The "Spook Sounds" campaign included a tape o "spooky" TV series theme songs ("Th Addams Family" and "The Munsters, etc.) in a purchase-with-purchase offer.

Most of its special purchase program are supported by TV and print cam paigns, with additional creative fro agency: Valentine-Radford, Kansas City. The 13.4% growth in network TV spending in 1989 reflects this added marketing dimension. Hallmark's national emphasis for its advertising proved a boon to syndicated TV and network radio spending as well.

In a departure from traditional new offerings—new card lines within an existing line—Hallmark is testing expansion into other types of products. Fresh floral arrangements called Hallmark Flowers and priced between $4.50 and $35 were tested this year. Another test includes a 200-card line that allows customers to personalize messages via a touch-screen computer in the store called Personalize It! For a $3 fee, messages are laser-printed onto cards.

Gift of Choice is another venture in test in which customers select one of eight themed catalogs displayed in-store that is sent to their recipient who then chooses one gift that arrives via United Parcel Service.

Hallmark's To Kids With Love line launched in 1989 has not proved highly successful, but the new lines of nonoccasion cards hold promise. Late last year Hallmark brought out another nonoccasion line titled "Just How I Feel."

Retailers haven't lost faith in magazines

Single-issue advertisers, McDonald's and Sears, Roebuck & Co., proved some magazines were still a hot commodity when McDonald's became sole advertiser (32 ad pages) in a special issue of Life magazine published this May celebrating "The World of Children."

The issue was a photographic montage of the world as seen on Oct. 25, 1989.

Sears will be exclusive advertiser in an October issue of Time devoted to the changing role of women.

Hallmark's Peanuts and Garfield licenses continue to rank among its best-selling cards and its Keepsake Christmas ornaments are a growing staple.

In 1990 Hallmark also boosted its religious cards line by 33% under both the Hallmark and its smaller Ambassador brand, sold mainly through supermarkets.

The company has found new ways to promote existing lines. This summer when card sales were low, Hallmark broke a nationwide promotion for its humorous Shoebox line, supported by print ads in major magazines.

Hallmark for the first time attached actual greeting card envelopes to its print ads, which were redeemable for a free greeting card at its outlets.

Hallmark made another significant move in 1990 when it acquired Petaluma, Calif.-based Willitts Designs, a smaller card and gift-marketing company. Willitts' products include homespun card designs and collectible gift items.

Hasbro Inc. continues to reign as the leading U.S. toy marketer, but generating profits has become difficult in an increasingly competitive market.

The company's intensifying problems were underscored by a sudden management shakeup in late 1990 in which Alfred Verrecchia was promoted to COO of domestic toy operations overseeing all Hasbro divisions. The divisions had been managed by separate presidents.

On the heels of his promotion, Stephen Schwartz, then president of Hasbro's Playskool division, resigned and was replaced by Dan Owen, previously a Playskool senior VP.

In general Hasbro's sales slowed considerably last year, due to the continued pressure of competition from the thriving videogame segment. The toy industry as a whole continues to hover at approximately $13 billion with between $3 billion and $3.5 billion generated by videogames.

Another cause of Hasbro's recent misfortunes is the raging success of the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles action figures from Playmates Inc. Booming sales of the pizza-eating, sewer-dwelling turtles have cut deeply into Hasbro's action figure business, including the staple G.I. Joe and WWF Wrestling figures. Thinning sales this year also forced the company to shelve an entire line of new action figures called Tribes.

Tyco Toys also has become a formidable competitor. Tyco's Oopsie-Daisy doll was the surprise hit of Christmas 1989, when Hasbro was foundering with the Cabbage Patch doll line it bought from bankrupt Coleco Industries. Hasbro has since come back with Baby Uh-Oh and Baby Eat 'n Grow.

Overall Hasbro offered fewer new products in 1989 and 1990 and as a result its spot TV budget was reduced by nearly $20 million. The company continues to support each new line with network and spot TV campaigns ranging between $1 million and $7 million for its Hasbro toys and Milton Bradley games. Playskool directs network and spot TV mostly at parents, with print ads in consumer magazines.

Despite industry hardships, Hasbro nonetheless remains the No. 1 toy marketer.

Playskool currently offers the greatest growth opportunities because sales of preschool and infant toys, its domain, have continued to be brisk. Playskool's sales of Dolly Surprise continue to be strong, along with other preschool items like its Busy Beads, Playskool Express train and Playskool indoor/outdoor rideons.

The preschool division pulled sales from competitor Fisher-Price, beset with marketing errors in 1989 such as investing in new products targeting the fickle preteen market.

Mattel Inc.'s line of Disney preschool toys competed directly with Playskool's Sesame Street preschool line. Mattel and Preschool each claim approximately 25% of the infant and preschool toy market.

Milton Bradley has added no major hits to its staple items: Scrabble, Candy Land, Chutes and Ladders and Twisters, which produce steady but unspectacular sales. Newer entries, Shark Attack! and Mickey Mouse Yahtzee, have added only modest increases to sales.

Milton Bradley benefits from its Nintendo videogame license, marketing a few new software titles each year.

for Heinz products increased by 7.5% over last year, while advertising remained at the same level.

The Weight Watchers franchise, which was acquired by Heinz over 10 years ago, has become a $1.6 billion business with a revamped sales pitch to focus on a health image, not just a diet one. Nearly $62 million was directed into measured media support for the line in 1989, up 30.8% over 1988 levels, which were 54% more than in 1987. The company plans to triple the unit's size by the mid-1990s.

New products include breakfasts, desserts and condiments. Cocktail snacks and cookies are in the works. Weight Watchers' frozen entrees received $14 million in media support, down 6.7% from 1988.

In the total general frozen entree category, valued at $3.2 billion, Heinz gained a 10.5% share of market, up from 9.9% a year earlier, placing it No. 4 after ConAgra's various brands (Banquet, Morton, Chun King) at 14.3% (same in '88), Stouffer's red box line with 12.2% (down from 12.8%) and Lean Cuisine 11.7% (up from 11.25%) and Kraft General Foods' 11.6% (up from 11.1%).

Four new dinner entrees were introduced by Weight Watchers, while frozen breakfast entrees, a 13-item line of microwaveable breakfasts that includes pancakes and french toast, was introduced nationally in August.

In the $1.5 billion frozen novelty market, the Weight Watcher unit gained a 7.8% share, placing second to Popsicle Brand, category leader at 9.4%, according to Arbitron/SAMI. Weight Watchers launched two frozen novelty treats—Toffee Crunch Bars, with 120 calories per serving, and a NutraSweet reformulation of Orange Vanilla Treat. Its frozen novelties drew $13.7 million in measured support, up 20.2%.

Heinz ketchup, the company's flagship brand, will debut a new recyclable plastic bottle early next year. What goes into Heinz ketchup also is undergoing scrutiny as the company's agriculture researchers attempt to reduce pesticide use by breeding natural resistance into its tomato varieties.

Heinz ketchup holds over 50% of the market, followed by Hunt's with 23%, and Del Monte, 11%. Media support for Heinz ketchup dropped 22% in 1989 to $16 million, most of it in network TV.

Heinz 57 Sauce received nearly $8 million in measured media, up 12.7%. A new network TV campaign, backed by national print, was themed: "Ketchup with a kick." TV ads utilized the Cole Porter song, "I Get a Kick Out of You." A line extension to the Heinz sauces, Heinz Select Barbecue Sauce, was introduced in May.

Responding to heightened public perception about the environment, health and animal rights, Heinz's StarKist Seafood Co. adopted a worldwide "dolphin safe" policy touted in network TV spots. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, the StarKist agency, produced the commercial in less than 72 hours to air on the CBS special, "Dolphins, Whales and Us." Competitor Bumble Bee Tuna followed suit.

A hickory-smoked-flavor version joined the traditional 6.5-oz. standard can and Prime Catch, the year-old brand of light tuna from StarKist.

Heinz pet products also will carry the "dolphin safe" labels beginning this fall.

Heinz's share of the cat food market grew from 17.6% two years ago to its present 24.8% level. Heinz's 9-Lives, which drew $8.9 million in media in 1989, down 23.3% from 1988, led the canned cat food segment with 18% of retail sales by mid-1990. Competitor Carnation Co.'s Friskies Buffet followed at 17%, and Mars Inc.'s Kal Kan at 15%.

Heinz's Amore brand amassed a 3.5% share while its Kozy Kitten product garnered 1.6% of market. New product 9-Lives Kitten Dinners' share totaled 0.7%. Lean Entrees, a new product from 9-Lives, rolled out nationally this August. Canned cat food is a $1.1 billion market, while dry cat food totals $876 million, according to Arbitron/SAMI.

In dry cat foods, H.J. Heinz Co.'s Kozy Kitten brand, which only went national in 1990, took the No. 3 spot in 1989, with a 10.2% share. Ralston Purina commanded a 48%-49% share, and Carnation Co.'s Friskies Pet Care, 16%.

Heinz canned dog food lines, led by Reward, Skippy Premium and Recipe, amassed a 13% share of market. A naturally smoked variety of Skippy Premium was introduced this spring.

Heinz's Meaty Bone tied with Nabisco's Milk Bone for top-selling dog biscuit with a 13% share, followed by Purina Biscuits' 11% in the $250 million biscuit segment of the dog snacks market. Meaty received $2.7 million in media backing, the same as in 1988.

Annual review

Hershey Foods Corp. continued to consolidate its position as the country's leading confectioner by introducing new confectionery items with an upscale, adult appeal and leveraging its brand identity through line extensions and diversification into new categories. Hershey used an acquisition to solidify its No. 2 market share of dry pasta.

Targeting the sweet tooths of aging baby-boomers, Hershey heavily promoted its new line of adult-oriented candy bars, including Fifth Avenue ($8.1 million in media spending, up 81%, according to LNA/Arbitron); Bar None ($7.4 million, up 13%); and Symphony ($4.1 million in its introductory year). Another "grown-up" candy, RSVP, a European-style chocolate bar with caramel and chocolate creme centers, was introduced to test markets in California in early 1990.

Hershey's first attempt to capitalize on its chocolate heritage while moving into new product categories was the rollout this spring of Hershey's Chocolate Bar Flavor Puddings. The four-flavor line of refrigerated products, supported with an estimated $13 million national ad budget, takes direct aim at Jell-O refrigerated puddings, the current category leader with an estimated 55% share of the $200 million market. Beatrice/Hunt Wesson's Swiss Miss is second at 30%; regional brands share the remainder.

Hershey sought to increase its share of the baking chocolate and bits category with the rollout of a line extension that includes Hershey's Chocolate Chunks, Hershey's Vanilla Chips, Hershey's Premium Baking Bar and Hershey's European-style cocoa. The introduction was supported with couponing and FSIs.

Hershey currently holds about 15% of the $376 million category with its cocoa powder, baking bar and Reese's products, good for third place behind Nestle Foods Corp.'s Toll House morsels brand with 51% and General Foods USA's Baker's with 16%.

Because of the market share boost from the acquisition of the U.S. confectionery business of Cadbury Schweppes in 1989, Hershey's share of the $1.7 billion market for confectionery products sold through supermarkets rose to 36%, ahead of rival M&M/Mars' 30%, according to Infoscan figures for November 1989. Other key players include Suchard with 10%; Nestle, 7%; and Nabisco, 5%.

The February 1990 acquisition of Ronzoni pasta from Kraft General Foods for $80 million added 9.2% to Hershey's existing 17.9% market share. With 27.1% of the dry pasta market, Hershey now challenges market leader Borden, which holds 31.3% of market, estimated to be worth $1.16 billion at the retail level in 1988, the last year for which figures were available from the National Pasta Assn. Hershey also intends to increase its share of the pasta market with new products in development and test marketing including Pasta Perfection, a four-item line of microwaveable pastas now in midwestern test markets.

Measured ad spending for Hershey's pasta brands before the Ronzoni acquisition dropped 9.8% from 1988 levels to $2 million. Because the pasta market is region-oriented, much of promotional spending is in unmeasured media, such as couponing and in-store promotions.

During 1989, Hershey consolidated its manufacturing operations to achieve economies. Resultant savings were used to pump up ad and promo expenditures, which in 1989 equaled 15.9% of sales, or $377 million worldwide, divided between advertising at $121 million and promotion at $256 million. Total ad and promotional spending in 1988 was $329 million.

Annual review

American Honda Motor Co., subsidiary of Honda Motor Co. Ltd., Tokyo, again led Japanese automakers in U.S. car sales, but plant expansion and costs for the "Americanization" of Honda products proved a drain on profits.

U.S. sales of Honda in 1989 were 783,102 cars (no trucks), including 142,061 of luxury Acura models and 389,472 U.S.-built Accord and Civic cars, up 1.8%. This represented a 5.3% share of the total U.S. car/truck market for 1989.

Honda's Accord, selling a total of 362,707 imported and U.S.-built sedans and coupes, became the first foreign car ever to become the top-seller in the U.S. It dethroned Ford Taurus, No. 2 at 348,061.

Measured media expenditures for 1989 show the popular Accord models, which fell from $12.345 to $16.595, drew $45 million in measured spending, 73% in network and spot TV and 27% in print, mostly magazines.

Three Accord TV spots that broke in October carried the "You have to drive it to believe it" theme, showing the redesigned and performance-oriented cars in an art gallery and on a tropical island among several settings. The spots introduced an element of disbelief that generated consumer interest.

Accord's market leadership was challenged this spring in a new ad campaign by Chrysler Corp. with Chairman Lee Iacocca as presenter. Chrysler claimed that consumers it tested prefered Chrysler models to Honda Civic and Honda Accord. Honda did not respond to the ads. Company officials merely noted that Accord is a benchmark car that invites comparison with others.

The Acura line of luxury autos took the major portion of Honda's 1989 ad budget once again. Measured media figures show Acura with total expenditures of $86 million, up 34%. The product-specific portion is evenly split between the top-of-the-line Legend, priced at $24,760-$30,690, and the lower-priced Integra ($12,850-$15,950).

TV and print for the 1990 models, budgeted at an estimated $100 million, opted for a softer look instead of racy driving footage and mention of Acura's speed and power concepts that dominated earlier ads.

Acura heavily promoted its customer-satisfaction (CSI) rating as judged by J.D. Power & Associates, devoting a fifth of its Acura media budget to the issue.

Hispanic advertising of Honda cars first appeared on national Spanish-language TV early this year, making Honda the second import carmaker to talk directly to the 24 million Hispanics in the U.S. Toyota was first back in 1988, and Nissan began a regional effort about the same time.

After staying off the incentive bandwagon for several months, Honda placed factory-to-dealer incentives on 1990 Civic, CRX and Prelude models earlier this year. Through June 30, Honda dealers earned $300 to $600 in incentives on sales of Civic wagons and stationwagons and CRX and Prelude models.

Honda still holds a precarious lead in the shrinking motorcycle market, closing out 1989 with a 29.3% share, down from 40.7%. Yamaha is close at hand at 26.2%, up from 21.5%.

Honda motorcycles accounted for nearly $6 million in measured media expenditures in 1989. Much of the outlay was for a continuation of the generic "Come ride with us" promotion. Product-specific advertising focused on the Cub, a new two-wheel, 90cc off-road bike, a user-friendly entry level vehicle designed for young riders.

American Honda's operations are located in Ohio and include an assembly plant for Civics in East Liberty (opened in April), an Accord plant at Marysville, an engine plant at Anna and motorcycle production. An Acura assembly plant to be located somewhere in this country is planned.

About 75% of Hondas made in the U.S. are now made with U.S.-produced parts. Honda's plan is to make its divisions worldwide as self-reliant as the one in the U.S.

Annual review

Hyundai Motor America, having endured a sobering 30.6% plunge in sales in 1989, is facing a comparable shortfall this year, but a retooled marketing strategy and a sporty new coupe called Scoupe promise better days in 1991.

Hyundai Motor, the U.S. sales arm and largest subsidiary of South Korea's Hyundai Group, became the leading supplier of low-priced cars in the U.S. just two years after introducing the Excel (priced at $4,995) in February 1986. Excel sold 263,610 units in 1987, more than any other subcompact import.

Following a slight advance in 1988 sales to 264,282, Hyundai tumbled to 183,261 last year, a plunge variously attributed to a softness in the small-car segment, poorly focused image and dilution of advertising and just plain bad marketing.

The introduction of a second model in late 1988, the $12,000 Sonata, put Hyundai in the mid-priced and mid-sized car market, but the company's advertising and promotion lacked any effort to redefine itself properly as a multi-product car maker moving upscale, not just a low-priced, low-end entry.

With the sales dive last year came resignations and changes in the corporate personnel, staff cuts and restructuring of U.S. operations. New management implemented a sales strategy including: boosting dealer profits with higher rebates on cars that carry more options; creating incentives to limit turnover on dealer staffs; placing a new finance company in national operation by mid-June; and backing its marketing with a new ad pitch: "World Class Value," to emphasize value over price.

Speculation has been that the Hyundai ad account held by Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide, Irvine, Calif., might be in jeopardy. Hyundai ad executives have firmly denied such talk.

News that the Korean-made Hyundai finished last in the latest J.D. Power & Associates "initial quality" ranking of 29 car divisions brought more changes. In mid-June, Hyundai created a new entity, the Consumer Market Development department, aimed at increasing customer satisfaction.

Pre-intro feedback of consumer comments on the new two-door Scoupe, shown early this year in auto shows, hold the promise of a breakthrough car. Said to be priced at under $8,500, the 1.5-liter, 4-cylinder car is positioned against the Ford Escort, Geo Storm, Sentra sport coupe, Toyota Tercel, Mazda 323 and Honda CRX.

Earlier this year Hyundai dealers, who number 345 in 47 states, applauded the company's move to set up a captive finance company—Hyundai Motor Finance Co. of St. Louis—to provide retail car financing, a market many banks have abandoned.

Hyundai, which boosted its ad spending by 3.8% in 1989, accounted for a 1.2% share of the U.S. car/truck market in 1989, down from 2.5% the previous year.

Measured media for Excel in 1989 was $36.5 million, down 41.9%, according to LNA/Arbitron. Network and spot TV and magazines accounted for largest portion of the budget in both years. Emphasis in 1989 shifted to the Sonata, which climbed from $5 million in its introductory year in 1988 to $49 million.

AA's advertising estimates for Hyundai exclude $14.9 million spending by local dealers, but include the corporate co-op portion of $36.1 million spent by the Hyundai dealers association. Measured LNA/Arbitron figures place dealer association expenditures in spot TV and newspapers.

Annual review

From personal computers to minicomputers to mainframes, International Business Machines Corp. concentrated in 1989 on changing its marketing focus from hardware and software products to customer solutions.

Solutions was the byword in corporate advertising created by Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, beginning in April 1989 with a hard-hitting campaign featuring consumers discussing business-related computer problems. The campaign expanded in July 1990 to feature IBM's role in developing technology solutions for a variety of issues, including business, the handicapped and the environment.

IBM's measured spending for corporate advertising was down 4% in 1989 to $32 million, although the network TV portion increased 13% to $23 million.

In personal computers, IBM trimmed 1989 spending on PS/2 by 25% to $27 million, mostly from an $11 million cut in network TV. IBM also began shifting spending for PS/2 to magazines, boosting that medium's 1989 spending for PS/2 to $9.5 million, up 21%, according to LNA/-Arbitron.

Measured ad spending for IBM personal computers has declined each year since 1984, when IBM and Apple Computer slugged it out with record spending levels.

IBM held a 31.5% revenue share of $8.6 billion in 1989 U.S. sales of personal computers through retail outlets, compared with 25.5% for Compaq Computer Corp. and 12% for Apple. IBM maintained a 31.7% share of $4.15 billion in U.S. retail sales for the first six months of 1990, on unit sales that were steadily rising, according to Joe Ann Stahel, president of Dallas-based Storeboard/Computer Intelligence, a market research company specializing in computer retail sales.

In the $35.1 billion (10.8 million units) U.S. personal computers market, IBM overtook Apple in the top spot in 1989, with a 14% unit share, up from 12.4% in 1988, versus Apple's 10.7%, down from 12.8%, according to Dataquest, a San Jose-based division of Dun & Bradstreet.

PS/2 received a boost in 1989 from the introductions of more powerful models and from the release in early 1990 of Microsoft Windows 3.0 software, which lets IBM-compatibles mimic Macintosh's popular graphics features.

In addition, IBM shifted spending to focus more on personal computing solutions via peripherals and software. IBM funneled media spending of $5.8 million into IBM printers (from only $105,000 in 1988), divided 68% magazine and 32% network TV. IBM software backing grew from only $688,000 to $3.7 million, 92% of it in magazines.

In June 1990, IBM threw down the gauntlet with the introduction of Personal System/1 (PS/1). Priced from $999 to $1,999, PS/1 is IBM's first computer targeted at home users since PC Jr., which was discontinued in 1985.

The intro puts IBM face-to-face with Tandy Corp., which in July 1990 introduced the Tandy 1000 RL, targeting the same market with a price tag of $750 to $1,300. Apple Computer is rumored to be planning an October launch of a $1,000 to $1,500 Macintosh.

Analysts are as skeptical about IBM's chances for success this time around in home computers as they were with PC Jr. due to a relative lack of applications software. "There is a Catch 22 for PS/1: to encourage software developers, IBM needs to generate unit volume, but to generate volume IBM needs software applications," says Sanjiv Hingorani, VP-stock market research at Salomon Brothers, New York.

Analysts are more positive about IBM's chances in mid-range systems, such as the AS/400 family. Since its introduction in 1988, the AS/400 has been an unexpected surprise for IBM, contributing about $13 billion a year in revenue and $1 billion in profits.

Measured spending for AS/400 computers fell 60% in 1989 to $5 million as post-intro spending virtually eliminated from its media mix network TV, which had claimed spending of $6.4 million in

■ Annual review
ITT Corp., a conglomerate that includes Hartford Insurance and the Sheraton hotel chain, continued to spend heavily in business-to-business press for its nine companies, as advertising rose 5% to $135 million.

Spending continues at that level in 1990, according to Steven Erenburg, director of corporate communications, indicating the insurance, automotive, electronic and fluid technology divisions continue to spend significant ad dollars in trade and other unmeasured publications.

The company from year-to-year shifts corporate advertising, which is sometimes linked with division advertising, from network to spot TV and back, said Mr. Erenburg, indicating network TV, cut in 1989, is back with emphasis in 1990.

"Basically, our buying is based on efficiencies and opportunities including special events," he said. The amount of spot TV depends on what is available in the markets ITT wants to reach and the amount of ad money available, Mr. Erenburg said.

Network spending dropped 54.8% for all ITT spending in 1989. ITT's corporate ad expenditures, which remained at $7 million in media, also borrowed from network TV (down 42%) and gave it to spot TV, up from virtually nothing to $3.3 million.

The Sheraton chain continued to spend about $18 million in media, the same as in 1988. Sheraton dropped off of network TV in 1989, having spent $3.7 million in the medium in 1988. It picked up most of the slack in network radio, up from $170,000 in 1988 to $1.3 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Nature and Mideast political upheaval have caused problems for both Hartford and Sheraton. Payments to victims of Hurricane Hugo and the California earthquake made the 1989 financial picture for Hartford "worse than it would have been," said Mr. Erenburg. They contributed to a 26% drop in earnings for the division in 1989.

Casualty and property continue to be the Hartford's biggest categories, though financial services continues to gain ground.

Hartford was backed with $6.3 million in U.S. media advertising, slightly down from 1988. Network TV dropped from half the expenditure in 1988 to a third as cable TV, a medium not used in 1988, drew $1.3 million.

Iraqi troops took over the Sheraton upon entering Kuwait, probably because of its strategic location—it looks down on the U.S. embassy compound. It showed up on U.S. TV being used as a heliport by the occupying forces, said Mr. Erenburg. Though two-thirds of the chain's 460 hotels are in the U.S., Sheraton is the No. 1 chain in the Mideast.

The first of three Sheratons in the Soviet Union, a 450-room Moscow hotel, will open in 1992 as part of a joint Sheraton-Soviet venture. And New York's Sheraton Centre Hotel and Towers will serve as headquarters for the Democratic National Convention in 1992.

ITT has slimmed down dramatically in recent years, selling off divisions to become more focused and profitable. At midyear 1990, CEO Rand Araskog said, "Despite the difficult economic environment in the United States, ITT's overall results for the second quarter were well ahead of our earlier expectations."

■ Annual review
Johnson & Johnson, which consolidated a number of its diverse consumer product operations in 1989 as part of cost-cutting measures, introduced 15 OTC products supported with strong media spending that pushed overall media expenditures slightly above prior-year levels.

The reorganization of the consumer products group did little to improve its sales performance as U.S. sales advanced only 2.6% largely because of soft sales of health and beauty aids. By contrast, J&J's U.S. pharmaceutical operations advanced 14%, a trend that continues into the first half of 1990. There is even greater disparity in operating income. Some analysts think the future story of J&J lies in its OTC products.

The joint venture, Merck-Johnson & Johnson Consumer Pharmaceuticals, was created in 1989 to market Merck drugs as OTC conversions, the first of which will be Pepcid anti-ulcer. Glaxo and Sandoz are developing a competitor, an OTC version of Zantac, an ethical drug that does $2 billion in sales annually.

The new venture also has U.S. rights to Mylanta antacids and Mylicon anti-gas products and others valued at $125 million in sales with its acquisition of the OTC drug business of ICI Americas.

Tylenol is holding steady with approximately one-third of the $2 billion general pain-relief market. American Home Products is No. 2 at 18%. Ad dollars rose 21.4% to $97 million in 1989 to support the Tylenol line. Tylenol Adult Cold Medication budget tripled to $9.2 million; Gelcaps dollars were boosted 66% to $26 million. Regular Strength Pain Reliever was off 11.6% to $35 million. Tylenol Allergy Sinus was introduced into the allergy market, receiving $2.6 million in new monies.

J&J last year reintroduced Children's CoTylenol as Children's Tylenol Cold with $1.6 million in ad dollars. J&J introduced Pediacare Nightrest for children via Cadwell Davis Partners.

Medipren's $30 million ad support for 1988 was slashed to $6.6 million in 1989. The ibuprofen has only been able to take 2% of the domestic analgesics market compared with AHP's fellow ibuprofen, Advil, at 10%. McNeil Consumer launched its first prescription product, Pediaprofen, an ibuprofen for children.

Two-year-old Imodium A-D, an OTC version of ethical drug Imodium, holds 25% of the antidiarrheal market behind Upjohn's Kaopectate's 45% share. Imodium A-D Liquid received $16 million in ad support in 1989; a new caplets extension has been approved by the FDA.

J&J and Kimberly-Clark Corp. are expected to spend $15 million each on new campaigns for relaunches of their Stayfree and New Freedom lines, respectively. J&J with its multiple products in the $1.1 billion sanitary protection segment, leads with a 32% share, down from 37% in 1988, followed by Kimberly-Clark at 27.7% (Freedom, 9.4% and Kotex, 18.3%) and P&G, 26% for brand leader Always.

J&J's Stayfree, which introduced a new pad with baking soda, has 17% of market and Sure & Natural, 7%. Stayfree received $1.3 million in new ad monies and Sure & Natural got $6 million in new support. Other brands are Modess, Carefree and Serenity. U.S. media spending for its o.b. tampon remained at $3.7 million in 1989 as the brand received a $50 million launch in Europe.

With 65% of the $260 million adhesive bandage market, J&J is facing off against Curad for the kid business with its new Band-Aids featuring Sesame Street characters. Curad's Happy Strips display McDonald's characters and are used in a cross-promotion with the food chain's Happy Meals for Kids. Curad, which holds about 27% of the market, hopes to gain another five points.

Other kid products include Dental Floss for Kids and age-specific Sesame Street kids vitamin line that will compete in the $163 million children's vitamin market. Miles Inc. has the first- and second ranked kids vitamins in Flintstones (26% share) and Bugs Bunny (10%).

The company acquired Piz Buin sun protection products from Greiter AG and introduced it last year in the U.S. with $2.2 million in media.

J&J's Ortho division was not that active in 1989 but in 1990 has launched with good results its hepatitis C test. Also, Ortho-Cyclen, the new birth control pill developed by J&J, is on hold due to a patent fight with American Home Products.

The company also is fighting a royalties lawsuit over its Retin-A, now sold only as a topical acne treatment. DDB Needham is developing consumer ads positioning the anti-acne prescription drug as an anti-wrinkle cream for sun-damaged skin. J&J has filed a new drug application for this treatment wrinkle. Medicis Pharmaceutical Corp. has obtained a license to market a generic form of Retin-A, which analysts said could mean a substantial loss of market share for J&J.

McCann-Erickson is preparing a campaign to launch Monistat as an OTC product. The ethical drug, used for the treatment of yeast infection, awaits approval from the FDA.

The internal lines within the consumer group got reconnected when J&J combined under the name, J&J Consumer Products, its baby products unit, J&J Health Care Co., which markets Band-Aids, and J&J Dental Care Co., which handles toothbrushes and dental floss. The operation had sales of $650 million.

Japanese business success is driven by well-managed industrial giants investing in R&D and operating hundreds of their own factories with thousands of workers.

RIGHT? WRONG!

Armies of subcontractors supply 90% of the product and R&D to the few top Japanese manufacturers. Americans can capitalize on this system and skilled labor force, too.

(As reported in BUSINESS TOKYO)

Most American business publications cover one side of the story.

So American executives who need to distinguish facts from fiction about doing business with Japan get their news from BUSINESS TOKYO.

BUSINESS TOKYO is unique. It's the only independent magazine that reports how Japan really works to Americans who want to profit in the Japanese marketplace.

Annual review

S.C. Johnson & Son in 1989 turned its marketing attention overseas, especially in East Europe, where by mid-1990 it had inked agreements with Soviet producers to make such brands as Raid insecticide and Pledge furniture polish for distribution in Eastern Europe and the U.S.S.R.

Like many in the package-goods industry, Johnson intends to strengthen market share by distributing more U.S. products overseas, as well as bringing successful international products to the U.S.

The company, for example, is testing Tahiti Shower Gel based on a product the company sells in Europe. Glade Plug-Ins, which rolled national in mid-1990, are based on technology developed by its French subsidiary.

Johnson's Pledge furniture polish/-dusting aid led the homecare division in measured media with $12.4 million, up 39% from 1988. Pledge commands an estimated 40% of the $150 million (manufacturers' level) furniture polish category. The company, known informally as Johnson Wax, extended the Pledge line with the national launch of Pledge Wood Moisturizer Lemon Oil, while continuing its Arizona test of Pledge Dusters, a cleaning cloth containing Pledge.

Between Future and Brite, the No. 2 and No. 3 brands, respectively, Johnson holds an estimated 60% share of the $100 million (manufacturers' level) floorcare category. Measured support behind Future climbed to $5.77 million from $1.6 million in 1988, while support for Brite increased 53% to $5.4 million.

Media support for Glade, Johnson's air freshener line, ballooned to $13.8 million from only $2.8 million in 1988. Johnson also backed the national launch late last year of Glade Potpourri room and carpet deodorizer with $2.5 million. Johnson this April began testing Glade Country Pottery, a 30-day air freshener packaged in handmade pottery.

All the new Glade entries boosted Glade's share of the $300 million air freshener category to 33.3% in mid-1990 from 24.8% in fall 1988, giving it category leadership over Renuzit from Drackett and Airwick and Wizard from Reckitt & Colman.

Johnson supported Raid, now in the second year of its Raid Max introduction, with $13.9 million, down 7.4%. Raid commands more than 48% of the $500 million insecticide business, leading Combat's 22%. Johnson anticipates greater competition in 1991 now that Combat has been sold by American Cyanamid to Clorox Co.

In April 1990, Johnson voluntarily recalled Deep Woods Off! insecticide after tests identified a chemical ingredient known as R-11 that caused benign reproductive problems and tumors in laboratory mice and rats. Johnson ran a one-time national newspaper ad and placed red stickers on containers saying the product had been reformulated. Johnson's share of the estimated $55 million insect-repellent market is more than 50%; Miles Inc.'s Cutter is second at 30%.

In the $4.5 billion haircare market, Johnson held onto a 3.6% share of the $1.45 billion shampoo segment with Halsa and Agree, while its share of the $670 million conditioner segment slipped to 5% from 5.2% (supermarket sales only), according to Diana Temple, analyst at Salomon Bros.

Johnson in May 1990 relaunched Halsa, an eight-item shampoo and conditioner line, with a European-flavored $10 million network and cable TV, magazine and POP campaign, the first from new agency Foote, Cone & Belding, San Francisco.

Separately, Johnson in early 1990 broke a $2 million spot TV campaign for Agree shampoo and conditioner. Agree in 1989 accounted for 1.7% of shampoo sales, while the companion conditioner held a 2.6% dollar share. Both were down 0.1 share point from 1988, according to Ms. Temple.

Johnson introduced nationally in May a Fisher-Price hair and skincare line for babies and infants. Products are packaged in recyclable plastic containers shaped like Fisher-Price's "Little People" toy line. While Johnson & Johnson owns more than 75% of the $600 million children's toiletries market, S.C. Johnson will stick to the $150 million bathcare segment.

In December 1989, Johnson broke a new commercial for Edge Shave Gel. The $150 million shaving preparation category has become more competitive now that Johnson's patent for Edge has expired. But Edge remained No. 1 with a 24.9% share. Johnson supported Edge with $1.4 million in measured media, and an additional $1.3 million for Edge Soothing After Shave with Aloe, the first non-alcohol after-shave product.

Johnson now is the fourth-ranked hand lotion marketer in the $840 million hand-and-body lotion category, with a 9.2% share for its Curel and Soft Sense brands, down from 10.2% in 1988. Curel in 1989 received $2.3 million in measured media, down 6.25%, while Soft Sense got virtually no media support.

In December 1989, Johnson elected Richard M. Carpenter, 62, president-CEO and a member of the board. Mr. Carpenter had been exec-VP of Worldwide Innochem, a Johnson subsidiary, since 1983, and its chief operating officer since December 1988. Mr. Carpenter succeeded Raymond Farley, 65, who retired.

Annual review

During the past 12 months, Kellogg Co. has been bowled over by management shakeups, hemorrhaging market share and lackluster product introductions.

Proud Kellogg watched its pound share of the $6.9 billion ready-to-eat cereal category slide to 38.2%, from 39.7%, for the year ended in May—and from more than 40% in early 1989. Much of the lost share went to No. 2 General Mills, whose share rose to 23.9% from 21.8%.

Kellogg has yet to begin turning things around. Preliminary reports from the summer indicated the corporate market share differential between it and archrival General Mills had narrowed to 11%.

Part of Kellogg's problem has been a string of mediocre or badly timed new products.

The company had the greatest hopes for Heartwise, a high-fiber cereal containing the cholesterol-fighting seed psyllium; when it announced Heartwise's launch last August, Kellogg planned to commit $45 million to first-year marketing.

After spending $8 million in the fourth quarter of 1989, Kellogg cut back its plans for Heartwise when the FDA raised questions about the propriety of using psyllium in cereal. The company said it remains committed to Heartwise, but seems to view it as a niche product now. Kellogg axed a high-fiber prune variety earlier this year; the remaining plain flakes variety has garnered less than a 1% share in its first year of national distribution.

Hoping to get an early jump on what seemed an emerging category for rice bran products, Kellogg introduced Kenmei Rice Bran in March. Although research studies were less enthusiastic about rice bran's cholesterol-reducing potential than marketers had hoped, Kenmei's two varieties have performed fairly well, chalking up a collective 0.8% share.

Still new to supermarket shelves is Bigg Mixx, a presweetened children's cereal that bowed in June. Kellogg is staking a $30 million introductory budget on its first new presweetened cereal in 15 years—and on its offbeat presenter, an animated character with a pig snout, chicken feet and moose antlers.

To support its new products, Kellogg increased media spending to $428 million in 1989, up 6.5%—a significantly slower rate of increase than in the past five years, when spending rose 15% to 25% annually. But not all those dollars paid off.

Gone from Kellogg's stable of cereals are S.W. Graham, Pro-Grain, Fruitful Bran and Nutrific Oatmeal Flakes—all introduced in the mid-1980s. The ill-fated S.W. Graham alone represented $13 million in media spending last year, but made it through only a year of national distribution before being discontinued.

Seeking to capitalize on the nation's oat bran craze, Kellogg spent a combined $45.7 million advertising Common Sense Oat Bran and Cracklin' Oat Bran in 1989. But when a January New England Journal of Medicine report took aim at oat bran's cholesterol-reducing claims, oat bran sales fell apart. The two cereals together now have only 1% of the market compared to nearly 3.5% a year ago.

Perhaps Kellogg's biggest challenge is reinvigorating its older, largest brands—Corn Flakes, Raisin Bran, Rice Krispies—which have seen market share eroding over the past decade. Corn Flakes is still the nation's leading cereal, with 4% of pound volume, but that's half the 8% it commanded in the early '70s.

To that end, Kellogg increased media spending on such established brands as Raisin Bran (up 1.5%, to $23.7 million), Corn Pops (up 11.2%, to $7.3 million) and Froot Loops (up 6.3%, to $9.1 million). Frosted Flakes remains the company's single most advertised brand, with media spending of $30.6 million last year.

Dissatisfied with the company's performance, Chairman-CEO William LaMothe and the Kellogg board of directors parted company with President-Chief Operating Officer Horst Schroeder, who abruptly resigned last September. Mr. LaMothe has assumed the president's title.

Then in July, William Weintraub, the company's lead marketing official, was bumped from exec VP-marketing and sales for the U.S. Food Products division to a post described as assistant to the chairman. Assuming Mr. Weintraub's title was Carlos Gutierrez, formerly president of Kellogg's Mexican and Canadian operations.

■ Annual review

In the past year K mart Corp.'s key strategies included cutting prices, launching a $4.5 billion, five-year program to modernize and refurbish its 2,200-plus stores and expanding its presence in low-cost, warehouse-style retailing with new acquisitions.

K mart, the nation's No. 2 retailer in total sales behind Sears, Roebuck & Co., cut prices on several thousand items in 1989 to match similar efforts at Sears and always low-priced Wal-Mart. The move hurt margins, contributing heavily to K mart's earnings decline.

In early 1990, K mart launched an aggressive modernization program to introduce wider aisles, more colorful displays and layouts of merchandise into six well-defined, dominant lifestyle departments. K mart advertising continued to focus on the lifestyle departments.

K mart, which decreased its media ad spending by $23 million in 1989, plans to cut another $10 million through 1990. It plans to scale back its in-house newspaper insert program in favor of increased network TV and national magazine advertising for this year.

Major spending cuts in 1989 affected its general promotion media dollars, down 59% to $11.9 million; women's apparel, off 33% to $9.8 million; and miscellaneous (non-categorized) retail, down 29% to $31 million. Increases came in home furnishings, up 6.5% to $30.8 million, and sports, toys and hobbies, up 23.8% to $23.4 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

To reassert the chain's low-price policy, K mart launched a corporate image network TV campaign in mid-December starring Chairman-CEO Joseph Antonini to reassert the chain's low-price policy. The spots broke on NBC during a K mart-sponsored Christmas special, a one-hour movie starring Kenny Rogers.

That TV movie along with a cable TV holiday special featuring K mart spokeswoman and lifestyle consultant Martha Stewart were K mart's first ventures into TV production. Both were produced by King World Productions, but K mart sponsored the shows, contributed to them creatively and was sole advertiser. Last year K mart set up Martha Stewart Productions to pursue other types of programming, including a possible network TV series, with Ms. Stewart.

This August K mart broke a network and cable TV and national print image campaign intended to attract younger, more affluent customers by positioning K mart as an exciting, trendy place to shop. More than 100 15-second spots, each highlighting a different nationally-branded product, will break throughout the rest of this year. Calet, Hirsch & Spector, New York, handled TV; sister agency Ross Roy Inc., Bloomfield Hills, Mich., handled print.

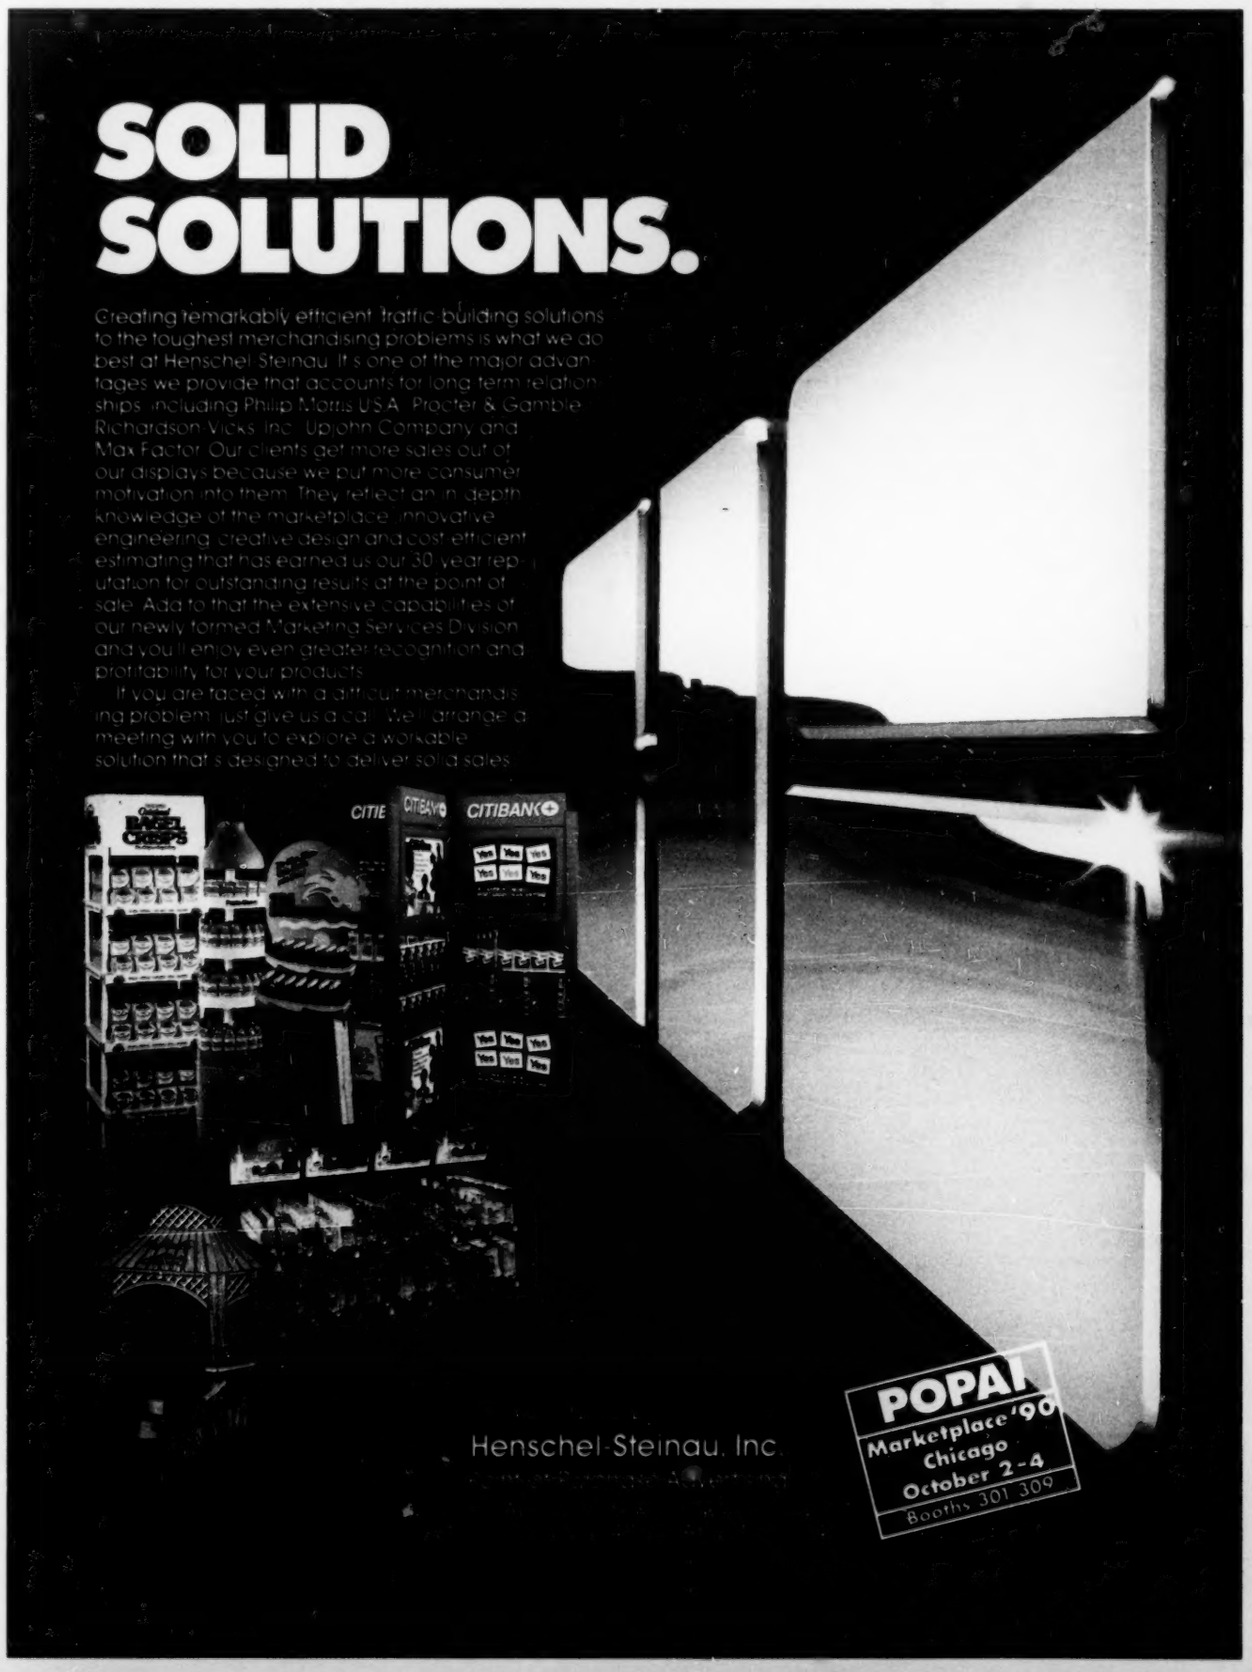
The campaign is part of K mart's "Partnership Marketing" program, developed last year by Ross Roy. The program unites the retailer with vendors in strategic yearlong marketing plans that are funded jointly by K mart and various manufacturers.

This month K mart kicked off its second "Get Ready Giveaway" sweepstakes with CBS-TV to promote CBS's fall TV schedule and to increase traffic in K mart stores.

K mart continues to look at new retail formats. It bought PACE Membership Warehouse last year and merged it with its nine Makro warehouse-style stores, acquired Sports Authority sports and fitness warehouse-style stores and converted its two Detroit-area Sports Giant stores into Sports Authority units. By yearend the chain will cover four states with 18 stores.

K mart is experimenting with "power" retail centers, shopping centers with two or more K mart subsidiaries, and in-store fast-food service—testing started this summer with Little Caesar's pizza.

Media spending levels at K mart's leading specialty retailers rose across the board: Waldenbooks, up 9.6% to $5.2



SOLID SOLUTIONS.
Creating remarkably efficient traffic building solutions to the toughest merchandising problems is what we do best at Henschel Steinau. It's one of the major advantages we provide that accounts for long term relationships including Philip Morris USA Procter & Gamble Richardson-Vicks Inc. Upjohn Company and Max Factor. Our clients get more sales out of our displays because we put more consumer motivation into them. They reflect an in depth knowledge of the marketplace, innovative engineering, creative design and cost efficient estimating that has earned us our 30 year reputation for outstanding results at the point of sale. Annual review
Still trying to right itself after a massive 1988 restructuring, Kroger Co. continued to trim its ad budget last year while selling off properties to help satisfy its massive debt load.

Kroger last year allocated $56.6 million to media advertising, down 14% from 1988 which, in turn, was down 22.5% from 1987. TV is handled by Campbell-Mithun-Esty, Chicago, which also offers concepts and format for newspaper advertising. ROP advertising is produced and placed autonomously via in-house or regional agencies in each of the 11 markets covering 24 states.

But with $5.1 billion in debt at the beginning of 1989, and an average interest rate of 13%, Kroger is focusing on maximizing cash flow by selling off particularly non-core properties.

Kroger ended 1989 with a store count of 1,234, down from 1,240 at the end of 1988. But the company still hopes to be able to finance growth, with its current plans calling for another 40 food stores by the end of 1992 as well as the remodeling of another 100.

The chain's financial headaches stem from fending off takeover bids in 1988 by the Haft family and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., the New York takeover specialist that succeeded in landing a bigger fish last year, RJR Nabisco.

Sold off in 1989 were Conroe Dairy, Conroe, Texas, to Borden; Gateway Bakery, St. Louis, to Alpha Baking Co., Chicago; Heartland Farms Dairy, St. Louis, to Schnuck Markets, Bridgeton, Mo. These helped reduce its debt to $4.7 billion this August.

Kroger remained competitive with pricing and progressive promotions. One of last year's big promotions was a four-color newspaper campaign featuring a single food product in each ad, accompanied by an eye-catching headline. For example, an enlarged picture of grapes bore the caption, "Amazing Grapes."

Testing is continuing on a program piloted in Tennessee in 1989 where Kroger contracted with Campbell Soup Co. to insert Campbell product coupons into in-store Automated Teller Machines. When machine customers withdrew cash from the in-store automated tellers, they also received dollar-sized coupons for Campbell products. Kroger remains mum about the program's success.

A three-week, co-op radio campaign supported this promotion and is part of the reason Kroger's spot radio media volume of $2.5 million rose 23% from 1988.

Time Saver Food Stores, a convenience store chain owned and operated by Kroger Co., was the only member in the Kroger family to boost ad spending for 1989. Time Saver's media spending grew to $298,300 from $82,400, with the entire amount allocated to spot TV.

Kroger Food Stores as a group received $42.2 million in media support last year, virtually all in either newspapers ($14.9 million) or spot TV ($26.5 million).

Annual review
Levi Strauss & Co. is betting its immediate future on Americans spurning zippers for buttons and adopting a more casual look in the workplace.

To stimulate a shrinking jeans market and protect its franchise, the company is attempting to equate loyalty (as in community/nation) with brand (Levi's) loyalty.

Levi Strauss altered its long-running campaign featuring 501 jeans first with an effort called "501 USA" which highlighted loyalty to local communities and relied on stream-of-consciousness dialogue instead of music.

It then unfurled a Spike Lee-directed ad campaign for 501's that are buttondowns, a highly popular feature in the West but one needing additional promotional help in the East.

The $20 million "Is your fly buttoned?" national campaign, a coordinated effort between Mr. Lee and Levi agency, Foote, Cone & Belding, has required tandem animated commercials in spot markets east of the Mississippi. In Pittsburgh, Washington, D.C., and Atlanta, the company is even offering a 30-day guarantee promotion.

National penetration of button-downs is important if Levi's are to remain No. 1 in the $6.6 billion jeans market. Levi's holds a 21.9% share of market, followed by three brands from VF Corp.—Lee (11% share), Rustler (8.8%) and Wrangler (6.3%).

Levi Strauss has been reaping the benefits of a buyback and other changes made four years ago when the Haas family took the company private. Its focus on jeans and sportswear lines has produced satisfying revenue streams. Costs have been held down, aided by plant closures that have eliminated 10,000 workers. It has been able to reduce its $1.6 billion debt to $475 million, with pay-off well ahead of schedule.

The Dockers line, now with sales of $250 million, has been a big contributor since the buyout. Its sales were only $1 million in 1986.

The company continues to face a shrinking jeans market which is not expected to turn around until the mid-1990s. Thomas Tusher, the company's new president, plans to fight the decline by becoming more aggressive in advertising and in-store promotions, especially for 501 jeans and Dockers.

This has led the company to explore other apparel categories and retail opportunities. Chairman Robert Haas identifies children's clothing as the next hot growth category. The company just announced it would open four company-owned stores in the Midwest in 1991, a departure from franchising such units. Levi's franchises are predominantly in the U.S. Northeast and in Europe.

Levi Strauss' media budget edged upwards only slightly to $51 million in 1989, although the company began to focus more of its dollars on TV, especially syndication and cable, and on newspaper supplements at the expense of magazine spending. National magazine spending dropped almost $4.5 million.

"They're spending the amount of money that is required to solidify their position," especially with Dockers, said consultant Harry Bernard. Dockers is believed to carry a $10 million media budget. "Everybody is trying to catch the Dockers' boat, but it has left the dock," he said.

Spending on Brittania has dropped dramatically from a $3.4 million network TV campaign to media buys in 1989 of only $720,000 in print and cable. The decrease comes at a time when Gitano, a new competitor in mass merchandising stores, has posed a strong attack with a proportioned (sized for height and weight) line.

Annual review
A major reason various Loews Corp. subsidiaries have shown increased willingness to flex their marketing muscle is the new generation of Tisch leadership.

The impact of Andrew (son of Loews Corp. chairman and co-CEO Laurence) as Lorillard division president-CEO and his cousin, Jonathan, as president-CEO and chief marketing officer of Loews Hotels, was visible almost immediately after their appointments a few months ago.

Soon after Andrew took over, Lorillard parted ways with BBDO, its agency for the Kent brand, whose sales and marketing share have been in steady decline. Earlier this year, Avrett, Free & Ginsberg was named to handle Kent.

Kent sales dropped 20.6% last year to 10.72 billion units, according to John C. Maxwell, analyst with Wheat, First Securities. Market share continued its downward spiral, to 2.0% last year from 2.4% in 1988. The brand held a 3% share in 1985.

Though the brand continued to be promoted through couponing, all advertising was halted in August 1989. As a result, its ad expenditures in measured media for the year declined by more than one-third, to $6.1 million. A new Kent campaign and new packaging will be introduced later this year. Despite speculation to the contrary, Kent remains a full-price brand. Lorillard entered the price-value category earlier this year with a national rollout of Heritage.

Despite the reduced expenditures for Kent, overall Lorillard advertising increased by about 5%, to $64.8 million, chiefly because of increased backing of the company's flagship brand, Newport. Newport media spending rose 11.3% to $49.4 million as the brand's market share rose to 4.7% from 4.4%.

Part of its success was the growth of 1988-entry Newport Stripes, which claimed an 0.2% share of market 1989.

Newport was the only one of the top five brands to show an increase in market share—others being Kent, True, Old Gold Filter and Max. Expenditures for Newport will continue to grow in 1990, a company executive reported.

Overall, Lorillard remained the fourth largest tobacco company with market share of 8%, up from 7.6% in 1988. Its sales, however, declined 8.4% compared with an industry shortfall of 6.1%.

Loews Hotels, not a traditionally large advertiser, increased its media spending to $982,500, up 39%, due largely to spending in magazines and newspapers for a new corporate campaign themed "Loews Hotels—Your Palace in the World," and advertising associated with the opening of its new Santa Monica Beach property. It currently owns or manages 17 hotels.

Loews Corp.'s CNA Financial division continued to grow despite the natural disasters of Hurricane Hugo and the California earthquake. It moved from 18th largest U.S. insurer in the early 1980s (based on premium volume) to 12th largest last year. One company executive predicted it will finish 1990 in the top 10.

CNA advertising in media in 1989 increased to $13.1 million from $5.8 million, a function of a new $6 million-plus campaign geared to small businesses with 100 or fewer employees. The radio and print campaign is budgeted at $11.9 million for this year.

The weakest link in the Loews chain is Bulova, hurt by a glut of watch movements in the world market. Nevertheless, the company had what one executive described as "a strong year in a soft year for watches." Bulova continues to find specialty niches such as its Bennetton line and Harley-Davidson watches. Direct media advertising by Bulova is small; it supports retailers on a co-op basis.

It broke a magazine and TV campaign this month themed "Bulova—It's America's Time," which featured the hands of people who have recently made their mark in the arts matched to watches that fit their personality.

R.H. Macy, owner of the "world's largest department store," is facing huge debt as it competes in an increasingly troubled retail market.

The privately owned company, made up of Macy's Northeast, Macy's California, Bullock's and I. Magnin, reported its fifth straight quarterly deficit in April. A disastrous Christmas season did little to dent the company's $5.5 billion in debt. For the year ending July 31, Macy reported operating income declined 20% to $743.2 million.

The company has, however, succeeded in narrowing its third quarterly loss from last year's loss of $64 million. Macy's has reduced its need for working capital by lowering its inventory by $250 million by buying less goods.

It also has been running fewer promotions, which temporarily boosted sales last winter but cut into profits.

Media spending for the entire company was up 0.7% to $203.9 million in 1989. Newspapers, by far Macy's biggest ad medium, remained flat at $183 million.

The company has relied heavily on Sunday newspaper inserts as well as company-sponsored activities like the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade, a Fourth of July fireworks display and Tap-O-Mania, where 5,000 people danced in front of Macy's flagship New York store and tapped their way into the "Guinness Book of World Records."

All Macy's units share the same ad slogan, "We're a part of your life." But advertising for each operating unit (i.e., Macy's Northeast, Bullock's) is handled in-house within the regional grouping. In-store promotions or special event sales often are shared within the operating units.

Advertising by Macy's department stores stayed flat at $169.4 million in 1989, all in newspapers except for $16.8 million in spot TV and the remainder in Sunday magazines, according to LNA/Arbitron. Bullock's spending only matched that of 1988 at $28.4 million, while I. Magnin & Co. was backed with $5.9 million, up 20%. The latter two units did not experiment with traditional media beyond newspapers.

Macy's Northeast consists of 46 department stores in Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania and Virginia. Expansion continues throughout Florida, Texas and, most recently, New Orleans.

Macy's California operates 25 department stores in California and Nevada. These units make up 18% of Macy's total department store space.

Half of Macy's South operates under the Bullock's name and consists of 48 department stores in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, South Carolina and Texas. These units make up 17% of Macy's total department store space. There also are Bullock's units in Arizona, California and Nevada.

Marriott, which sold the 600-strong Roy Rogers chain last January to Hardee's Food Systems for $360 million, has announced plans to sell its other restaurant holdings—Bob's Big Boy, Howard Johnson's, Wag's, Bickford's and Allie's.

At the time of the sale, J.W. Marriott Jr., chairman and president, said the move would help Marriott focus on its lodging and contract service operations. Nevertheless, the decision to vacate the restaurant business came as a surprise. Just a year earlier, the company announced plans to open 600 Allie's by 1994.

The first Allie's—named for the mother of J.W.—were churning 40% greater sales than the Bob's Big Boys they replaced. Marriott also had purchased 123 Wag's and Bickford's restaurants in 1988 and 21 Jolly Roger restaurants last year—all supposedly to be converted to Allie's.

Marriott is mum on when the remaining restaurants will be sold. A company spokesperson said negotiations were in progress but another, unofficial source, noted that "as far as we know, no one is even remotely interested."

Since Marriott clearly wasn't planning a distress sale, it continued to support all the restaurants with advertising. In fact, Roy Rogers media spending grew by about a third, to $16.7 million. Allie's was backed by $1.4 million in spending—just about the amount Bob's Big Boy dropped. Bob's claimed $9.4 million, off 13%.

The hotel group was reorganized slightly earlier this year, with formerly independent Marriott Suites division becoming part of Marriott Hotels and Resorts. The four suites hotels offer full services and tend to attract the same level of traveler as Marriott Hotels.

Korey, Kay & Partners, New York, was dropped from the Suites advertising account and replaced by FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York.

Spending for Marriott Hotels in media was up almost 50% to $18.3 million, with newspapers taking $6.7 million of the total and magazines and network radio claiming most of the rest. A large part of the increase came in the fourth quarter, when the hotel chain ran a heavily-advertised joint promotion with Hertz Rent-A-Car that offered Marriott guests an opportunity to win free car rentals and other prizes.

Fairfield Inn, Marriott's entry in the economy segment of the business also has a new agency and a bigger budget. Eisner & Associates, Baltimore, replaced TBWA, New York, and advertising jumped to $488,600 from $55,900, reflecting the chain's expansion. It opened 25 new properties in 1989 to bring its total to 43. Thirty more Fairfield inns will come on line this year.

Mars Inc., slow to step away from the tried and true, suddenly awoke last year and started bringing to market new products and line-extension in all divisions—ranging from a peanut butter version of Snickers to Uncle Ben's new cheese-flavored risotto.

The company continues to focus on standardizing its brand names internationally. This activity will intensify next year as it begins promoting itself as a sponsor of the 1992 Winter and Summer Olympics—marketing events that will likely reverse a two-year decline in measured media spending.

Media spending at M&M/Mars division fell for the second consecutive year to $94.2 million, down 14.9%, according to LNA/Arbitron. The drop included sizable cuts in major brand spending. Snickers received $15.5 million in media, a 32% drop; M&M's fell 41% to $11.5 million. Getting an ad boost were Twix, up 8.8% to $10.5 million, and 3 Musketeers, up 62% to $8.1 million.

M&M/Mars in March launched an unusual umbrella TV campaign which appeared to be a corporate image spot for parent Mars Inc. The ad, via D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, New York, showed people of all ages eating Mars and Milky Way bars and used the theme, "Making life a little sweeter—Mars."

M&M/Mars is emphasizing the "Mars" name on a number of its bars. Mars Milky Way appears on new wrappers rolled out this summer, as well as on the renamed Milky Way Dark (formerly Forever Yours), introduced in January 1990.

The company is counting on several peanut butter-based confections to boost sales. PB Max, a peanut butter cookie bar tested for years before being rolled into the Midwest in late 1989, will be national by December. The new Peanut Butter Snickers will be national by year's end. M&M's Peanut Butter Chocolates roll out on the West Coast this fall.

Holidays, the seasonally colored version of M&M's, will go red and white next year for Valentine's Day, and autumnal this fall (Harvest Holidays).

Other line extensions include new flavors for Kudos, Twix, Starburst, Skittles and Combos.

Dove International slashed its media spending 48.6% to $4.95 million in 1989. It discontinued Forever Yours ice cream sundaes to focus on ice cream versions of 3 Musketeers and Snickers. Dove is readying a U.S. test of Milky Way ice cream. Milky Way bars and Mars bars are being tested in Europe.

Spending by the Kal Kan pet-food division increased 6.2% to $40.8 million, with $28.6 million alone backing new Whiskas cat food.

Mars completed its transition to downplaying the Kal Kan corporate identity in favor of Pedigree brand for dogs, and Whiskas and Sheba for cats.

This year Kal Kan introduced Pedigree Puppy Food. It also launched premium, high-profit items, including Pedigree Choice Cuts in fall 1989, and in June 1990, a premium line for cats, Whiskas Chunks & Gravy.

Uncle Ben's media spending in 1989 fell 25.7% to $19.5 million, most going to Uncle Ben's Country Inn Rice mixes, up 86% to $5.9 million, and Uncle Ben's Rice in an Instant, $7.1 million, down 31.4%.

Uncle Ben's readied several new products in 1990, including Uncle Ben's Aromatica Rice, based on Uncle Ben's products in the U.K. A fast-cooking brown rice and a microwave rice were introduced nationally in the spring. This fall, Uncle Ben's will launch Uncle Ben's Long Grain & Wild Rice in a Garden Vegetable blend, the wild rice's first major line extension. It will be backed with national print advertising.

A regional introduction slated for the fall is Country Inn Extra Cheese Risotto, playing off the popular Italian dish. It will be advertised on spot TV.

May Department Stores Co. signaled its intention in 1989 to sell or spin off its discount operations and aggressively expand its more profitable department stores and self-service shoe stores. The move is certain to have a positive effect on newspaper ROP advertising, which accounted for 86% of May's 1989 media expenditure.

May announced in October 1989 an agreement to sell its 118-store Caldor chain for $500 million to CAL Holdings, an acquisition company 20% owned by May that includes outside investors and Caldor's top management. At the same time, May outlined plans to spin off its 75-store Venture Stores unit, distributing shares to its common shareowners.

Although the Venture spin-off remains on hold due to Wall Street's increasingly lukewarm reception for initial public offerings, the delay is not expected to dampen May's enthusiasm for aggressive expansion. The company will open 21 more stores in 1990. The company has earmarked $2.2 billion in capital spending through 1994 to open about 100 new department stores and 1,250 specialty shoe stores.

"May stands to pick up market share by expanding their retail franchise base. On top of their aggressive expansion plans, I wouldn't be surprised to see them making an acquisition or two," said William N. Smith of Smith Barney, Harris Upham & Co., New York.

A source at May said growth will bring critical mass to the various operating units, opening more powerful multi-media opportunities through the combination of ROP, direct mail, catalog and FSI's. "Greater concentration means averaging the ad dollars over more stores and increasing tremendously the efficiency of our ad spending," the source said.

Each of May's 13 department store divisions is responsible for the production and placement of advertising through its own in-house agency, which handles ROP, catalog, direct mail and broadcast. Based on company reports and measured media spending, Ad Age estimates catalog and direct marketing expenses for the 13 department store divisions exceeded $50 million in 1989.

Volume Shoe Corp., which operates 2,800 Payless ShoeSource stores in 45 states, was the largest user of broadcast in 1989 with a combined $16 million in measured spot and network TV, up 10% over the previous year. Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles broadcast for Volume Shoe.

Analysts are optimistic about May because it continues to show excellent returns. May got strong sales results in 1989 from Foley's and Filene's department store divisions, acquired in May 1988 from Federated Department Stores. With $1.1 billion in 1989 sales, Houston-based Foley's became May's biggest department store division, replacing New York-based Lord & Taylor, which had $1 billion in 1989 sales. Foley's had $33.4 million in measured media in 1989, up 12%, compared with L&T's $30 million, up 11%.

May has been closing or combining a number of stores to create more powerful regional companies since it began to consolidate the stores picked up in its 1986 acquisition of Associated Dry Goods. Hahne & Co., Caldor, Goldwaters, L&T, L.S. Ayres and Robinsons were gained in the purchase.

During 1989, the company combined Goldwaters into Robinson's, Hahne's into L&T, Strouss into Kaufmann's, The Denver into May D&F, O'Neil's into May Co.-Ohio. The trend continued in 1990 when May combined Rochester, N.Y.-based Sibley's and Pittsburgh-based

New products and extensive new-image advertising enabled Mazda Motors of America, a subsidiary of Mazda Motor Corp., to exit 1989 marked as a marketer of premium-quality vehicles. It had entered the year recognized as a marketer of price/value, low-cost cars and trucks.

Mazda's hard-to-get MX-5 Miata, a sporty convertible dubbed "Coupe of the Year" by Automotive News, made the big difference in the company's new image. Serious talk about Mazda's possible entry into the competitive luxury car field also served to reinforce the perception.

Despite a 7,420-unit or 2.1% drop in car/truck sales during 1989, Mazda increased its share of the U.S. car/light truck market. Its 1989 sales of 341,917 units, including 263,378 imported and U.S.-made cars and 78,539 light trucks, gave it 2.3% of the total U.S. car/truck market, up from 2.2% in 1988. The company ranked fourth among the Japanese importers.

Mazda's desire to challenge the top tier of Japanese importers may hinge on its ability to go more upscale. An internal task force, Project Pegasus, is studying selling upscale products—in the manner of American Honda, Nissan and Toyota—through a second distribution channel. Mazda has 850 U.S. dealers, compared with between 1,100 and 1,260 for the mainstream lines of Honda, Nissan and Toyota.

The U.S. marketing arm underwent reorganization when three regional companies were united to form Mazda Motors of America. Organizational refinements continued early this year as Mazda consolidated some of its operations into three new divisions—sales, marketing and product planning.

Mazda's corporate image campaign, which began last August under the theme "It just feels right," unveiled "kansei engineering," the philosophy guiding Mazda in its vehicle design.

Loosely translated as "the sensation when all five senses come into harmony," the ethereal concept was shown at work in a TV spot shot at the Mazda proving grounds in Japan. An eight-page insert in consumer magazines, themed, "Somewhere between your head and your heart," also elaborated on the idea.

Central to Mazda's new image was the Miata convertible. Sales of the sporty two-seater in the U.S. amounted to 23,052 units in only six months on the market—its entire allotment. Mazda expects to sell 40,000 Miatas both this year and next.

Mazda's sales leader in 1989 was the 323 model at 60,965 units, down 32.8%. It was followed by the 626 models at 52,770 (down 20.5%), and the MPV vans at 37,211 (up from 5,717 units). The pricy RX-7 sports car, Mazda's image king of the past, had unit sales of 16,249, down 41.6%.

LNA/Arbitron reported measured 1989 ad spending for the Miata at $14.3 million, most of it in spot and network TV and magazines. The MPV drew $8 million, up 19.4%. The MX-6 sport coupes got $20 million, up 58.7%, followed by the low-end Mazda 323 at $15.6 million, up 84%, and the 626 model at $14 million, up 64.7%. Light truck advertising hit $12 million, up 20%.

Going into 1990, the Mazda product lineup featured restyled models of the entry-level 323 series at $6,599 and the luxury 929 sedan at $24,800. There also was a redesigned Protege sedan, priced at $9,339.

Media usage for the 1990-model year beginning last fall changed from high frequency on one cable and six network TV shows to six cable and 40 network shows. Instead of six magazines in 1988 and 20 in 1989, its print schedule went to 50 magazines. The media buy is 75% network and spot TV, 20% print and 5% other media. The broader media reach is being matched by new ad dollars.

■ Annual review

MCA expanded its television and theme park businesses in 1989, but got snagged in its attempts to start a fifth TV network and to get its Universal Studios Florida attraction up and running.

MCA-TV in September teamed with Paramount Pictures' Paramount Domestic Television to jointly sell national ad time in their syndicated programs. The new sales entity, Premier Advertisers Sales, immediately became the fifth largest broker of TV advertising, behind the Big 3 networks and Fox Broadcasting Co.

Paramount and MCA at the same time were quietly planning a fifth TV network that would furnish programming to Fox affiliates on nights that the Fox network was dark. That plan fell apart when Premier failed to woo loyal Fox affiliates. MCA has not canned the idea yet.

MCA experienced another disappointment this May when it opened its Universal Studios Florida attraction 12 miles down the road from Disney-MGM Studios in Orlando.

MCA Recreation Services shot one of the most costly commercials ever, carrying a $2.4 million price tag and directed by Richard ("Lethal Weapon") Donner, to promote the park.

Even that couldn't spur attendance most of the summer, as crowds stayed away largely because the park's key rides —Jaws, Earthquake: The Big One and Kongfrontation—have worked intermittently or not at all. Ad spending for Universal's tour attractions rose 57% in 1989, to $5.9 million.

MCA's Universal Pictures boosted its market share to 16.6% of 1989's record $5 billion box office take, a significant increase over 9.3% in 1988 and 10.7% in 1987. Universal released between 18 and 20 films each of those years. Only Warner Bros. outpulled Universal in 1989. Universal garnered 17 Academy Award nominations, more than any other studio.

While Universal didn't have a runaway hit movie like Warner's "Batman" in 1989, it released strong films throughout the year and pumped up media spending to $102.3 million, a 57% increase.

Universal's "Back to the Future, Part II" was the No. 6 movie of 1989, and it was the studio's most heavily supported film, backed by $10.9 million in measured media. Ten other films were backed by $5 million-$10 million in measured spending: "Parenthood," "Field of Dreams," "Uncle Buck," "Sea of Love," "K-9," "Fletch Lives," "The 'Burbs," "The Dream Team," "Do the Right Thing" and "Always."

The renamed MCA/Universal Home Video, which boosted ad spending 35% to $9.5 million, sold 4 million videocassettes of the new release, "The Land Before Time," and had cross-promotions with the U.S. Postal Service and PepsiCo's Pizza Hut unit.

MCA/Universal Home Video and Universal Pictures in 1990 teamed to promote the theatrical release of "Back to the Future, Part III" and the video release of "Back to the Future, Part II" with a joint $18 million marketing effort.

MCA put its LJN Toys subsidiary up for sale.

■ Annual review

McDonald's Corp. adopted a new ad theme, "Food, folks and fun," replacing the long-running "Good time. Great taste." in May 1990. The choice of words was significant because the good times of easy sales growth and little serious competition seem to be coming to an end.

The company is accelerating the rate of change in the kind of food it serves—the emergence of McDonald's Pizza is testimony to that—and is trying harder through advertising and promotion to project a fun image.

It remains the largest restaurant company in the world, but in 1989, its 35th year, its rate of growth slowed, especially in the U.S. Total systemwide sales were up 7.9% in 1989 to $17.33 billion, but domestic sales growth was up 5.6%, while overseas sales rose 13.6%.

McDonald's average restaurant open at least one year registered sales of $1.62 million in 1989, a 1.6% increase over 1988. That was less than the percentage McDonald's raised its menu prices, according to analysts. In other words, a bad year.

To help sales grow, McDonald's opened a record 649 new restaurants in 1989; 363 domestically, 286 outside the U.S. The building continues, especially overseas. On Jan. 31, 1990, McDonald's opened in Moscow the first of a projected 20 restaurants in the Soviet Union.

McDonald's share of the sandwich market was 36.1% in 1989, according to Nation's Restaurant News, more than double No. 2 chain Burger King's 17.13% share. McDonald's market share was down a bit from 1988's 36.84%, but that was due more to expansion in the market than to its sales stagnation. Lower than expected sales actually resulted in a boost of the ad/promo to sales percentage to 6.8%, or $1.09 billion. Based on anticipated higher sales entering 1989, the company had whittled such spending to 6.3% from 6.4% in 1988.

The fast-food giant has endeavored to make its marketing dollars work harder by juggling allocations for media advertising, increasing promotional programs and offering new menu items.

The company remained a top network TV advertiser. Its spending in that medium was up only 2.7% to $252.1 million in 1989. But it boosted spending on spot TV by 10.3%, syndicated TV by 39.2% and network cable TV by 200%.

Much of the estimated $330 million McDonald's spent on unmeasured media in 1989 went to promotions. Promotional marketing efforts have been expanded so that there is always at least one special marketing program under way at any given time.

Promos have been expanding into new areas in 1990. This month, McDonald's began running a major in-store game in conjunction with the beginning of NBC-TV's new season of programming. In June, McDonald's sponsored the national concert tour by the popular teen group New Kids on the Block.

McDonald's in 1990 signed as the official restaurant sponsor of both the NASCAR and CART auto-racing circuits and runs national and local promotions tied to those sponsorships.

McDonald's never forgets the children who have been its most loyal—and most heavily targeted—customers. In June 1990 it ran the "$40 Million Crimestopper Game" tied to the movie "Dick Tracy" and in 1989 ran a Christmas promotion tied to another Walt Disney Co. film, "The Little Mermaid." It also has promotions tied to such popular characters as Mr. Potato Head, the comic strip "Peanuts" cast and Nintendo's Super Mario Bros.

The 12-inch pizza, which entered the menu last year, will be in 200 stores by 1990. Under test is pasta in Scranton, Pa.; fried chicken and a Breakfast Burrito in Texas; Fish & Chips in Washington; and McFish Fry in Wisconsin.

Under fire from some nutritionists about high levels of fat and cholesterol in some of its foods, McDonald's in 1990 added bran muffins and cold cereals to its breakfast menu, added low-fat frozen yogurt and lower-fat shakes and said it will convert to 100% vegetable oil by the end of 1990 for cooking its french fries. In August 1990 it began testing a low-calorie, low-fat grilled chicken breast sandwich in five markets.

The accelerated rate of change has come under the direction of Michael Quinlan, who moved up to chairman from president in March 1990, succeeding Fred Turner, who retired. David Green, previously VP-national marketing, took over the post of senior VP-marketing in June, following the retirement of Peter Nelson.

Annual review

Saddam Hussein's August invasion of Kuwait and the ensuing embargo on Iraqi and Kuwaiti oil was a temporary boon for Mobil Corp. and the U.S. oil patch. But experts say a long-term stand-off could be damaging and a shooting war disastrous.

Whatever the effect either scenario will have on media spending, it is clear Mobil will be fighting back with advertising. Shortly after the invasion when gasoline prices were soaring, Mobil was first to lash out against critics accusing the industry of reaping fat profits from the conflict.

In a newspaper ad titled "Where's the rip-off?" Mobil insisted that it wasn't passing on the full weight of price increases to consumers. Greater use of such issue-oriented ads would likely reverse cutbacks in measured totals for corporate newspaper ROP spending, which fell 45% to $3 million in 1989, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Gasoline brand advertising by Mobil and other big oil companies virtually dried up in the 30 days after the invasion, as consumer demand remained strong in the face of soaring prices. Assuming the gulf stand-off continues, product advertising is likely to return to normal levels to prevent loss of consumer loyalty.

The oil companies also did not shelve their advertising during the OPEC-sponsored oil embargo in 1973. It plummeted initially, only to be replaced by public service-style ads urging conservation.

Mobil's measured spending for gasoline advertising grew 14% in 1989 to $9.5 million, mostly spot TV. Mobil held a 7.4% share of U.S. gasoline sales in 1989, putting it in fifth place behind Shell at 8.8%; Chevron, 8.3%; Exxon, 7.8%; and Texaco, 7.5%, according to National Petroleum News, Des Plaines, Ill.

Measured spending for Mobil 1 motor oil grew 3% in 1989 to $9.1 million.

Mobil Chemical Co. spent a measured $16.9 million on the Hefty bag brand in 1989, up 10%, including $3.2 million on Hefty wastebaskets, a new line of molded plastic waste containers.

In a running battle with First Brands' Glad bags for market leadership, Mobil spent $12.3 million of the Hefty brand total on Hefty Tall Kitchen and Trash Bags, all of which was on TV.

Mobil in March 1990 said it would remove the word "degradable" from boxes of its Hefty plastic trash bags, bowing to demands by environmental groups and the threat of legal action from the attorneys general of seven states. Mobil later settled degradability claims on Hefty products with Wisconsin and Texas, but still is being probed by five states and the FTC.

Mobil also completed in August 1990 the move of all headquarters operations from New York to Fairfax, Va.

Montgomery Ward & Co.'s repositioning as a specialty retailer continues its slow but steady pace as it spends heavily on expansion and advertising.

The ninth largest retailer recently linked with Thrifty Rent-A-Car for in-store presence and signed three new celebrity spokeswomen as it continued to revamp full-line stores and add free-standing specialty shops.

Top management has been reshuffled, reflecting the emphasis on expansion, to prepare for the opening of 53 new stores by the end of 1991.

In July, Thrifty Rent-A-Car agreed to open offices in Ward's stores in 15 cities and will accept Ward's credit cards this fall. The test agreement calls for as many as 20 rental offices installed in Ward's stores by yearend. Possible joint advertising or direct marketing programs are in the works.

Three female celebrities will appear in print and TV ads by fall, continuing increased spending in those media. Chris Evert, Elle Macpherson and Connie Sellecca signed their name to new lines of contemporary apparel—part of Ward's effort to build name brand credibility.

Adding a wide range of national brands to its private label merchandise is paying off. Ward's is a leading retailer in sales of Maytag appliances. Sealy bedding products, La-Z-Boy furniture and NAPA auto parts.

Three prototypes of the new full-line specialty store under one roof opened in late '89 clustering Electric Avenue, Home Ideas, The Apparel Store and Auto Express. Each division has an individual exterior entrance and is joined inside by a central midway with customer services.

Existing stores are continually being converted to the specialty strategy and more stand-alone stores are opening in strategic markets, as well as near existing department stores in order to further leverage advertising. About a half dozen new markets will be entered in early 1991.

Five free-standing Kids Stores opened in Chicago in October. This children's apparel chain, featuring a high selection of merchandise, faces stiff competition but hopes to niche itself by targeting middle-income shoppers. The company is pleased with its results. Its newly-licensed Raggedy Ann and Andy line averages about 15% of the total merchandise mix.

Thirty-eight of the total new stores should be opened by yearend '90 and 20 new full-line stores by yearend '91, with at least half a dozen in new markets including Savannah, Ga. Ward's currently operates 336 stores in 39 states.

Although Ward's employment level dropped by 2,600 in 1989, it plans to staff up with 10,000 more by 1991 to run the new stores.

Chairman-CEO Bernard Brennan plans a high concentration of spot TV advertising for each new market and estimates the full-line stores (21 by end of 1991) planned for new markets will add about $400 million in sales.

Growth in ad spending in 1989 is credited mostly to spot TV and spot radio, which Ward's tried out for the first time in late 1988. Magazine spending also received a sizable increase.

The retailer's main campaign theme via Saffer USA Advertising continues to emphasize value-pricing on name brands. Chicago-based Saffer, which won the account in 1988 succeeding Young & Rubicam, faces a possible loss of the $15 million account as Montgomery Ward & Co. announced an agency review in mid-September.

Nestle SA continued to build its U.S. market presence by funneling increased ad spending behind its major U.S. units, Carnation Co., Cosmair and Nestle Foods, realigning its advertising agencies and reconfiguring compensation arrangements while seeking greater international marketing hegemony in a joint venture deal with General Mills.

Nestle and General Mills formed Cereal Partners Worldwide (CPW) in 1989 to market breakfast cereals worldwide. CPW then bought the U.K. cereal business of Ranks Hovis McDougall PLC, giving the new unit an instant 15% of the $1 billion U.K. cereal market.

General Mills, a minor player in the European cereal market, sought out Nestle because of its marketing power in Europe where the cereal market is expected to grow to about $6 billion by the late 1990s, quadrupling its current size.

Carnation Co. in early 1990 consolidated consumer advertising in the Los Angeles offices of two Interpublic-owned shops, Dailey & Associates and McCann-Erickson Worldwide.

Dailey secured its position as Carnation's primary agency, while McCann was a new agency for the food and pet foods marketer. Carnation pulled all its brands from another Interpublic shop, Lintas:New York, and two other agencies, Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles, and Bloom Cos., Dallas.

Early this year, Carnation expanded an agency incentive program after testing the idea in 1989. The program links agency compensation to how ads score in research, production cost controls and other factors.

Carnation this year recast its problematic infant formulas, introduced in 1988. In early 1989, Carnation had dropped the controversial positioning of Good Start H.A. starter formula as "hypoallergenic" but refused to change the brand's name; last spring, it quietly dropped "H.A." from the title.

After spending $4.3 million in measured media in 1989 to promote Good Nature formula for older babies, the company renamed it Carnation Follow-Up Formula. Carnation has managed only an estimated 2% to 3% share of the $1.6 billion U.S. formula market.

Carnation entered the dog treat business in June 1990 by buying Superior Brands, with sales of $60 million. In July 1990, Carnation turned over marketing of Perform, its premium direct-market pet food, to SmartPets, a mail-order pet products marketer.

Carnation claimed a 13.9% share of the $6.21 billion pet foods market in 1989, up 1.2 share points from 1988, but still far behind leader Ralston Purina at 27%, according to John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities. Its cat foods lines performed better than dog food, reflecting similar trends among other players in the industry.

The Friskies cat food brand got $9.8 million, up 12.7%, according to LNA/Arbitron; its Friskies Buffet trailed only Heinz's 9-Lives (20.5% versus 9% of dollar value) in the canned cat food subcategory valued at $1.4 billion. Carnation's Fancy Feast, backed with $8.1 million, down 34.6%, took 12.4% of the subcategory.

Carnation held down the No. 3 and No. 4 positions in the canned dog food subsegment valued at $1.06 billion with Mighty Dog at 8.4% of market, down from 9.3%, and Grand Gourmet at 6.5%, up from 5.3%. Mighty Dog got $5.8 million in media backing, up 13.7% and Grand Gourmet was backed with $5.3 million, down 43.6%.

Carnation in January 1990 introduced nationally Coffee-mate Liquid, an extension of its powder non-dairy creamer, with an $18 million campaign.

Nestle joined the Nestle Foods' coffee units with Hills Bros. Coffee Co. to form the Nestle-Hills Coffee Co. This new entity, based in San Francisco, now handles Nescafe, Hills Bros., Taster's Choice, MJB, Chase & Sanborn and Sakes and Zoegas.

Nestle's market share for regular coffee (Hills Bros., MJB, Chase & Sanborn, Taster's Choice) rose to 13.5% in 1989 from 13%, according to Mr. Maxwell. It trailed Procter & Gamble at 32.2%, up 0.4 share points, and General Foods at 32.1%, down 0.9, in instant coffees (Nescafe, Taster's Choice, Sunrise, etc.), the company hit a 33.6% share, up 0.5 share points from 1988. Nestle backed its coffees with $33.5 million in 1989, down 9.5%. Spending decreases were monitored for virtually all lines.

Nestle was led by Hills Bros. among regular coffees with a 7.8% share (P&G's Folgers led all at 32.2%). Nestle's 17.3% share for regular and decaf Taster's Choice placed it No. 2 in instant coffees behind P&G's Folgers regular and decaf at 23.1%.

Following the coffee business consolidation, Nestle pulled its Taster's Choice account, valued at $25 million, from Della Femina, McNamee and placed it with McCann-Erickson Worldwide, which also handles all Cosmair advertising. Della Femina also lost the Lean Cuisine line to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, but retained Stouffer's frozen foods.

Nestle merged the Stouffer Restaurant Co. and the Stouffer Hotel Co. to form the Stouffer Hospitality Group, headquartered in Cleveland. In addition, Nestle's ice cream and dairy business was consolidated with Carnation to form the Nestle Ice Cream Co.

Stouffer, which leads the $3.2 billion frozen entrees market with its red box and Lean Cuisine entrees, was challenged earlier this year by Kraft General Foods national launch of its 16-item blue box line. Advertising behind the blue box line, estimated at $10 million-$15 million, compared the quality of its ingredients with those in the red box line.

Stouffer also has been challenged this year with comparative ads from Geo. A. Hormel & Co.'s Top Shelf shelf-stable entrees. Stouffer's red box line in 1989 held 12.2% of market, down from 12.8%. Stouffer's Lean Cuisine dropped to 11.25% from 11.7%. Kraft GF's share rose to 11.6% from 11.1%. H.J. Heinz Co.'s Weight Watchers was the category growth winner with 10.5%, up from 9.9%, according to Arbitron/SAMI.

Nestle Foods purchased Baby Ruth, Butterfinger and Pearson candies from RJR Nabisco. Subsequently, the $10 million Baby Ruth/Butterfinger account was awarded to Jordon, McGrath, Case & Taylor from Lintas:New York. The new candy bars helped boost Nestle's share in the $5.1 billion candy market to 12% from 7% in 1988, behind Hershey at 40% and Mars at 36%.

After Eight dinner mints and Turtles candy accounts were awarded to J. Walter Thompson USA, while Nestle Enterprises shifted its $3 million corporate advertising account to Wyse Advertising, Cleveland. Nestle Foods daytime network TV media buying was awarded to Jordan, McGrath, Case & Taylor, New York.

The realignment of many of its agency relationships is a reflection of Nestle's policy of aligning brands to agencies designated as "preferred" based on the belief that this provides enough clout with these agencies so they won't work for Nestle competitors.

Cosmair boosted its cosmetics ad budget this year by about 30% for new product launches following several successful introductions in 1989. Majority owned by Nestle, it is the U.S. licensee of L'Oreal. Nestle also is a minority owner in Gesperal, a holding company that owns a majority of L'Oreal.

L'Oreal is adding Plenitude Action Liposomes to its mass-market skincare line (which competes directly with P&G's Oil of Olay). Plenitude was backed with $12.5 million in advertising for the six months it was marketed in 1989, according to LNA/Arbitron. Plenitude is the mass-market leader in France and may have achieved first-year sales of $10 million-$15 million largely in drugstores, according to Diane Temple, analyst with Salomon Bros. The U.S. skincare market was expected to reach $4.56 billion in 1990, up 9%, according to Ms. Temple.

L'Oreal haircoloring market share in supermarkets was 24.7%, down 0.1 share points. The leader was Bristol-Myers Squibb's Clairol at 70.4%, up 2.4 share points. L'Oreal's top haircoloring line is Preference, backed by $14.9 million in media in 1989, up 20.2%.

L'Oreal hair styling products (Free Hold, L'Oreal setting lotion, Studio) claimed 11.5% of supermarket category sales, down from 19.9% in 1988, as Helene Curtis (Suave, Finesse, Salon Selectives) passed it with a leading 14.9% share. Ad spending for Studio also dropped 34% to $11.8 million.

Annual review

Rupert Murdoch is turning his gaze inward after a decade of consuming media properties which built News Corp. into a global giant and left the company an estimated $6 billion in debt.

Media analysts agree that Mr. Murdoch, who said the company will concentrate on existing business for the next several years, is under no pressure to spin off assets. They said a spate of sales earlier this year, however, indicate the company's desire to lessen its debt load.

News Corp. took on heavy debt in acquiring such properties as 20th Century-Fox, Triangle Publications, the Metromedia TV stations and the launch of Sky Television in the U.K. and Fox TV Network in the U.S. Apart from Sky, the other three operations represent the lion's share of News Corp.'s national media spending. Reduced advertising by TV Guide (Triangle), and 20th Century-Fox heavily influenced the overall 10% drop in the company's measured media.

"They are very highly leveraged and their operating results right now aren't very impressive," said Peter Apert, media analyst with Cyrus J. Lawrence. "Selling assets would help reduce the debt and that, in and of itself, is a desirable goal. But I don't see a fire sale by any means."

Last March, News Corp. shocked the publishing world when it sold the Star and its sister publication, Weekly World News, to National Enquirer publisher Macfadden Holdings, for $400 million. Two months later, News Corp.'s Harper-Collins publishing subsidiary sold its J.B. Lippincott unit to Wolters Kluwer N.V., a Dutch publisher, for more than $250 million.

Murdoch Magazines this May sold Sportswear International and the rights to In Fashion, which it folded in 1989, to the magazines' former publisher, Michael Belluomo. The following month, News Corp. floated 49% of the stock in its Hong Kong papers, the South China Morning Post and Sunday Morning Post. The stock was snapped up by investors within 24 hours.

News Corp.'s net profit took a bashing in fiscal 1990, dropping 43% from fiscal 1989, largely from losses on Sky, its money-draining U.K.-based satellite-TV service and the impact of a pilots' strike in Australia where it owns a 50% stake in the domestic airline Ansett Transport Industries.

Mr. Murdoch has pledged long-term support for Sky. News Corp. execs expect the service to be breaking even on a month-to-month basis by late 1991.

In the U.S., Murdoch Magazines posted fairly strong results despite an ad page crunch affecting the entire magazine industry. Murdoch has introduced Men's Life, a magazine for men over 30, but suspended plans to launch a newsweekly developed by former Self editor Anthea Disney.

TV Guide—Mr. Murdoch's crown jewel—is trying to reverse an ad page and circulation slump while facing increased competition from rival TVSM, publisher of The Cable Guide and the new weekly TV Time. In response, TV Guide unveiled a series of themed ad packages this year and will begin testing a larger-size edition in several markets early next year.

Media spending on TV Guide was slashed by $18 million to $18.7 million in 1989, largely due to the magazine's decision to end its barter arrangement with local TV stations. The media mix split evenly between spot and network TV, a medium not even used in 1988 when spot claimed $25 million and network radio $9.5 million. Network radio advertising was shelved by the publication in 1989.

After losing an estimated $125 million in its first two years of operation, Fox TV Network posted its first profit for the fiscal year ended June 30. The fourth network signed an estimated $550 million in upfront business this summer, almost double last year's $300 million.

Ad spending backing the network rose a dramatic 108% to $37.4 million, largely divided between magazines ($10.5 million, up from $3.5 million) and spot radio ($23.5 million, up 75%).

Fox's success is largely attributed to the ratings success of such shows as "Married ... With Children" and "The Simpsons." Fox is increasing its offerings for the 1990-91 season, expanding its prime-time schedule to five nights, adding a two-hour children's block of programming on Saturday morning and an animated weekday half-hour series.

Movie studio 20th Century-Fox finished the year ranked No. 6 with a 6.5% share of box-office take in North America, a far cry from its 11.6% share in 1988 that placed it No. 3, according to Variety. The studio released 17 films compared to 14 the prior year and cut its media spending by 9.3% to $52.7 million, distributed largely between network and spot TV and newspapers. "Big" got the biggest dollar allotment of $10.5 million.

Annual review

Until it was targeted this August for a boycott by the civil rights organization Operation PUSH, Nike appeared to be on a roll.

Staking out the performance shoe market as its primary turf and—with agency Wieden & Kennedy—producing "Bo Knows" and other award-winning ads, the company took first place in the branded athletic shoe market in 1989 with a 24.8% share, topping Reebok International at 23.7%, which had led the market the previous three years.

Nike initially said it would make no changes in response to PUSH's criticisms of its affirmative action record and fought back by charging that PUSH and Reebok had financial ties. But in mid-August Nike announced a plan that would include naming a minority member to its board. Not good enough for PUSH, the boycott remains in effect.

The boycott is just one of the several factors placing Nike in a stiff marketing battle.

"The sneaker industry is driven by who has the best gimmick and who promotes best," said Gary M. Jacobson, industry analyst at Kidder Peabody. "Reebok had stumbled and other companies were not big enough to challenge Nike. Now that Reebok is back and other companies are focusing on Nike's market place, the competition should increase," said Mr. Jacobson.

Chairman-CEO Philip Knight gave his company a "D" grade in marketing to women in the 1988 annual report and Nike's record still hasn't improved, analysts said. Men represent 80% of Nike's business, according to Mr. Jacobson.

"By not doing a great job with women, Nike left a door open for companies like L.A. Gear and they took a lot of sales," said Frank Podbelsek of PaineWebber. Although L.A. Gear came in a distant third at 11% of market in 1989, it was up dramatically from 4.7%.

From "Bo Knows" to "Emotional Running," which won the Kelly Award, Nike's ads have been a story in themselves. Nike, which is continuing its "Just Do It" umbrella theme this year, recently broke a pro-education Bo Jackson spot (in which "Bo Knows Shakespeare"), having pledged $5 million of its $60 million ad budget to a pro-education campaign.

Other celebrities signed to the company include David Robinson, Michael Jordan, Spike Lee, Andre Agassi, John McEnroe, track star Lynn Jennings and Stacy Allison, who climbed Mt. Everest.

A major move by Nike in 1989 was to link apparel and shoes. That category catapulted from $1 million in 1988 to $13.3 million. As spending for just apparel decreased 0.6% to $1.6 million, spending for just footwear rose only 2.2% to $32.9 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Ad spending for non-sport footwear rose 166.3% to $3.1 million.

In mid-1989, Nike shifted its broadcast media buying account to SFM Media from Wieden & Kennedy which retained the remainder of Nike business.

Annual review

Despite an infusion of new cars and the much ballyhooed entry of Infiniti, Nissan Motor Corp. in U.S.A., a subsidiary of Nissan Motor Co., Tokyo, got its biggest sales boost from improved sales performances of older cars and trucks, backed by its biggest ad budget.

Nissan's U.S. car/truck sales (imported and domestic production) were 663,416 units, up 3.2% from 1988 as Nissan claimed a 4.5% share of the total car-truck market, up from 4.15%. Nissan accounted for 5.1% of U.S. car sales, up from 4.4%, and 3.2% of the light-truck market, down from 3.4%.

Introduction last November of the new luxury Infiniti line, the $38,000 Q45 sedan and the $23,500 M30 coupe had the backing of a $60 million-plus campaign. Promotional efforts began in late August, however, with TV spots discoursing on product "philosophy" and abstract images of trees, rocks and sand—no car in sight.

More product-oriented second- and third-campaign phases came in February and in early spring. Nissan called the overall campaign a success, although Infiniti fell short of its sales goal despite a lot of showroom traffic. The line sold 1,723 units in December but only another 1,789 through June 1990.

Another sour note was the lackluster sales performance of the Axxess, a hybrid wagon/minivan introduced in 1989 but withdrawn from the market after just one model year. Sales, backed by $4 million in media advertising, totaled just 9,776 units as larger and more stylish minivans from other carmakers made the Axxess seem outdated.

U.S. sales performance in particular of the 240-SX sports coupe and the 300ZX model were brighter spots, especially that of the $19,000 Maxima, which sold 109,429 units, up 46.9%.

Maxima benefited from a TV-magazine campaign measured at $35 million, up 25%, heaviest for any Nissan model. Much of Maxima's promotion was based on its selection as 1989's most trouble-free car in a J.D. Powers & Associates survey.

Sales of Nissan's best-selling Sentra, an entry-level, sub-compact base priced at $7,399, accounted for 118,158 units, down 12.4%. Sentra received $15.2 million in media in 1989, down 10.5%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Nissan's 1990 car lineup introduced an all-new sports car, the 300ZX Turbo, and in the compact category a new Stanza, intended to boost Nissan's share of the mid-sized sedan market dominated by Honda Accord, Toyota Camry and Mazda 626. Stanza had 42,736 sales in 1989, down 8.4%, although sales of 100,000 are projected for this year and 150,000 by 1992. Stanza's spending rose to $21.9 million, up from only $6.2 million in 1988.

The restyled 1990 Stanza compact is critical to Nissan's 1990 U.S. marketing plan. The Japanese importer spent an estimated $18 million on a three-week ad blitz last fall to position Stanza as a performance car for the family. Base price is $11,450.

The new Stanza campaign, like the rest of Nissan's 1990 model-year advertising, uses the theme "Built for the human race." The campaign is helping push Stanza sales to the 80,000 range for the model year.

Cash incentives to boost Stanza sales included a summer test-drive program, the "Stanza Challenge," offering $100 to anyone who took a test drive and still bought a competitive make compact—namely a Honda Accord or Toyota Camry. Nissan also paid dealer and customer incentives ranging from $300 to $1,500.

For the 1990 model year, Nissan is aiming for sales of about 660,000 units, though it has forecast a 6.6% industry-wide decline in auto and light-truck sales to about 14 million units. Its optimism of course is based on the anticipated 125% rise in Stanza sales.

TV is claiming about 85% of Nissan's 1990 national media budget of $200 million-plus; print will get the rest.

Nissan in 1989 set up Nissan North America, headquartered in Torrance, Calif. It will coordinate the 10 North American subsidiaries of Nissan Motor Co., Tokyo, including those of Nissan Motor Corp in U.S.A. They formerly reported to Nissan's North American Division in Tokyo.

Annual review

The weakening economy of the Northeast and four-month strike by telephone operators produced a drop in earnings at Nynex Corp. in 1989 and resulted in a 24.7% decline in ad spending.

Nynex's biggest corporate contributor, New York Telephone, was affected by the city's soft economy, in particular the troubled financial services industry.

"The engine of growth during the 80's was financial services and that is extremely weak today. In that kind of environment, it is difficult for Nynex to perform well," said Frank Governali, VP, First Boston.

New York Telephone also experienced a slight decline in its network access lines, the first such decline at the company, as customers switched to other carriers.

New York Telephone media spending dropped 55% to $14.7 million as its "A call can make a difference" campaign ran its course. It has been replaced by the "We're all connected" campaign. New England Telephone advertising grew 2.9% to $14.1 million as it introduced voice messaging. This year it launched call trace, call return and repeat dialing.

Nynex continued its "The answer is Nynex" campaign, using a case history format. In addition, a vertical industry technical ad campaign has been developed as an off-shoot of the corporate campaign. Nynex is currently reviewing its corporate campaign and may make modifications later this year.

Information Resources continues its ad campaign "Human Cartoons" from Chiat/Day/Mojo. The campaign was chosen by The One Club of New York as one of the 10 best TV campaigns of the 1980s.

Nynex Mobile Communications experienced a 68% growth of its cellular base in 1989. Its cellular base has increased from 12,000 in 1984 to 213,000 today. Media ad spending increased to $599,000, up from $35,500 in 1988.

Nynex Business Centers attracted $1.1 million in media spending in 1989, about the same as 1988. The centers, comprised of 78 branches in the U.S., market personal computers and related services. Nynex is the third largest non-franchised computer reseller in the country. The total PC market is expected to grow 16% annually, reaching about $58 billion in sales this year, the company said. But analysts have strongly recommended that Nynex get out of this business.

"Nynex has a weak earnings record. The diversification strategy that took Nynex into retail stores and software hasn't been one that Wall Street has favored. Wall Street is enamored with expansion of cellular telephones, but Nynex hasn't expanded much upon its original holdings," Mr. Governali said.

Regulations prevent Nynex from competing in the cable TV industry. In information services, Nynex is allowed to transmit data generated by others, but is prohibited from generating its own data.

Paramount Communications, renamed from Gulf & Western, turned into a fully entertainment company last year with the sale of Associates First Capital Corp., but its plan to become the largest entertainment conglomerate has so far met with roadblocks.

The Associates sale to Ford Motor Co. for $3.35 billion left Paramount cash rich, but its move this July to buy the remaining 21% share it didn't already own in TVX Broadcast Group was rejected by stockholders. TVX owns independent TV stations in six major U.S. cities.

Paramount's move to acquire Time Inc. for $12.2 billion also disintegrated in the summer of 1989 when Time opted to merge with Warner Communications.

Paramount formed Premier Advertising Sales with MCA, its frequent venture partner. The new company is the fifth largest broker of TV advertising, behind the Big 3 networks and Fox Broadcasting Co., with combined ad sales of about $250 million in the 1988-89 season.

Paramount Pictures fell from second to fifth in domestic box office take, or from a 15.2% share in 1988 to 13.8% in 1989. Its strongest release in 1989 was "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade," with domestic receipts of $195 million. The film also was the most heavily promoted of the studio's 1989 picture lineup, with $7.9 million in media. The movie through 1989 ranked ninth in revenues on Variety's all-time rental list.

Paramount spent $67.4 million on all films in 1989, down 2.6% from the prior year. LNA/Arbitron reported six other films received media support of more

ISA THE IN-STORE ADVERTISING NETWORK

© 1989 In-Store Advertising Inc.

Reaching America's Most Important Audience

The In-Store Advertising Network reaches America's most important audience – the American Shopper. And we reach the shopper right at the point of purchase, where 2 out of every 3 purchase decisions are made (POPAI).

Over 50 of the country's leading Supermarket Chains including: A&P, Bruno's, Kroger, Winn-Dixie, Giant, Pathmark, Von's, Schnuck's, Ralph's, Fred Meyer, Shaws and many more, enable the In-Store Advertising Network to deliver America's premier audience, and deliver them where and when they are ready to buy.

In the past two years, In-Store Advertising has grown to be a dominant retail advertising network. The reason for our rapid growth and success is simple: ISA delivers exceptional results for our clients. Via our network of strategically placed L.E.D. billboards, the In-Store Advertising Network combines brand sell with retail pricing. On a store by store basis, ISA delivers an intrusive and compelling incentive to purchase while the shopper is in the store.

It's a fact! Traditional media can't deliver results like the In-Store Advertising Network. Over 200 participating brands from over 60 major national advertisers have seen their sales grow month after month, averaging an exceptional +29%*.

If reaching the American Shopper is a key marketing objective, then the In-Store Advertising Network should be part of your marketing program. To learn how the ISA Network will build your sales, call In-Store Advertising today.

than $5 million: "Fat Man & Little Boy," "Black Rain," "Major League," "We're No Angels," "Cousins" and "Harlem Nights."

This year began strong for the studio with "The Hunt for Red October" taking in more than $80 million at the box office through mid-August. "Ghost" was the summer's big sleeper and could top $100 million by yearend, according to the studio.

Other summer releases, "Days of Thunder" and "Another 48 Hours," were expected to gross more than $70 million. Budgets for the two films were high, estimated by industry analysts at $50 million and $40 million, respectively.

Advertising direction for Paramount Pictures shifted in October 1989 with the arrival of Arthur Cohen, formerly of Revlon, as president of marketing. He began what is now an industry-wide trend of outdoor advertising and put ads for "The Hunt for Red October" on the sides of buses in major markets. He also shifted to smaller newspaper ads and increased magazine buys.

Paramount spent $3 million in media to advertise various books and publishing units within its publishing division. Simon & Schuster claimed the largest take of $2 million, same as 1988.

The company boosted its educational division with the acquisition of Computer Curriculum Corp., a producer of computer-based learning systems.

Paramount's Madison Square Garden Network cable unit began airing New York Yankee games in 1989 and got exclusive TV rights to 150 Yankee games each season from 1991 to 2000. This helped increase MSG's subscriber base 50% to 3.4 million.

Annual review

J.C. Penney Co. continues to make progress in its ongoing repositioning as America's fashion department store.

The nation's fourth largest retailer this September introduced new image advertising for the 1990s themed: "Fashion comes to life." It replaces "You're looking smarter than ever," Penney's theme since 1983.

The new, stylish, lifestyle-oriented advertising is part of Penney's decade-long exodus from its mass merchandiser roots. Penney's wants to be thought of in the same league as upper-moderate department stores such as R.H. Macy & Co., Dillard Department Stores and May Department Stores, and not the Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Montgomery Ward & Co. clone it once was.

The retailer during 1989 spent its largest media outlays on general promotion, $26.4 million, up 25.2%; women's apparel, $22.3 million, up 18.6% and Penney's home furnishings, $18 million, up 20%.

Its media mix remained static except for network radio, which was more than doubled to $11.9 million in 1989. Jewelry, women's apparel and children's clothing sectors were new advertisers in the medium, an ad vehicle used in 1988 for most other apparel units.

Penney's target is the traditional/update consumer, women 18 to 44 with annual household incomes of $18,000-$70,000. Its goal is to get these middle-to-upper income shoppers to take a second look at its stores.

"Our biggest challenge is to get the targeted consumer to spend more money in Penney's stores," said Ron Shuler, director of marketing communications. "That buyer accounts for more than 70% of the purchases in our stores. She buys a certain item like hosiery, but not dresses and careerwear."

Penney's new advertising from N W Ayer, Dallas, shows off its newfound fashion flair. The campaign's major thrust is TV, on which five 30-second spots kicked off the campaign. Price points, traditionally screamed by Penney's in print, will become more discreet. A test involving 200,000 Penney's customers is under way on a men's and women's fashion newsletter, "Premiere," which could expand to Penney's 30 million cardholders.

Always promotion conscious, Penney's plans 1990/1991 promotions: "Spirit of the American Woman" and "Ports '91" as well as merchandising tie-ins with Walt Disney Co.'s holiday movie "Rescuers Down Under."

The retailer continues to spruce up its stores and refine and upgrade its merchandise mix, with a special emphasis on adding better name brands.

Penney's sales results have been mixed, according to analysts, signaling that some progress has been made in its repositioning, though it hasn't "arrived" yet. Men's and children's apparel sales have fared well, while women's apparel sales have lagged.

"It is very difficult to change a store's image. It is the single most difficult thing to do," said Monroe Greenstein, senior retail analyst with Bear Stearns & Co. "Penney's has made progress, but it still must convince consumers it is a fashion house."

Penney's also has ventured into specialty retailing and is betting on five new concepts. The concepts in various stages of test or development are: Amanda Fielding, an apparel store for women 35-plus; Tezio, an upper-moderate cosmetic chain for women 35-plus; In Detail, an upscale bed-and-bath shop; Portfolio Interiors by J.C. Penney, a home furnishings, accessories and home decorating chain; and Mixit, a casual wear concept similar to The Limited.

The new ventures have a role model—Units, the Penney 200-store clothing store subsidiary that emerged nationally several years ago and is now moving into Canada, Mexico and the U.K.

Penney's also has its own 24-hour cable TV shopping channel, the J.C. Penney Television Shopping Channel. Bozell, Dallas, handles.

Annual review

PepsiCo quenched its thirst for growth in the soft-drink and snack-food sectors with $3.4 billion in acquisitions during 1989 and it fed its hunger for further dominance among restaurant chains with the addition of a combined 1,100 Pizza Hut, Kentucky Fried Chicken and Taco Bell outlets.

While PepsiCo fattened its bottom line—worldwide earnings grew 18.2%—PepsiCo botched its introduction of the well-received KFC Hot Wings. It did little to restore the goodwill of franchisees already angered by a new franchise contract and the slow development of menu items geared toward the health conscious.

Further management changes reflected attempts to put the KFC house in order and bolster real per-store sales, which fell 5%-8% for company and franchised stores. Profits at company-owned stores fell 14% to $100 million. That compares with PepsiCo's other restaurant operations: Taco Bell (up 38% to $113 million) and Pizza Hut (up 36% to $208 million).

Feeling the heat from McDonald's, KFC bit back with an aggressive and controversial ad campaign by Young & Rubicam satirizing Ronald McDonald. CBS would not run the spots which showed McDonald's more interested in toys than chicken. Pizza Hut strongly countered a test market foray by McDonald's with spots intended to put McDonald's new pizza menu item on ice. Cycling champ Greg LeMond wheeled onto the scene peddling the wares of Taco Bell.

KFC was included in a three-way promotion experiment with sister companies Pizza Hut and Taco Bell. Rives Smith Baldwin Carlberg, Houston, is handling. KFC accounts for 50% of the quick-service chicken market, Pizza Hut 22% of the pizza market and Taco Bell 66% of the Mexican restaurant market.

PepsiCo spent $118.4 million in media to back KFC, up 11.7%, $94.5 million for Pizza Hut, up 13.9%, and $59.2 million for Taco Bell, down 8.8%.

The corporate mainstay, Pepsi-Cola, increased its share of the $43 billion U.S. soft-drink market to 31.1%, up four-tenths of a point. Coca-Cola accounted for 41.1%. Pepsi-Cola outspent Coca-Cola in advertising its soft-drink lineup —$151.2 million to $140 million in measured media, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The Pepsi line claimed the largest portion of the total, $71.9 million, down 1.4%; Diet Pepsi got $57.2 million, up 17.9%; Slice $11.4 million, down 24%; and Mountain Dew $10.7 million, up 2.8%.

Pepsi also upped its TV advertising 50% in 1990 to contest Coke's gains in the rapid-growth diet-soft-drink sector. Diet Coke leads the pack at 8.9% total market share followed by Diet Pepsi at 5.7%, Caffeine-Free Diet Coke at 2.4% and Caffeine-Free Diet Pepsi 1.5%. All shares were up slightly.

Test marketing began for Mountain Dew Sport, aimed at siphoning away some of Gatorade's $350 million-plus sales and 90% market share among isotonic sports drinks.

PepsiCo supported its Frito-Lay snack food division with $48.2 million in media spending, up 32.8%. That total balloons to about $90 million when adding in unmeasured support, such as sales promotion, couponing, etc. The F-L brand getting the largest ad dollar attention again was Doritos, $19.6 million, up 28.1%.

The heavy support shows the value of Frito-Lay to PepsiCo. The division's worldwide sales grew to $4.2 billion in 1989, or 28% of PepsiCo's total revenues. F-L's operating profit spiraled to $821 million, or 42% of the corporate total.

Ruffles potato chips got $10.6 million in media, up 67.6% in 1989. Ruffles Light, Chee-Tos Light and Doritos Light rolled out nationally this spring backed by an estimated $20 million marketing campaign. The campaign followed strong tests in several states that eased concerns that "lighter" chips have less flavor. F-L competitors discovered this problem in previous attempts to carve out this segment niche. An F-L cooking process extracts the oil from Ruffles, for example, after they are cooked.

Ruffles were F-L's leading sales generator, with $560 million manufacturers level in 1989, up 8.7%, followed by Lay's at $420 million, up 5.7%, estimates Snack Food magazine. F-L's salted snacks in fact grew at twice the 5% rate of the salted snacks industry and represent about 50% of the market.

F-L decentralized its operations into regionalized units, a move seen by observers as a defensive maneuver to counter inroads into its domain by Borden, Anheuser-Busch (Eagle snacks), Keebler and Procter & Gamble.

Pfizer Inc. continued into 1990 its policy of building market share by spinning out new line extensions of its power brands. The plan met with mixed results in 1989, as Ben-Gay and Barbasol lost share points and Visine held tight to its dominant share—all of which were fortified by brand extensions.

In the consumer products division—formerly called Leeming/Pacquin—line extensions Visine AC and Visine Extra helped Pfizer's Visine remain the leader with a 50% share of the eye-care market. Measured spending registered $14.8 million, up 11%. This year, Pfizer rolled out Visine L.R., a long-acting relief for irritated eyes.

Ben-Gay Warming Ice, a line extension supported with $2.2 million in measured media, helped Ben-Gay meet encroaching competition from Bristol-Myers Squibb's Mineral Ice. But as a brand, Ben-Gay slipped from 39% to 35% of market, according to Julie Wolf, a consultant with Kline & Co. Measured spending dropped 56.3% for the Ben-Gay brand to $2.4 million.

Barbasol Gel, a line extension to Barbasol, the shaving market leader with 20% of the category, did not perform well. Retailers blame the modest performance of the gel on fierce competition from other gels such as Edge as well as cannibalization from Barbasol regular. LNA/Arbitron figures point to another problem—no measured spending against Barbasol versus a mere $1 million devoted to the brand in 1988.

More than $19 million in media (up 27%) backed Plax, an oral hygiene brand acquired in 1988, and helped it retain third place in the mouthwash arena behind Warner-Lambert's Listerine and Procter & Gamble's Scope. More than $150 million worth of Plax was sold worldwide last year.

Pfizer continues to be criticized for its Plax commercials that claim Plax is "clinically proven to remove more plaque than brushing alone." Various plaque-fighting products were reviewed by Consumer Reports last year, and Plax was found not to live up to its claims. Pfizer has denied all such claims.

The company is employing an unusual marketing tactic this year by test marketing a new product called Water-Jel in McDonald's restaurants. The product, intended for treatment of minor burns, comes in packets.

Pfizer's Coty division fared well in 1989 and so far in 1990 at a time of industrywide consolidation: Schering-Plough shed its Maybelline Co. cosmetics business; American Cyanamid Co. sold off its Shulton products including Old Spice.

Coty's Stetson and exclamation! remain in the top five-selling fragrances in drug chains, according to Ted Peterson, VP-trade relations for the National Assn. of Chain Drug Stores, Alexandria, Va. Measured spending behind Stetson for men totaled $8 million while another $7.1 million was pumped into Lady Stetson, up 9.5% and 12.7%, respectively.

Spending against exclamation! was $7.4 million, up 30%. Volume for the women's scent is approaching $30 million—almost double initial expectations. Flush with the success of both items, Coty is planning two new fragrances—Analtsa floral cologne and Chill Out Cologne Spritzer. Coty also markets Sand & Sable with spending just over $2 million.

The company's Iron men's scent generated sales of $7 million in 1989, although short of expectations. Measured spending dipped 22% to $4.5 million.

The Coty division makes strong use of network TV. The four popular scents—exclamation!, Iron, Lady Stetson and Stetson for men—were backed by a combined $27.3 million in media, of which 76% was network TV and the remainder largely magazines.

Pfizer continues to be one of several companies marketing pharmaceutical items directly to consumers via advertisements in health publications and health-related cable programs.

Philip Morris Cos. pumped up its international marketing muscle with an agreement to acquire Swiss coffee and confectionery giant Jacobs Suchard in June 1990.

The $3.8 billion deal promises to make PM, already the world's largest consumer package goods company, a leader in European ground roast coffee and No. 3 among Europe's confectionery marketers.

The acquisition also brings the company into closer competition with marketing superpower Nestle SA. Suchard's brands include Milka and Toblerone chocolates, Kroenung, Night & Day and Jacobs Cafe coffee. Not included in the PM deal were Suchard's Canadian subsidiary and E.J. Brach, its U.S. candy company.

In August 1990, PM appointed Raymond Viault, formerly Maxwell House division president, to CEO of Jacobs Suchard. Mr. Viault is succeeded by Charles Phillips, formerly of Kraft General Foods International, where he was president-Latin America, Eastern Europe, Middle East and Africa.

PM's sweet tooth for acquisitions may not have been satisfied by Suchard, however. Analysts said the company is expected to make another large-scale acquisition soon because of its strong cash flow position. That cash is generated mainly by PM's tobacco operations, which posted another record year in 1989. PM defied the odds, gaining 2.6 share points in the U.S. tobacco market in 1989, to 41.9%, despite a 6% slump in industry-wide unit sales.

According to Wheat, First Securities analyst John Maxwell, PM's growth in the market was led by Marlboro, which picked up an additional 1.4 share points in 1989, sending its share to 26.3%. The brand family received $75 million in media and got a line extension, Marlboro Menthol, introduced nationally.

PM stunned the industry in 1989 by bringing out its long-rumored "de-nicotinized" cigarette, made by a process borrowed from coffee decaffeination. The cigarette is testing in five markets either under the Merit DeNic or Next DeNic name. Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles.

PM this October will test Benson & Hedges DeNic in Phoenix. Sales of regular B&H cigarettes have been ailing. The brand dropped below a 4% share in 1989 from 4.1% the prior year. Last October PM asked its shops to come up with new creative for B&H, but the $60 million account remained at Wells, Rich, Greene, New York. PM has reportedly considered positioning B&H as a less upscale brand.

PM rolled out Virginia Slims Superslims, a low-smoke, small-circumference brand for women in 1989, which the company said has racked up more than a 0.5% share. The company also is testing Cartier Vendome, a ritzy, premium-price cigarette on the West Coast via Backer Spielvogel Bates, New York.

PM moved to strengthen its lineup in the price-value category, an industry category now accounting for 18% of all cigarettes sold. In 1989 it began testing two price-value brands—Bucks and Bristol. It also converted Alpine from full to generic pricing.

PM continued to hold the line on outdoor advertising for its cigarettes, spending $55 million in the medium, about the same as in 1988. A downward trend among cigarette marketers is anticipated by the medium. Tobacco advertisers this summer have faced heavy criticism from community groups concerning their heavy use of outdoor boards in minority areas.

PM drew criticism for its $60 million "Bill of Rights" corporate campaign in 1989 from anti-smoking groups that claimed it was a veiled attempt at advertising cigarettes on TV. (There is a Philip Morris cigarette.) PM's network TV and print campaign celebrated the Bill of Rights and offered a free copy of the document to viewers. Ogilvy & Mather, New York, handled.

An aggressive new-products program and $65 million in measured 1989 spending advanced General Foods USA's Maxwell House's coffee share to 27.5%, up from 27% in 1988, according to Mr. Maxwell. Procter & Gamble's Folgers, meanwhile, crept to 32.2% from 31.8%. By mid-1990, GF's Maxwell House had gained steam, though. Only about two share points are believed to separate the two.

The Maxwell House revitalization came from a host of new Maxwell House products in 1989 including Colombian Supreme ground coffee, Maxwell House Rich French Roast and Maxwell House pre-measured Filter Packs.

In 1990 the company rolled out a "slow-roasted" nostalgia brand called Maxwell House 1892 and began testing a refrigerated liquid coffee concentrate under the Maxwell House name, and a bottled iced coffee called Cappio. D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, which snared the $65 million-$70 million Maxwell House account from Ogilvy & Mather, New York, in 1989, handles all the new products, with the exception of Cappio, which is at Margeottes Fertitta & Weiss, New York.

GF got into hot water in spring 1990 over its Maxwell House campaign that claimed taste tests showed "America prefers Maxwell House" to Folgers. Ads were modified when NBC and CBS-TV refused them under pressure from P&G. The tagline was changed to "America loves Maxwell House."

Unlike Maxwell House, there was no turnaround for GF's other troubled unit, Post cereals, which cut its media spending for all brands 4.7% to $102 million. Hurt in part from the fallout in oat bran cereals, Post continued to lose share in 1989, dropping from 11.4% in 1988 to 10.5% in 1989. GF had pinned its hopes on two new major oat-based entries in 1989, Post Oat Flakes and Honey Bunches of Oats, but despite $25 million-plus in marketing budgets for each, neither was able to maintain even a 1% share.

Kraft General Foods' strategy during 1989-90 was to become "fat-free." KGF's Entenmann's Bakery unit began testing a line of fat- and cholesterol-free, low-calorie baked goods. KGF Frozen rolled out cholesterol-free Sealtest Fat Free dessert bars, Sealtest Free frozen dairy dessert and frozen yogurt, and Light 'n Lively Free no-fat refrigerated yogurt.

Kraft USA rolled out Kraft Free no-fat salad dressings in March 1990. Kraft Free is a particularly important product for KGF, whose salad dressing share (including Seven Seas) dropped to 40.9% in 1989 from 42.7% a year earlier. Its main competitor, Clorox Co. at a 20% share, met the fat-free challenge with the rollout of Take Heart low-fat dressings.

In August 1989, Kraft reached an agreement to use NutraSweet Co.'s Simplesse in mayonnaise and Miracle Whip, while parent KGF applied for FDA approval for its own fat substitute, code-named Trailblazer, which is made from egg whites and milk.

In frozen novelties, GF USA (Jell-O, Crystal Light, Kool-Aid novelty lines) lost its leading share of 9.6% to Unilever at 17.9% when Unilever added newly acquired Gold Bond to its Good Humor share.

Synergies promised from PM between food units GF and Kraft came to fruition in 1989, with GF folding its Culinova refrigerated entree business under the Kraft Chillery label, and a year later, changing its Impromptu shelf-stable line to Kraft Microwave Entrees. Frozen meals also were built up with the rollout of Kraft blue box entrees, handled by Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, and competing with Stouffer's red box line.

KGF consolidated its media services units for an estimated savings of $15 million annually. David Braun, former director of media and promotional services at GF USA, was named VP-media services of the combined unit, which spends $750 million annually on advertising. President-CEO Michael Miles added the post of chairman from John Richman, who took early retirement in October, and Charles Martin was named VP-marketing services at Kraft USA, succeeding Joel Weiner, who left.

Miller Brewing's share of the U.S. beer market moved up a share point 22.4% in 1989, according to Beverage Industry magazine. Miller rolled out Lowenbrau Light and Sharp's non-alcoholic beer during the year. It was expected to spend $5 million-$7 million on Sharp's in 1990 via Franklin, Laughlin & Constable, Milwaukee.

Miller Brewing, like Anheuser-Busch, cut its media expenditures in 1989. Miller spent $150.2 million for all brands, off 11.3% from 1988. The difference came out of spending for Miller High Life, $28.3 million, down 17%; Genuine Draft, $46.3 million, down 15% and Miller Lite, $64 million, down 6%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

In 1990, Miller is facing new competition from Anheuser-Busch, which began testing Busch Cold Filtered Draft targeted at Miller Genuine Draft. Miller Genuine Draft sold 4.5 million barrels in 1989, up 21.6%, according to Beverage Industry.

Miller may soon move national with a light version of Genuine Draft, originally tested as Lite Genuine Draft, and Genuine Draft Light.

Miller sewed up a four-year, $130 million deal with the National Basketball Assn. in March 1990 giving the brewer exclusive rights to promote its involvement with NBC/NBA broadcasts in POP materials. Although the company reached agreement with NBA to call Miller "the malt beverage of the NBA" Miller won't be the games' exclusive sponsor.

■ Annual review

sumer operations have appeared relatively insulated from the turmoil at NAP's Dutch parent company, Philips NV, which took a $1.44 billion charge against earnings earlier this year, planned 10,000 layoffs worldwide and forced its president into early retirement.

NAP is expected to experience some of the fallout, especially in its mainframe consumer business, while its U.S. consumer business may even benefit. Some analysts say Philips will put additional emphasis on its consumer businesses after winnowing its unsuccessful units.

NAP's various divisions already are ad spending leaders in at least two of the four consumer product categories it is in and isn't far behind in the others.

NAP's Philips Consumer Electronics in the last two years has been the biggest ad spender in the U.S. on consumer electronics. The more than $30 million the company said it spent on supporting the Magnavox line, together with additional spending on its three other brands, Philips, Sylvania and Philco, towers over rivals. NAP has advertised heavily to gain market share, even when competitors have cut advertising citing profitability concerns.

Magnavox is the No. 3 brand of TV sets with a 6.4% share of unit sales last year, up from 5.85% in 1988, according to Television Digest, an industry newsletter. With Sylvania, Philips and Philco's 4.65% share, down from 4.8%, NAP has more than 11% of the U.S. market.

In camcorders, Magnavox was No. 5 at a 6.7% share, up from 6.5%, and Sylvania added another 1%. In VCRs Magnavox held a 6.55% share, up from 5.5%. The other brands added 1.9%. In the U.S., NAP positions Philips as the technology leader and prices it on the high end, Magnavox is priced mid-range and Philco as the lower priced. Sylvania and Philips also have been used to reflect different distribution lines.

Philips expanded and upgraded its Sylvania line and brought back the Philco name it had taken out of distribution. The company moved to expand the Magnavox name more strongly into home office products, especially home computers. Headstart Technologies, formerly a separate NAP company, has been integrated into Philips Consumer Electronics and now markets under the Magnavox brand. NAP spent $14.9 million on its various brands of TV sets in 1989, down 24.7%, with reduced spending for Magnavox the reason for the drop.

Norelco Consumer Products, which holds more than 50% of the men's electric shaver market under the Norelco name, will spend more than $40 million this year advertising a new version of its lift and cut razors, making it by far the category leader. Men's and women's shavers got $28.4 million in media backing in 1989, up 64%.

Norelco holds about 7% of the iron business and more than 30% of the women's electric shaver market.

NAP's Polygram Records, a little advertised unit, is turning more aggressive by launching its first network TV spots in nearly 10 years to tout a recording of a concert at the Berlin Wall. Polygram's purchase last year of A&M Records and Island Records has made it the third largest distributor. Island, A&M and Polygram, however, remain separate for most marketing functions, with distribution merged.

Polygram's chart share of popular albums rose to 7.3% for the first half of the year compared with 6.5% for all of 1989, according to Billboard magazine.

Philips Lighting Co. remains second in the U.S. (behind GE) with about 20% of the market. With heavy competition for normal bulbs, Philips has introduced a variety of specialty bulbs, including soft tone pastel bulbs last year that pushed Philip's home light bulb-spending to $8.2 million from virtually nothing in 1988. Other specialties—a bulb that dims instead of burning out, a fluorescent bulb that screws into a regular socket—have been added to the line.

Philips N.V. named Jan D. Timmer, formerly chairman of consumer electronics, president, replacing the retiring Cornelis J. van der Klugt. At NAP, Stephen C. Tumminello, former NAP exec VP-vice chairman, was named NAP's president-CEO. He replaced Einar Kloster, who had advanced to president-CEO of Philips Lighting Holding B.V., the lighting products arm of the parent company.

Procter & Gamble Co. underscored its commitment to become an international of Edwin L. Artzt, 59, as chairman-CEO.

Mr. Artzt, who as P&G International vice chairman-president orchestrated a dramatic turnaround of P&G in Japan, plans to push P&G's international sales to 60% during his tenure, a considerable boost from its 38% in fiscal 1990. He succeeded John G. Smale, who retired this January.

"The company is really coming alive, using its clout in a productive manner," said Lynne Hyman, a First Boston analyst. "Although in many ways P&G is still catching up globally, its strategy is to move with concepts that work well in one place, like Pert Plus, and make those global brands."

Pert Plus, a combination shampoo and conditioner with 12.5% of the $1.4 billion U.S. category, was introduced in 22 countries in fiscal 1990. In September, P&G introduced Vidal Sassoon Ultra Care, a combination shampoo, conditioner and finishing rinse, to follow up the successful launch of Pert Plus. P&G also upped spending behind the No. 2 shampoo, Head & Shoulders, to $27.5 million, up 41.8%, to introduce Head & Shoulders Dry Scalp formula.

P&G became the top marketer of cosmetics in mass-market outlets with the September 1989 purchase of Noxell Corp. for $1.3 billion. Noxell markets Cover Girl and Clarion makeup lines.

This July, the company reorganized its health, beauty and personal-care operations into two new business units, a health care sector and a beauty-care sector. Noxell now is part of beauty-care. The move split the Richardson-Vicks division, placing RVI's Oil of Olay into the beauty-care and its Nyquil and Vicks cough-cold remedies into health care. The Norwich division, created in 1982 after P&G acquired the drug business of Morton-Norwich Products, moved into health care.

P&G in January 1990 acquired the Hawaiian Punch juice-drink brand from Del Monte Corp. for about $150 million, and within six months revived "Punchy," the animated Hawaiian Punch spokescharacter, in a campaign titled "Punchy's Greatest Hits" from N W Ayer, New York. Ayer handles Citrus Hill juices and its new three-item lemonade line in addition to the $10 million Hawaiian Punch account.

In July 1990, it completed its estimated $330 million purchase of the toiletries and fragrances portion of American Cyanamid's Shulton Group, excluding the Pierre Cardin fragrance line. P&G added Old Spice and Santa Fe men's fragrance and toiletries, giving the company a much-desired lead in the men's toiletries market. Old Spice and Santa Fe were assigned in August to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, from Scali, McCabe, Sloves, New York.

The company in August 1990 dropped plans to market Maalox antacid and other Rhone-Poulenc Rorer brands after the Justice Department filed an antitrust suit charging the deal would give P&G too big a share of the OTC stomach remedies market. The government estimated P&G and Rorer would have controlled combined sales of $236 million in the $900 million category. P&G in 1989 supported Pepto-Bismol, holding a 12% share, with $20.3 million in media, down 25%.

P&G, in the first of several environmental initiatives, began testing a refill carton for Downy fabric softener, introduced a 100% recycled plastic container for Spic & Span liquid pine cleaner and began using recycled plastics for its liquid laundry detergent containers.

It also began testing superconcentrated powder detergents as "Ultra" versions of Tide, Cheer, Oxydol and Gain.

P&G introduced nationally Cheer Free (no dyes or perfumes). Cheer media spending climbed 33% to $16.2 million in support of the national launch. Cheer has a 7.5% share of the $3.8 billion category.

Tide, the detergent category leader with a 31.5% share, was supported with $52.1 million in media, up 110%.

Cascade, the leader in the $500 million automatic dishwasher detergent category, was supported with $19.8 million, up 43.1%. P&G is testing Cascade Gel. The gel helps prevent the detergent from separating in the bottle.

P&G's Folgers coffee checked in with the highest level of media support in 1989 of $90.4 million, a 58% gain. Folgers won out in the battle with Kraft General Foods' Maxwell House as the top selling coffee, but P&G finished second in total coffee sales to Kraft GF.

P&G in fall 1989 introduced Folgers Gourmet Supreme, its response to the introduction of GF's Maxwell House Colombian Supreme. Then in early 1990 it persuaded the TV networks not to air two commercials that claimed consumers preferred Maxwell House to Folgers.

P&G, according to Kidder, Peabody & ground coffee market, and a 20% share of the $950 million instant coffee market in the U.S.

In the $1 billion cooking-oil market, P&G's Crisco and Puritan hold a combined 28% share. P&G supported Crisco shortening and cooking oil brands with $21.4 million in media, up 40%.

P&G in September introduced the Oil of Olay Cleansing Collection, a five-item line of Foaming Face Wash, Water-Rinsable Cold Cream and Refreshing Toner, and the existing Facial Cleansing Bar and Facial Cleansing Lotion.

P&G leads the $600 million mass-market facial moisturizer market with a 26% share. Oil of Olay drew $44.4 million in media support, up 41.4%.

Crest, the leading toothpaste in the $1.05 billion category with a 36% share, got $40.9 million in media, even with 1988. Squeezable Soft Pump Crest toothpaste dispensers are in test. They return to their original shape after squeezed.

With the addition of Old Spice from American Cyanamid, P&G now controls 31.5% of the $1.1 billion deodorant market. P&G backed Secret, its leading brand with a 14% share, with $21.1 million in media, up 11.6%.

Spending behind Nyquil, the leading cold remedy, remained stable in 1989 at $27.4 million.

P&G in March 1990 expanded nationally Luvs prints with different designs for boys and girls. Luvs was supported with $20.8 million, up 19%. Pampers for Boys and Pampers for Girls also hit the market, an indication that consumers preferred gender-specific diapers. P&G currently holds a 49.5% share of the $3.7 billion disposable diaper category, having neither gained nor lost ground to archrival Kimberly-Clark Corp., which recently announced it would launch Huggies for Him and Huggies for Her.

P&G made a number of media-buying moves in 1990, taking $25 million in network TV evening news media-buying assignments from D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles and moving it to N W Ayer, New York. In July 1990 it consolidated $110 million in magazine media-buying at Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York. Leo Burnett USA (teen, beauty and fashion magazine buying) and Tatham-Laird & Kudner (men's buying) together lost $36 million in the shift.

■ Annual review

Quaker Oats Co. slashed its media spending during 1989 as it moved to become a food-only company with a new strategy that focuses advertising on high-growth, high-margin product lines.

Food became its sole focus when earlier this year it announced plans to spin off the Fisher-Price toy subsidiary to shareholders by yearend.

Shortly afterwards, Quaker reorganized its largest unit, U.S. and Canadian Grocery Products, shuffled managers from brand group to brand group and added a Frozen Foods division to oversee Aunt Jemima frozen products, Celeste pizza and new products.

The company embarked on a risky strategy to bring advertising and marketing expenses in line with sales increases, by focusing ad dollars on sports drinks, hot and ready-to-eat cereals, frozen foods and certain pet food categories—all high-growth, high-margin categories.

The strategy produced some alarming drops in unit volume sales during the just completed fiscal year among the company's more mature product lines: pet foods were down 19%; Aunt Jemima frozen foods, down 11%; Celeste pizza, down 9%; Golden Grain, down 9%; Van Camp beans, down 9%.

Coupled with the "planned declines" in those categories came some bad luck in others: A cool, rainy summer cut into Gatorade sales.

In January 1990, just as Quaker Oat Bran ready-to-eat cereal was reaching national distribution, the New England Journal of Medicine published a research report questioning oat bran's effect on blood cholesterol levels. Although Quaker used TV and print ads to point out that oat bran's cholesterol-reduction properties were supported by 27 years of research, the pr and ad effort wasn't enough. The oat bran craze was over, and Quaker's oat bran sales fell 50% in short order.

Overall, Quaker's hot cereals experienced a 6% decline in unit volumes during fiscal 1990, although the company held onto a leading 61% of the $600 million market.

Although less dependent on oat bran, the company's ready-to-eat cereals saw unit volumes decline 9% during fiscal 1990; Quaker's No. 4 share of the $6.9 billion market fell from 8.7% to 8.0% for the year ended in May.

In addition to the cold oat bran cereal, Quaker—like competitors Kellogg Co. and Ralston Purina Co.—introduced a cold rice bran product, Crunchy Rice Bran, in February.

Quaker's single largest brand, Gatorade, continued to dominate the $500 million U.S. market for sports drinks, with more than a 90% share. But Quaker held its breath as soft-drink giants Coca-Cola Co. and Pepsi-Cola Co. introduced products that encroach on Gatorade's franchise. Pepsi-Cola's Mountain Dew Sport, a bottled sports drink in regular and low-calorie varieties, is seen as the more direct competitor. As a defensive move, Quaker introduced into limited markets two new Gatorade offshoots, Freestyle and low-calorie Gatorade Light. It also began testing Gatorade in fountain systems; Coca-Cola's PowerAde is being distributed in fountain systems as well.

Although Gatorade remains Quaker's largest advertised brand, media spending fell 25%, to $20.5 million, during calendar 1989, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The effect of Quaker's new marketing strategy could best be seen in its pet foods division, which, with unit volumes down 19% in fiscal 1990, remains the company's biggest challenge. Quaker continued advertising Kibbles'n Bits 'n Bits 'n Bits soft-dry dog food, and Cycle canned and dry dog foods, but essentially eliminated advertising for other brands, including King Kuts canned dog food, Gravy Train dry dog food and Tender Chops soft-dry dog food.

Quaker was the clear No. 2 pet food marketer after its acquisition of Gaines Foods in 1987. Sales declines over the past three years now tie it for third with Mars Inc.'s Kal Kan division (each with 12% of the pet food market), behind both Ralston (27%) and Carnation Co. (14%) in the $6 billion pet food industry, according to John C. Maxwell Jr., analyst with Wheat, First Securities.

Reflecting its desire to focus on high-margin growth products, Quaker's pet food division will launch Frisbee Flying Dog Treats in limited distribution this fall. The $430 million dog treat market, where Quaker's Ken-L Ration brands have about an 8% share, is growing at a faster clip than the rest of the industry.

The new Frozen Foods division gets its first test this fall, when OvenStuffs frozen microwaveable sandwiches go national with a $22 million ad, marketing and promo budget.

Quaker started up Quaker Direct, a direct mail program that will reach a select database of consumers. The program is set to begin this fall with a tie-in to CBS-TV's fall schedule.

Among management shifts, Chairman-CEO William Smithburg will assume the additional responsibilities of President-COO Frank Morgan, who retires this month.

Annual review
Strong results from new product introductions and heavy advertising kept Ralston Purina's share in the highly contested pet foods, cold cereals and battery markets on an even keel in 1989.

After suffering through two years of flat sales with Eveready Battery Co., purchased in 1986, Ralston shelved its marketing approach to hone in on just the Energizer line, switching the $25 million account to Chiat/Day/Mojo from DDB Needham.

Ralston, which previously had locked in on a divide-and-conquer marketing strategy by creating Eveready Classic and Conductor specialty products to build its share in the $3 billion U.S. battery market, got an unusual TV campaign with creative that parodied advertising.

The campaign introduced the drum-beating bunny, powered by an Energizer, which interrupted mock commercials. Airing began during the second game of the 1989 World Series. The bunny became omnipresent during the fourth quarter, pushing full-year Energizer media totals to $27.2 million.

Energizer battery advertising carried the Eveready brand, which received $30.8 million, down 28% from the prior year.

Ralston sought greater hegemony in the worldwide battery market through acquisition. It purchased COFINEA, the French holding company that controls Mazda and Wonder, the best-selling dry cell battery brands in France, and bought Eveready Australia/New Zealand.

Although energized on TV, Eveready remained at about 36.4% for the year against Duracell's 40.4% share of the $2 billion alkaline battery market, according to Nielsen Marketing Research. Company and agency execs expected the spots to have a residual effect on sales in 1990, when replacement decisions in the slow-moving market are made.

Ralston boosted spending 21.3% for pet foods to $63.3 million in 1989 and managed to hold its ground in the $6.21 billion pet food market (food stores). It lost a slight 0.1 point as its share slipped to 27.1% of market. Its weakness if any was in the dry dog food sector which accounted for 30.2% of all pet food sales and 50% of Ralston's. Ralston pet foods are generally marketed under the Purina banner.

Purina again claimed the top two positions in the category with Dog Chow and Puppy Chow, as Dog Chow grew 2.3% in dollar sales and Puppy Chow declined 3.2%, according to John C. Maxwell, analyst with Wheat, First Securities. An on-package coupon campaign cross-promoted Purina Dog Chow and the new syndicated Lassie TV show.

But without new entries in the market Purina would have suffered a 3.8% decline in sales from brands existing in both years. As it was, Purina dog food sales advanced 1.4%, according to Mr. Maxwell.

New entries in the category were led by Pro Plan with new sales of $28 million backed by $857,400 in advertising, largely spot TV; Prime, $12.5 million in sales supported by $5.2 million in advertising, divided between magazines and network TV; and Beef Complete, $4.8 million in sales backed by $1.7 million in media split between magazines and spot TV.

Ralston Purina established Pro-Visions Pet Specialty Enterprises earlier this year to develop new pet food products and marketing plans directed at the out-of-supermarket market, estimated to be worth $600 million. It is a division of the Grocery Products Group.

The Grocery Products Group in 1989 introduced four new licensed cereals—Nintendo Cereal System, Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles, Batman and Breakfast with Barbie—which helped Ralston improve its dollar share of the $6.8 billion cold cereal market to 6.6%. A boost in cereal media spending of 26.8% to $34.5 million also contributed to growth.

Breakfast with Barbie marked the first venture between Barbie's parent Mattel Inc. and a package goods marketer. Avrett, Free & Ginsberg, New York, handled the $10 million introduction, using network and spot TV, print and coupons as well as an in-pack diamond giveaway. AFG also received the Cookie Crisp account formerly handled by Noble-Tennant, Chicago, and supported the October debut of Oat Chex with TV, print, FSIs and cross-promotion.

These character-licensed products in fact were the only reason the company improved its market share. They added 1.4 share points combined as Ralston's traditional lineup dropped 0.7 share points led by a decline in its top cereal, Chex, which fell from 3.2% of market to 2.9% in 1989.

Ralston subsidiary Continental Baking Company moved its $8 million Wonder Bread account from Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, to Grey Advertising, New York. Continental also unveiled Hostess Lights, a line of 97% fat-free, no-cholesterol snack cupcakes, developed in response to increasing consumer demand for more nutritionally sound products. TBWA/Kerlick Switzer, St. Louis, handled the introductory campaign, which consisted primarily of spot TV.

Earlier this year Ralston announced it would be taking part in a promotional effort aimed at planting 100,000 tree seedlings in response to consumers who call a 900 telephone number printed on boxes of Almond Delight, Oat Bran Options and Rice Bran Options cereals.

Ralston set itself up in a new market in 1989 with the purchase of Beech-Nut Nutrition Corp. from Nestle SA. Beech-Nut is a distant second to Gerber Products Co. in the baby-food market.

Annual review

Revlon in 1990 continues its aggressive introduction of new scents despite an overall decline in the $4 billion women's and men's fragrance industry.

Following a 1989 agreement with Guess? Inc. to market fragrances and cosmetics under the apparel manufacturer's name, Revlon earlier this year introduced Guess, an upscale perfume for women. Ads for the product feature Guess and Chanel model Claudia Schiffler.

The campaign was created by Paul Marciano, a Guess creative director.

Miss Schiffler's appearance in the ad is expected to attract a new breed of young customers to Revlon, a group that shops for cosmetics primarily in drugstores.

Revlon is appealing to older buyers as well with its "Unforgettable Women" ad campaign that features mature spokespeople. The drop-off in department store attendance also has forced inventory reductions by the big stores, sending customers, who tend to be older, into drugstores.

All other advertising at Revlon is handled in-house by Tarlow Advertising, which Revlon acquired last year for an estimated $11 million.

Tarlow already was handling $65 million in Revlon business. It will keep its other clients, worth an additional $10 million. Agency president Dick Tarlow was named Revlon exec VP-advertising. Revlon's existing in-house shop, Creative Workshop, remains an autonomous unit although it may be folded into Tarlow.

Although Revlon said at the time it acquired Tarlow that other agencies would not be dropped, the company parted with Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos (Classic Revlon, Intimate, Neat-Touch, Super Lustrous Lipsticks); with Hal Riney & Partners (Princess Marcella Borghese); and Ketchum Advertising (new products)—consolidating their accounts with Tarlow.

All together, Tarlow handles an estimated $80 million in billings, including No Sweat, the company's new anti-perspirant line, and a line of Revlon International shampoos.

In addition to Guess, Revlon in 1990 will introduce Unforgettable, a women's fragrance, as an extension of its "Unforgettable Women" ad campaign. The new scent will be supported by an estimated $8 million effort that features excerpts from the Nat King Cole song of the same name.

The "Unforgettable" umbrella campaign for the company's cosmetics lines has featured print ads with Oprah Winfrey as well as famous husband-and-wife teams Don Johnson and Melanie Griffith and Barbara and Frank Sinatra. Actor Dan Aykroyd and his wife, Donna Dixon, are appearing in current ads.

Existing women's fragrance lines got additional support in 1990. The 10-year-old Ciara line signed former Revlon Ultima II model Lauren Hutton as its spokesperson.

California fragrance line, introduced in 1989 under Revlon's Max Factor division, with Jaclyn Smith as its spokesperson, continues to be a strong seller. The line, according to the company, reported sales between $20 million and $30 million. Revlon this year plans a line extension called California for Men.

Revlon backed its fragrance lines with $28 million in media in 1989, up 63.7%. The main difference between the two years was new ad monies for California of $5.1 million. Ad support in general was borne by magazines, except for the California launch that weighted toward network and syndicated TV. Revlon gave token media support for new fragrance entries in 1989: Montana and Electric Youth.

No Sweat deodorant was introduced this spring with a $12 million campaign. The product is what Revlon calls a "breakthrough" because the deodorant formula is microencapsulated to offer time-released protection throughout the day.

An increase in awareness of animal testing and a fresher approach toward makeup application have stimulated sales at Revlon's Almay division. Almay, a hypoallergenic line, is seeing increased competition in the marketplace, most notably from Noxell's Prescriptive line and Plenitude from L'Oreal. But Almay remains the leader in the category, according to Diana Temple, analyst with Salomon Bros. The entire Almay line drew $11.9 million in media, about the same as in 1988.

Revlon controls 5.2% of the $4.6 billion U.S. skin-care market (supermarket sales), powered primarily by new 1989 product line Clean & Clear with a 3.3% share. Revlon ranks third in the market to P&G's 16.4% and Unilever's 15%.

Revlon held a 5.3% share of the shampoo market in 1989 behind P&G (32.7%) and Helene Curtis (14.6%). Flex was the main contributor with a 3.6% share, followed by Clean & Clear at 1.3%. Revlon backed its Clean & Clear line with $7.1 million in new ad dollars and the Flex line with $5.2 million, more than double 1988 media expenditures.

Revlon is teaming with Nintendo to create a shampoo and bubble bath line for children. Products include Super Mario Bros. Princess and Mario shampoo and bubble bath.

Annual review

RJR Nabisco in 1989 sliced its advertising budget as part of a companywide move to hold down costs while paying back debt incurred from the company's $25 billion buyout by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. in 1988.

The company pared media spending by $50 million for the year. Advertising isn't expected to move much this year either: RJR Tobacco late in 1989 told magazine publishers it would slash its print budget by 25% or an estimated $26 million in 1990. It also stopped the traditional practice of promoting cigarettes at the end of each quarter to move inventories.

RJR cigarette products, however, finished 1989 with a marginal increase in measured spending—to $172.8 million, up 3%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Much of the debt reduction in 1988-89 came from the sale of businesses: The European foods operation was sold to BSN Groupe, Paris, for $2.5 billion; Chun King was bought by Yeo Hiap Send Ltd. and Fullerton Holdings Pte. Ltd. for $52 million; Del Monte fresh fruits went to British company Polly Peck International for $875 million; Del Monte processed foods were picked up by a management group backed by Citicorp and Kikkomann Corp. of Japan for $1.48 billion; Nabisco's Baby Ruth and Butterfinger brands were snapped up by Nestle Foods for $370 million.

RJR has had its Milk-Bone dog biscuits on the block since mid-1990, but no takers have surfaced at presstime.

Cost savings also came from the reduction of 1,640 jobs, or more than 11% of the workforce, at R.J. Reynolds Tobacco in August 1989. Another estimated $8 million was saved when Nabisco Brands canceled its umbrella sponsorship of the Professional Golfers Assn. Tour in February 1990.

The cost-cutting turned out to be an unexpected boon for one of the company's agencies. FCB/Leber Katz Partners, when Nabisco Brands disbanded its in-house media buying staff, awarding the $140 million-plus buying assignment to the agency in fall 1989.

FCB/LKP in July had been awarded Winston cigarettes from McCann-Erickson Worldwide, New York, in a shift which also saw Camel move from McCann to Young & Rubicam, New York.

By year's end RJR had spent $23 million on Camel, down 11.5%, and another $29 million on Winston, down 34.5%, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Both brands lost share in 1989. Winston finished the year with a 9.2% market share, down from 10.7% a year earlier, while Camel dropped to 2.7% from 2.9%. Overall, RJR's share of the tobacco market slid to 28.6% from 31.8% in 1988, according to Wheat, First Securities analyst John Maxwell. The company's biggest gains came from the sector in which all tobacco companies are gaining share—the price-value end—where RJR's Doral moved from 3.4% of market to 3.6%, and Magna moved from 0.1% to 0.5%.

New management moved into the tobacco unit in July 1989 as David Iauco became senior VP-marketing, succeeding John Winebrenner, who moved to senior VP-RJR Tobacco International. Mr. Iauco, formerly senior VP at RJR Tobacco Development Co., had overseen the Premier "smokeless" cigarette, another casualty of buyout debt.

The company also canceled test marketing of Uptown, a black-targeted cigarette, after public outcry from religious, political and health officials. Uptown, handled by Trone Advertising, Greensboro, N.C., had been slated for test in Philadelphia in February 1990.

Only weeks later, RJR made national headlines with Dakota, also handled by Trone Advertising, when the marketing plan was leaked to the press. The plan positioned the brand as appealing to "virile females." RJR said the brand, which did go into two test markets, was targeted at both men and women smokers of Philip Morris USA's Marlboro.

Nabisco Brands continued an aggressive new products program in 1989, with a few notable flops. Encouraged by the success of Teddy Grahams cookies, which rang up $150 million in first-year sales, the company extended the concept to a ready-to-eat children's cereal in October. But the cereal came up short with a marginal market share of 0.3% by mid-1990.

Another Nabisco cereal, 100% Bran with Oat Bran, also failed to boost Nabisco's share in the $6.9 billion cold cereal market, where the company dropped to a 4.6% share for the period ended May 1990, down 0.7 points. Along with a hot cereal entry, Wholesome 'N Hearty Oat Bran, Nabisco's attempt to capitalize on the oat bran phenomenon failed along with similar efforts by other companies when a study casting doubt on oat bran's cholesterol-reducing ability tumbled the oat bran market.

Nabisco Spoon Size Shredded Wheat Plus, a fortified version to go head-to-head with a similar Kellogg Co. entry called Whole Grain Shredded Wheat, was introduced, and Nabisco took issue with Kellogg's claim that it was "the most nutritious" shredded wheat; the companies settled out-of-court.

Nabisco Foods defended its leadership position in the $430 million dog snacks segment with Tartar Control Milk-Bone for a pooch's periodontal problems in November 1989.

Nabisco Biscuit, which maintained its 35% share of the $6.8 billion cookie-cracker market, announced a $100 million ad blitz for seven new cookie-cracker products in September 1989. Little of that showed up in 1989 as the cookie-cracker king took a $10 million bite out of media spending for its lines, which measured $81.3 million for the year, down 10.6%.

Annual review

With the tones of its jingle "Nobody doesn't like Sara Lee" still echoing, Sara Lee has found consumers developing new calorie and cholesterol scruples that are forcing it to reassess its product lines and streamline operations.

The company, which offers a broad range of foods, personal care and consumer product lines, continued its megabrand strategy of leveraging one brand name with another. And to facilitate better cross-promotion efforts, the company consolidated its U.S. retail food advertising this May at Lintas:USA.

The company's latest megabrand leveraging came with the introduction of Hanes Her Way women's underwear, which drew more than $13 million in measured media. The brand leverages the Hanes name and Sara Lee's women's underwear brands Bali and Canadelle.

Hanes underwear and socks are being pushed in a $20 million megabrand ad campaign, "Nothing else feels so right," featuring sports personalities Michael Jordan, Boomer Esiason, Steve Largent, Howie Long and Joe Montana.

Sara Lee's bakery lines are rapidly becoming portion-controlled, single-serve desserts with lower fat and sugar, and there is a shift into breads with a fuller line of bagel and muffin products. Sara Lee remains the market leader in baked goods with a 27% share.

The company is closing the Deerfield, Ill. headquarters plant.

Originally designed for 13 products when opened in 1984, the plant is now handling more than a thousand. This produced inefficiencies and influenced a downturn in the bakery division's performance.

In fiscal 1990, ended midyear, operating income dropped to $30 million from $60 million in the prior-year period. Bakery sales volume declined 3% in fiscal 1990.

A Sara Lee spokesperson also attributed the slowing bakery sales to a shift in consumer tastes, some ineffective product promotions and an upswing in restaurant dining. The bakery line dropped 49% in measured ad spending in 1989 to $7.7 million.

Sara Lee's meat companies are launching new lighter formulations. Hygrade recently introduced a Ballpark Lite hot dog with one-third less fat, now about 85% national in distribution. Bil Mar is first in the industry with a 98% fat-free skinless quarter turkey breast, sold under the Mr. Turkey brand. Under the Rudy's Farm brand, the Sara Lee Sausage division introduced its "Morning Light" line of breakfast sausage links and patties, formed in smaller portions with lower calories and less sodium and cholesterol.

The company's meat lines made the biggest percentage jump in ad spending in 1989, climbing 43.3% to $41.5 million, according to LNA/Arbitron. Sara Lee's meat brands (Hillshire Farm, Jimmy Dean, Hygrade, Bryan and Kahn's) give it a 21% share of market. Sara Lee ranks No. 1 in smoked sausage at 38% of market, No. 1 in breakfast sausage at 25% and No. 2 in lunch meats at 11%.

The highest ad dollar total in 1989, as in the preceding year, was for hosiery—$50 million, including $28.1 million for L'eggs, down 8.8%, and $18.9 million for Hanes, up 19.8%. The two big hosiery lines give the company market leadership with a 43% share.

Gloves, marketed under both Aris and L'eggs labels, drew $8 million in media, down 19.5%. Bras and panties got $15.7 million in media, up from $6.3 million, to support Bali, Hanes Her Way and L'eggs Just My Size brands. Sales generated by the women's pantyhose line tie Sara Lee with Playtex for market leadership. Hanes men's underwear got $17.3 million, up 8.2%. The line, which claims a 27% share of market, is second to Fruit of the Loom.

Sara Lee operations were consolidated from five to two main segments, each with two business lines: Packaged Foods, including packaged meats and bakery (plus coffee and grocery lines); and Packaged Consumer Goods, including personal products and household and personal-care lines. The company also coalesced its disparate regional and national meat producers into two broad groups, Sara Lee Packaged Meats and Sara Lee Sausage Division.

C. Steven McMillan, Sara Lee strategy chief, will head up Sara Lee's packaged meats, bakery and foodservice business. He was named temporarily Sara Lee Bakery CEO, a post vacated by Thomas D. McLeod Jr., who left to become president-CEO of Iams Co.

Lintas:USA took Bryan Foods from Ally & Gargano, Bakery (retail) from Chiat/Day/Mojo, New York, and Sara Lee Sausage Division (retail) from four regional agencies.

Following the divestiture of cosmetics marketer Maybelline Co., Schering-Plough combined its OTC suncare, footcare and consumer products under the newly created Schering-Plough HealthCare Products unit.

The company, which discounted conjecture that it might bail out of consumer products altogether, continued to stress its growing focal point of transforming prescription drugs into OTC products.

S-P is stepping up its OTC introductions, citing an OTC market that is growing at a 9% clip compared to 7% for prescription drugs, and consumer interest in self-medication to combat rising prescription drug prices.

The latest Rx-to-OTC product, the topical antifungal Lotrimin AF, recently got FDA approval to be marketed under the same name and formula as its prescription counterpart.

In the reorganization, S-P also established Schering-Plough HealthCare Advertising Corp. to take over in-house media planning and placement for the new division, whose products in 1989 spent $60 million in media.

Company sales now may be weighted toward its pharmaceutical business, but consumer products still have critical mass. The new consumer division ranks fifth in sales volume among the top 10 OTC brands into the new consumer division, Schering-Plough cut off consumer media spending for Afrin, Coricidin and Chlor-Trimeton. On the other hand, media outlays for the Drixoral line increased 13.5% to $15.1 million.

Medications, part of S-P's old consumer unit, got increased ad support, although advertising for most is minor. Spending on Feen-A-Mint laxative, Di-Gel and Duration nasal spray and decongestants was up substantially, but none of the products received more than $1.2 million. Correctol laxative advertising grew by 1% to $7 million.

The emphasis of suncare products and their marketing can't stress skin protection enough. Coppertone, Schering's largest suncare brand, introduced sun protection factor 44 lotion and Tan Magnifier Lotion. Ad spending weighed heavily on the new products, which, at $5.6 million, accounted for over 60% of S-P's measured spending in the category. Coppertone's spending shifted from TV to magazines, and its overall media growth of 41.6% was slightly less than the 48.8% industry category average. Schering maintained the lead in suncare with a 34% market share from Coppertone, Shade, Tropical Blend and Solarcaine brands.

Dr. Scholl's kept control of the foot-care products business with a 61% unit share of the U.S. market. Measured ad spending rose 11.4% to $12.9 million and shifted to magazines and radio from TV and newspaper. Emphasis was on shoe inserts, including Back Guard and Air Pillo inserts, which accounted for over 50% of spending. Dr. Scholl's got one new entry—Clear Away Wart Remover.

S-P signed a licensing agreement in June 1989 with Japan's Lion Corp. to manufacture and market Zact smokers' toothpaste and Check-Up anti-plaque toothpaste and gum in North America. After finalizing the agreement S-P moved the estimated $2 million account to Masterson & Rothberg, New York, from Bozell, Minneapolis.

The Schering-Plough Pharmaceuticals division is expecting FDA approval soon for Claritin, a once-a-day, non-sedating antihistamine for asthma and allergy treatment. The product broadens S-P's category anchored by Proventil, which grew in sales by 56% last year but lost its patent protection in December. S-P developed an improved inhalation device and special sustained-release tablets to help safeguard Proventil's growth.

Wesley-Jessen vision-care unit added two new shades—misty gray and chestnut brown—to its DuraSoft 3 Colors contact lens line. In 1990 the company launched DuraSoft 3 OptiFit lenses, a flexible wear toric lens. Media backing for DuraSoft, the second largest advertiser of contact lenses, was cut 21% to $6.3 million compared with a 12% decrease from category leader Johnson & Johnson's Acuvue lenses.

Maybelline Co., sold to Wasserstein Perella Partners, the company that also picked up Yardley/Lentheric from SmithKline Beecham, maintained its No. 2 rank in unit volume in the mass color cosmetic market in 1989 despite a measured ad spending decrease of 17.3% to $31.7 million.

S-P's sale of Maybelline parallels a trend by drug companies to leave the cosmetics market. Aside from the sizable infrastructure required in dollars and manpower to sustain such a market, cosmetics have been a slow-growth business.

■ Annual review

Seagram Co. is expanding aggressively into juice and soft drinks to offset sluggish sales, particularly in North America, in distilled spirits and wines.

Although Seagram's sales increased 5.8% in spirits and wines for the year, the fiscal 1990 returns are masked by price increases and the first full-year's returns for Martell S.A., the world's second largest cognac producer bought in April 1988. Seagram's U.S. volumes actually declined as wine and spirits cooler case sales dropped and Seagram's sold 24 lower-priced spirits brands.

The company introduced Tropicana Twister juice blends and purchased the American Natural Beverage Corp., makers of Soho Natural Sodas, to help push the fruit juices/soft drinks segment to 19% of total company sales from 15% a year ago.

Sales of Soho, however, may not be as strong as Seagram originally anticipated. While the company does not release sales figures on any of its products, it has not been supporting the product with advertising for several months. While this inactivity has led Soho to split with agency Chiat/Day/Mojo after Chiat won the account only a year ago, Seagram insists the account is up for review and that advertising will resume with a new agency.

There is some speculation that Seagram is having distribution problems with Soho.

The company introduces the carbonated Tropicana Juice Sparklers this fall with an estimated $10 million campaign. Seagram expects the four-flavor product to compete with New Era Beverages' Sundance. The campaign, from DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, is themed "The world isn't flat anymor ," and emphasizes the product's carbonated quality.

Tropicana's flagship orange juice is locked in a market battle with Coca-Cola Co.'s Minute Maid brand, which has made substantial gains. At midyear 1990, Minute Maid posted a 23.6% share of the U.S. retail orange-juice business, compared with Tropicana's 21% share.

While Seagram's is making strides in the soft drink market, 80% of the company's sales still come from alcoholic beverages. In 1989, the company ranked No. 2 with 14% of the U.S. market, slightly trailing Grand Metropolitan's International Distillers & Vintners. IDV is comprised of Heublein Inc., Paddington Corp. and Carillon Importers.

Seagram remains the leading manufacturer of wine coolers despite a considerable drop in consumer interest. Its cooler sales of $400 million represent 40% of the $1 billion cooler market. Seagram's closest competitor is E&J Gallo's Bartles & Jaymes.

This April, Seagram moved its $15 million wine cooler account to Wells, Rich, Greene, from Ogilvy & Mather, both New York. New print and broadcast campaign broke later in the spring. WRG also handles Takara Sochu, a 70-proof Japanese liquor testing on the West Coast.

Then in June, Wyborowa, a choice vodka, was launched nationally under the Seagram banner.

Last month Seagram's eliminated 177 jobs, including the 20-person, in-house media buying unit, largely for print, headed by Alan Gold, director of media. The move was made to economize. The agencies handling creative were given responsibility for buying. As a result, Seagram agencies absorbed the $55 million in buying previously handled in-house.

DDB Needham received $26 million in buying for the Seagram's premium brands including Crown Royal and Chivas Regal. O&M received $17 million in buying for Seagram's name liquors and WRG for Seagram's Coolers, about $10 million.

■ Annual review

Sears, Roebuck & Co. is up against a wall in trying to invigorate its ailing Merchandise Group. Despite restructuring, the attempt to create a new pricing strategy and major store overhauls in 1990, Sears has not improved sales.

Throughout these efforts, Sears averred it was simply a matter of time before the improvements would reach the bottom line. But by late 1990 it was clear that time may not be on Sears' side.

The strongest indication that the net effect of its efforts was nil came when Sears' Chairman Edward Brennan took the unprecedented move in August 1990 to assume day-to-day control over retail operation, replacing previous retail group Chairman-CEO Michael Bozic, who was moved to group president-COO.

Mr. Brennan quickly left his mark. In mid-September some 600 headquarters employees were offered severance packages, jobs of 1,400 others were placed under review, and eight staffs responsible for planning, personnel, public affairs and legal affairs were condensed to four. Thomas E. Morris Sr., VP-marketing, resigned and was replaced by Matthew A. Howard. Vern Page, VP-catalogue merchandising, retired. Next likely move is to sell or close some of Sears' sprawling network of 850 stores nationwide.

Only a day before the housecleaning, Mr. Brennan announced Sears' newest promotion, the Sears Charge Bonus Club, a frequent-buyer program aimed at increasing retail sales by giving certificates valued at 1% of their purchases to shoppers who charge at least $200 in merchandise on their monthly Sears cards. The certificates can be applied toward future purchases at Sears.

While slashing costs and personnel within the bloated Merchandise Group has become a top priority, this task has been complicated by the need to nurture new strategies put into place between 1988 and 1990.

Sears concedes that its heavily advertised switch in March 1989 to an "everyday low price" strategy from its traditional approach of holding regular sales on selected merchandise failed to produce satisfactory results.

That strategy attempted to substitute Sears' traditional short-term sales on selected merchandise for lower overall prices. However, by late 1989 Sears resumed holding short-term sales on a limited amount of merchandise.

Simultaneously, Sears stepped up its TV advertising significantly, directing a major portion of its ad budget into electronic media.

In 1989 Sears became a major cable TV advertiser for the first time, using the medium to target specific demographic audiences with creative tailored to those audiences. The company increased its cable TV ad budget even further in 1990.

Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, Sears' agency of record, was the force behind a separate major effort by Sears to communicate value and style in its network and national spot TV commercials, de-emphasizing prices.

In February Sears named Bloom Agency to handle its $5 million-$10 million, fine-jewelry and accessories advertising, which has evolved from general image to more specific, timely advertising.

In March 1990 Sears launched its first ad campaign for its in-store Craftsman Home & Yard Centers and Craftsman tools, featuring new spokesman Bob Vila. The syndicated TV program "Home Again With Bob Vila" will air this October with Sears as lead advertiser and co-sponsor in a joint venture with O&M.

While stepping up its network and cable TV spending, Sears warned newspaper executives in late 1989 that it expects to curtail its ROP spending. This happened in the first quarter 1990 as newspaper spending dropped 17.8% to $25.8 million. Network TV expenditures soared 45.4% to $57.3 million as overall spending increased 11.2% to $116.6 million for the quarter, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Sears has broadened its use of new ad vehicles, including an in-store video program launched in September 1990 carrying paid ads from outside marketers.

The company continues to expand and test specialty store concepts, including its freestanding McKids outlets and in-store departments. It is testing Hartmarx Corp.'s Kuppenheimer-brand men's suits among potentially new apparel offerings.

This year Sears opened its first free-standing Homelife Furniture stores.

■ Annual review
SmithKline Beecham, which cut its media expenditures 21.5% in 1989 as part of a cost-saving program following the merger of SmithKline/Beckman and Beecham Group, is funneling those lost ad dollars back into its consumer operation in 1990.

In the second quarter 1990, consumer brand sales and operating profits have risen 14% and 59%, respectively—growth the company attributes to greater spending behind such lines as Aqua-Fresh toothpaste, which grew 48% in quarterly sales.

Aqua-Fresh, the company's largest selling consumer brand, got a line extension, Extra Fresh, and a new ad campaign backing Aqua-Fresh for Kids. TV spots in the campaign feature a comic book hero stressing "Super Protection. Super Taste." Aqua-Fresh has a 12% share of the $1.2 billion dentifrice category behind Crest's 36%.

Oxy anti-acne products was the OTC medicine leading the second quarter growth with a 31% increase in sales resulting from a new ad campaign and the introduction of Oxy Night Watch and Oxy Pads for Sensitive Skin. Oxy owns a 24% share of the $180 million acne medicines market, ahead of Clearasil's 18%.

During 1989, Contac was about the only major SB consumer brand to show an increase in media expenditures, up 8.4% to $16.8 million. The account also was reassigned to Grey Advertising from BBDO. The product is No. 4 with a 9% share of the $815 million cold remedies category. Nyquil is category leader at 12%. Contac's comparative ad campaign themed, "Until there's a cure, there's Contac," continued into 1990.

Tums, whose media expenditures dropped 34.4% in 1989 to $10.3 million, has received greater backing in the first and second quarters of 1990, according to the company. It also got cherry-flavored and extra-strength peppermint line extensions to support its current 33% share of the $890 million antacid market.

N'ICE throat lozenges, which this year debuted a Vitamin C extension, and Sucrets, which has added a wild cherry flavor, also are drawing greater media support this year. The two hold almost 50% of the throat lozenge market. In 1989, spending for Sucrets plunged 33% to $6.2 million as spending trickled to a stop for Sucrets Maximum Strength Spray. The spray had received $6.2 million in 1988 when rival Procter & Gamble's Chloraseptic spending was boosted, but more recently SmithKline has decided to concentrate on core product advertising. N'ICE drew $4 million in media, down 3% in 1989.

Massengill, the No. 1 feminine douche with a 52% share of the disposable douche market, was backed by $10.9 million in media in 1989, down 23%. Spending virtually was discontinued for Massengill soft cloth towelette, which got $4.1 million in 1988, and Massengill medicated douche. The company added baking soda and unscented douche line extensions and is expected to continue target marketing to blacks and Hispanics, for instance.

With the merger, which produced the third largest pharmaceutical company in the world and fifth largest OTC company outside the U.S., consumer products have become much less a factor in the overall growth of the company. SmithKline's consumer product operations also have been scaled down.

To reduce its debt load, SmithKline disposed of 32 U.S. specialty products for $52 million to Menley & James, sold the U.K.-based Yardley-Lentheric cosmetics business to Wasserstein Perella Partners and reached an agreement to sell Margaret Astor and Lancaster cosmetics for $358 million. SmithKline also sold to Benckiser Consumer Products its Cling Free fabric softener, Calgon bath products, No Salt and Fruit Fresh.

While analysts view the company as pharmaceutical driven, it is one desperately in need of new products. Growth in new products, in fact, is the directive issued by Jan Leschly shortly after he was appointed chairman of the pharmaceuticals division last June.

Annual review

Sony Corp.'s foray into movie making turned into the blockbuster purchase of Columbia Pictures Entertainment last November. The move could challenge the VHS dominance and speed the acceptance of Sony's new 8mm video format.

Sony through Columbia now has access to a movie video source—something it lacked when its Beta videocassette format failed to catch on years ago. Sony had even begun to produce its own films.

The purchase and concessions to Warner Bros. stemming from Sony's hiring of Jon Peters and Peter Guber to head the movie company will eventually mean that the Columbia House record club division of CBS Records—one of the old Sony's biggest U.S. advertising arms—will be spun off with Sony and Time Warner each owning half. Sony advertising totals for 1989 include spending for Columbia House and Columbia Pictures.

Sony's move to buy Guber-Peters Entertainment Co. and install its principals as co-chairmen of Columbia led to other top management changes that, almost a year after the acquisition, still have the movie company regrouping to fill the pipeline with marketable movies.

Former Columbia Pictures President Dawn Steel left soon after Sony bought the studio. Her successor, Frank Price (who holds the title of chairman), and Mr. Peters quickly dumped most of the projects in development.

Columbia Pictures, which early in 1989 moved to streamline its operations by creating a single Motion Picture Group from the merger of its Columbia and Tri-Star units, finished last year as the No. 3 studio in box-office market share. Media-buying also was consolidated in December for the two film banners at McCann-Erickson, Los Angeles, Columbia's agency. AC&R, Los Angeles, the Tri-Star agency, was dropped.

Columbia/Tri-Star boosted its 1989 combined market share to 16.0% (down from 17.3%) of the record $5 billion taken in at U.S. and Canadian box offices, largely on the strength of six films: Columbia's "Ghostbusters II," "When Harry Met Sally," and "The Karate Kid Part III," and Tri-Star's "Steel Magnolias," "Look Who's Talking" and "See No Evil, Hear No Evil."

Columbia/Tri-Star released 42 films in 1989, 11 less than in 1988. For the first seven months of 1990, Columbia/Tri-Star dropped to No. 5 in box office market share, with a combined 12.2%, though Tri-Star's "Total Recall" was one of the summer's biggest hits.

The studio increased ad support of its films in 1989, boosting its measured spending 32.6% to $113.4 million.

Buoyed in part by sales of New Kids on the Block, CBS Records saw its chart share for popular albums rise to 18.2% for the first half of this year, up from 16.4% for all of 1989, according to Billboard magazine. Its chart share of black albums rose to 14.9% from 13.8% for all of 1989, and its share of country rose to 24.1% from 20.9% posted for 1989.

Virtually all of CBS Records' nearly $63 million in media spending came from Columbia House, which runs ads for various record, tape, compact disc and video clubs in magazines and Sunday magazines. Early this month, CBS Records CEO Walter Yetnikoff suddenly stepped down. Sony has not named a successor.

The Sony brand of Sony Corp. of America, Sony's consumer electronics arm, was No. 1 in camcorder unit sales with a 15% market share, up from 12.2%, according to Television Digest, though other companies with several brands actually sold more. The Sony brand was No. 4 in TV sales with 6.5% of the market, up from 6.4%. Only in VCRs where Sony ranked 15th with a 2.3% share (up from 2.0%) did Sony have less success.

This year also has been a transitional one for Sony's advertising. Within its ad department, it created separate divisions for corporate and product advertising. The company is expected to launch its first corporate ad campaign shortly.

Longtime agency McCann-Erickson, New York, finally threw in the towel after experiencing continued cutbacks in its billings. The main beneficiary was Slater Hanft Martin, New York.

Added to the pool of advertised products was the introduction this June of Digital Audio Tape recorders. Advertising started immediately, though at modest levels.

Advertising for the My First Sony line was scaled back, while advertising for Sony Magnetic Products, the company's audio and videotapes, will rise to $14 million from $1 million. Sony also boosted spending 15% for its Trinitron TVs, camcorders and VCRs.

Annual review

With its buyout of Subaru of America, Fuji Heavy Industries, the Japanese maker of Subaru vehicles, becomes a fully committed player in the U.S. market.

Fuji agreed in May to buy the half of Subaru it didn't already own. The buyout, effective Sept. 30, follows two years of heavy losses by Subaru, which had cut back on advertising during the 1990 acquisition proceedings. Under the terms of the agreement, Fuji (which had shared responsibility for new product development) gets full control over the marketing and distribution as well as manufacturing.

In the past, Fuji had forced Subaru to accept too many cars, according to Subaru officials, which required the U.S. marketer to offer deep discounts. Subaru said it spent $100 million a year in cash rebates to customers in 1987 and 1988. That compares with a $60 million budget for rebates and advertising combined in its peak sales year of 1986.

The former darling of Wall Street, however, suffered other problems. Fortunes turned with the weakening of the U.S. dollar against the Japanese yen, from an aging product line and from intensified competition in the four-wheel-drive segment, a niche Subaru had carved for itself.

Subaru sales in 1989 totaled 136,111 units, compared with 155,944 in 1988, which meant a drop in market share from 1.47% in 1988 to 1.38% in 1989. In peak year 1986, Subaru sales were 179,100.

The company is even farther off the pace in 1990, with first half sales totaling 31,352. It insists sales will reach 100,000 to 105,000 for the full year.

Subaru's biggest-selling model was the Legacy, introduced in 1989. The cars are built at a Fuji-Isuzu assembly plant in Lafayette, Ind. Subaru launched a major ad campaign, "Subaru Summer Blockbusters," to support the car with TV spots feature movie critic Gene Shalit in a theater where the Legacy is showing. Legacy was backed with $57.8 million, some 70% of it in network TV with spot TV and magazines sharing the rest. Legacy sales in 1989 were 32,762, more than any other make in the Subaru lineup.

Annual review

Tandy Corp. is combating sluggishness in consumer electronics especially in low-end personal computers, with new products and with advertising that emphasizes quality, value and the diversity of its product lines.

Tandy Corp.'s Radio Shack division, which is responsible for 70% of the company's sales, also is out to zap its image as a retailer of cheap electronics.

In March, the nation's largest consumer electronics retailer introduced new advertising positioning itself as "America's Technology Store." Tandy continues to spiff up its 7,000 Radio Shack stores, giving them a high-tech look. The remodeling should be complete by 1992.

Radio Shack is Tandy's spending leader at $53.3 million in measured media in 1989, up 13.6%, with about half the spending in newspapers and the remainder weighted toward network TV and network radio.

Radio Shack wants to be known as the place to get the latest in technology—from stereos, VCRs and camcorders to cellular telephones, fax machines and personal computers. Advertising also highlights the fact that Tandy/Radio Shack is not only the retailer, but the manufacturer. Tandy also sells computers through alternate distribution channels, such as American Express direct mail and Wal-Mart stores.

Tandy/Radio Shack has teamed up with Britannica Software to market a computerized encyclopaedia to the education and library markets. A notepad computer that recognizes handwriting has been introduced by Tandy's GRiD Systems Corp. subsidiary. Also, the company is working on developing an erasable compact disc.

Tandy in late July introduced the Tandy 1000 RL, a low-priced, easy-to-use personal computer designed for novices to use in the home—a market of high growth potential. Tandy spent $13.6 million on the 1000 system in 1989, down 20%.

However, the company will face tough competition. IBM Corp. and Apple Computer, among others, are introducing similar low-cost products. IBM leads the personal computer market with a 16.4% share, followed by Apple, 10.4%, and then Tandy, 5.3%, according to International Data Corp.

Tandy's share does not include its computers marketed under the Digital Equipment Corp. and Matsushita Electric's Panasonic division labels.

Tandy's Memtek Product division, known for its Memorex audio and video tapes, plans to aggressively expand its Memorex brand to include portable stereo/cassette players, personal stereos, stereo systems and CD players under the Memorex name—all to be introduced June 1991. Its new agency, Richards Group, Dallas, plans to retain the tag line: "Is it live, or is it Memorex?" Memorex spent $3.6 million in media advertising in 1989, down 25%.

Annual review

Despite the $10.8 billion in long-term debt taken on with the merger of Time Inc. and Warner Communications, and an extraordinarily soft magazine advertising marketplace, the communications giant continued to expand through launches, acquisitions and leveraging its related operations.

Time Warner Enterprises, a strategic-development division headed by MTV co-creator Robert Pittman, was formed in March to focus on "opportunities that may have been overlooked" company-wide. For starters, Mr. Pittman is developing a "legal" cable channel and looking for ways to merchandise Warner's "Loony Tunes" characters in such areas as the Six Flags theme parks, in which Time Warner owns a 19.5% stake.

Time Warner Sports was formed this July to increase the company's presence in sports and bring its sports-related businesses—including Sports Illustrated, HBO Sports, HBO Video and Licensing Corporation of America—under one umbrella.

Time Warner also created Time Publishing Ventures, including the Time Inc. Magazine Co.'s special interest businesses and worldwide development activity. The new division this November will test a magazine with home entertaining aficionado Martha Stewart. If successful, the venture could spawn a line of books, videos and even a TV series.

Ad revenues of Time Warner's weeklies combined led all magazine publishers in 1989. But the magazines were among the hardest hit by an ad drought which left consumer titles tracked by Publisher's Information Bureau down 3.3% in ad pages in the first half of 1990. Time, People and Sports Illustrated posted ad page declines of 7.5%, 9.7% and 16.5%, respectively, in the first half.

Time Warner's much-ballyhooed Entertainment Weekly—its most significant launch since the ill-fated TV-Cable Week in 1983—got off to a rocky start in February. One redesign and one managing editor later, the fledgling title appears to be gaining acceptance.

The magazine operation acquired Sunset parent Lane Publishing and the remaining interest in Parenting. Southpoint, part of its Southern Progress Corp., suspended publication in June, citing a "difficult magazine environment." Time Warner's magazine group launched TargetSelect in late 1989, a selective binding and ink-jet printing program for advertisers.

Last August the company backed out of a joint venture with the Hachette/Filipacchi Group to publish a French version of Fortune. A Spanish edition also was put on hold.

On the strength of the success of "Batman," "Lethal Weapon 2" and "Driving Miss Daisy," Warner Bros. had a blockbuster 1989, leading all studios with a 17.4% share of the domestic film market. Warner Bros. was also No. 1 in film rentals in 1989 with a 19% market share. Summer 1990 looked bright as well thanks to such films as "Presumed Innocent," based on Scott Turow's best-selling novel.

Warner Bros. spent $94 million on movies in 1989, mostly in newspaper, network and spot TV. The studio backed six films with more than $5 million each, led by "Batman" with $10 million, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The Home Box Office division took control of the basic cable channel Movietime in August 1989, relaunching it earlier this year as E! Entertainment Television. In November 1989, HBO launched the Comedy Channel, an ad-supported basic cable network which competes with MTV Networks' Ha! Both received lukewarm receptions from cable system operators and advertisers.

HBO unveiled a 15-month $49 million consumer ad campaign—the largest undertaken by a cable network—in October 1989 themed "Nobody brings it home like HBO." The effort was created by BBDO Worldwide, New York. HBO spent $37 million in media in calendar 1989, up 66%.

Time Warner's book publishing unit turned its attention to the youth market, announcing it would launch a Children's Book of the Month Club and a line of Sports Illustrated for Kids books in 1990. Media spending by Time-Life Books rose 7.9% to $28.6 million, while spending on Book of the Month Clubs in general rose 52% to $7.6 million.

■ Annual review
Toyota Motor Sales USA, a subsidiary of Toyota Motor Corp., Japan, maintained its position as the leading car-truck importer in the U.S. in 1989 as it blanketed the market with 53% more ad dollars, much of that in the Lexus launch.
Further ad budget growth of 25% is expected for 1990 to back the redesigned Celica and midyear introductions for the Land Cruiser, MR2 and van, among others. Toyota got back into the minivan market with the February 1990 debut of the Previa, which held potential for sales of 40,000 units this year.
The company registered car-truck sales of 945,353 units in calendar 1989, up 1% over a year earlier, for a 6.5% share of the total U.S. car-truck market. The total included 212,388 U.S.-built Camrys (257,466 in all) and 221,694 light trucks. Toyota led importers with a 4.7% share, down from 5.1%.
The luxury model Lexus had sales of 16,302 for the year in only four months on the market. By July 1990, Lexus (including the LS 400 V-8 priced at $36,000 and the ES 250 V-6 at $21,050) had sold 5,049 units against 1,789 for Nissan's Infiniti, which also hit the U.S. market last fall. Lexus broke its ad campaign in August 1989. Intro ads for Infiniti came three months later. Rival Acura from American Honda, which had several years' head start, had sold 13,617 units, down 3.2% at the mid-year mark.
But falling short of original projections, Toyota reduced its U.S. sales target for Lexus in 1990 by 20% to 60,000.
The $60 million national ad launch last year for Lexus got a $20 million-plus infusion in spot TV and print support this spring in 60 markets. All the ads are tagged "Pursuing perfection," a derivative of the national slogan, "The relentless pursuit of perfection."
While the national campaign for Lexus built awareness for the flagship LS 400 model, the large part of regional effort focused on the lower-cost ES 250, its sporty sister, that "for $21,050, you not only get all these items, but this handsome carrying case as well," says the voiceover in TV spots.
With the exception of outdoor and Sunday supplements, media expenditures rose across the board, according to LNA/-Arbitron. The top-selling Camry ($11,588 for the Camry 4) pulled $53.5 million in measured spending, up 42.9%.
Celica, priced at $12,268 for the ST4 model, drew $25 million in media, up 57.2%. Corolla, Toyota's second best seller, got $21 million, the same as the prior year. Most of the spending for all brands went to spot and network TV, supported by heavy dosages of national magazines and enthusiast publications.
Media spending for Toyota's redesigned line of light trucks was $47 million, down 17.5%. The SR5 V-6 pickup accounted for $20 million of that.
Toyota opened the 1990 marketing year prepared to boost ad spending by 25% to more than $300 million. About 75% of the ad budget was slated for network and spot TV, with print getting much of the rest.
Toyota will design a new, larger version of the popular Camry for production at its plant in Georgetown, Ky., aiming to export 40,000 annually to Japan in 1992. Within the year the flagship Cressida will be replaced in the U.S. with the Crown, which ranks above Cressida in Japan. Toyota is banking on Crown selling more than Cressida's annual 20,000.

■ Annual review
UAL Corp. seems to ricochet from crisis to crisis. The holding company for one of the world's largest airlines, United Airlines, has bounced around for three years emerging from one serious management or stockholders brouhaha only long enough to quickly enter another.
The one constant at United Airlines has been its TV advertising campaign that features exotic spots and the music of George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." That only means marketing has been put in a holding pattern until ownership can be resolved.
As of this month, the future of UAL's president Stephen M. Wolf, its exec VP-marketing and planning John C. Pope, and orders for additional new planes hinged on whether employees can find someone to lend them enough cash to buy United Airlines.
The employees, whose United Employee Acquisition Corp. hired former Chrysler Vice Chairman Gerald Greenwald, have until Oct. 9 to find financing for their proposed $4.54 billion buyout. If they can, Messrs. Wolf and Pope are out and Mr. Greenwald is in the pilot's seat. The employees have missed one deadline already.
Employees are trying to use loans from aircraft makers as one source of buyout money and have asked the UAL board to temporarily put off any new plane purchases, a move that could have some long-term implications for the line.
In the face of all the boardroom turmoil, it sometimes seems amazing that United could do anything beyond fly its existing routes.
In this year's major strategic thrust, United began flying for the first time to Europe with flights to Frankfurt and Paris. United expects to step up transatlantic flights next year if it gets government approval.
United has been able to add seating to its Pacific routes as new longer range planes arrived, passing Northwest Airlines as the No. 1 carrier in the region.
Receiving one new plane a week has allowed United to expand service while still retiring some older jets. United expects to have 460 planes in service at yearend, up from 429 at the end of 1989.
United had a 16.6% market share of revenue passenger miles through July 1990, unchanged from the same period last year and just behind American Airlines' 17.6%.

■ Annual review
For Unilever, it was a year of watching on the sidelines, as new-product rollouts stalled and competitors continued to innovate.
One of its few major product rollouts, Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu Fresh Italian pasta sauces, has been under regulatory review by the FDA for possible mislabeling. At issue is the use of the word "fresh" for a product that uses heat-processing.
Ragu has been a big success for Unilever, grabbing an estimated 8% of the $1 billion-plus spaghetti sauce market in 1989. Lever ended a 20-year relationship between Waring & LaRosa and Ragu, moving its $25 million sauce account to J. Walter Thompson USA, New York.
Rival Procter & Gamble scored gains in the shampoo market with Head & Shoulders Dry Scalp and Pert Plus and ripped apart the detergent market with Tide with Bleach, while Lever's Timotei shampoo remained in a holding pattern. Similarly, a new Triple Action All, created to fight Tide with Bleach, has not left test market.
Lever also has been slow but effective in instituting environmentally safe products, but has watched as competitors rolled out new concentrated-granule detergents in test markets, which have fared significantly better than analysts predicted.
Lever passed on major acquisitions, declining a bid on Schering-Plough's Maybelline. After P&G's acquisition of Noxell Corp. last year, Maybelline suddenly seemed a target for acquisition, possibly by Unilever.
Lever's strength remains in household products. In the $3.8 billion laundry detergent industry, P&G's Tide with Bleach has gained a 10% share of the laundry detergent market since its introduction last year. Before the introduction of Tide with Bleach, Lever's Surf had a 10% share of the category; Surf now has 8% and continues to lose ground. Lever recently began heavy promotional support for the brand, breaking an estimated $50 million ad and promotion campaign. Surf was No. 2, but now has fallen to No. 3 behind Lever's Wisk, which has an 8.6% share of the market. J. Walter Thompson USA broke a new $13 million campaign for Wisk in late 1989, replacing the 22-year-old "ring around the collar" campaign.
Lever's new Triple Action All is being tested in San Francisco with $30 million in ad support at a national rate. All liquid and powder now holds 6% of the market.
This month Lever introduced Wisk Power Scoop in West Coast markets with full national distribution expected in 1991. The product, its first superconcentrated detergent in the U.S., is expected to draw more than $50 million in advertising during the launch, sampling and couponing. J. Walter Thompson USA handles. This is the first powder marketed under the Wisk name. P&G is testing its own superconcentrates under Tide, Cheer, Gain and Oxydol names.
Lever has had little impact on the $1 billion shampoo industry. Its Faberge Organics has dropped from a 2.3% share in mid-1988 to a 1% share. Lever acquired Faberge in July 1989. Its Aqua Net has been flat at 0.5%, according to Jay Freedman, household products analyst for Kidder, Peabody & Co.
Timotei, sold by Lever in 29 countries, was expected to roll from West Coast test markets as early as the summer of 1989, but has not yet appeared nationally.
No. 2 in the bar soap market, Lever may be seeking to chip away at No. 1 P&G by launching Lever 2000 deodorant soap, with J. Walter Thompson USA handling the account. Lever's Dove continues to rise, now at 16% of the market, with Shield dropping 1 share point since 1989. For all brands Lever took 25.5% of the market, about the same as 1988, against P&G's nearly 33%, down slightly.
Lever has kept its toothpaste, dishwasher detergent, fabric softener and light-duty detergent market share at about last year's levels.
Lever, new to the U.S. deodorant industry, is trying to increase its share in the $1.1 billion market, with last year's introduction of Powerstick, a direct competitor of Mennen Speed Stick. Lever also obtained Brut 33 after acquiring Faberge in July 1989. Lever only holds 4.5% of the market with its two brands, while Mennen holds 15.5% with Speed Stick and Real. Unilever ranks No. 1 in the world deodorant market.

Annual review

Has AT&T undone US Sprint and its parent, United Telecommunications Inc.?

Stepped up marketing by AT&T early this year and increased marketing by MCI Communications have been credited with slowing Sprint's growth in new residential and small-business customers. AT&T spent $103.8 million (up 25.8%) in national media the first quarter 1990, leading all U.S. brands in advertising, according to LNA/Arbitron.

The slowdown at US Sprint was so dramatic that its parent United Telecom reported a loss of $42 million in the second quarter 1990, precipitating layoffs at US Sprint, reassignment of workers to the sales and marketing divisions and a major ad push by US Sprint this August. US Sprint accounts for more than 95% of United Telecom's spending in national media.

The August ad effort, bearing the Sprint theme, "It's a New World," challenged AT&T's "Get it in Writing" spots, which imply that services rendered by non-AT&T carriers promise a lot but don't deliver. Ads from Sprint say it does put it in writing, offers all the services AT&T offers and does a better job. It encourages AT&T to lighten up. The campaign will run for the next several months, said Jorge Rodriguez, VP-marketing and advertising.

A companion print effort focuses on "the small business advantage," a series of products packaged together to make businesses run more smoothly. The products include 800 services, audio conferencing and Sprint Fax. J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco, handles. An aggressive direct mail campaign from Devon Direct, Philadelphia, also is under way.

In 1989, Sprint captured about 8.3% of the long-distance market, up from 7.5% in 1988, following MCI with 12.5% (up from 10.3%) and AT&T with 66.4% (down from 68%), according to Northern Business Information, New York. The total long-distance market, valued at about $55 billion, is expected to grow 8.5% this year over 1989. Sprint was on schedule to up its share to about 9.1% by year-end 1990, but revision may be in order.

During 1989, US Sprint general promotion ad spending dropped significantly to $1.6 million from $12.5 million in 1988 as the company focused on long-lines business and long-distance lines. Spending for long-lines business rose from $5 million to $15 million, mostly in network TV. Long-distance lines were backed with $24 million in media, up 36%, three-quarters of it in network TV.

Sprint still runs its "Pin Drop" ad which stresses the clarity of its fiber optic network.

Sprint's Visa Card debuted in November 1989 offering all the benefits of its FONcard and making Sprint the first national long-distance carrier to market a combination calling card, credit card and cash card. But AT&T early this year launched its Universal Card, promoting it more heavily and starting with a larger customer base. Sprint Telephone Card spending totaled $16.1 million in 1989, up 15%.

The poor second quarter made United Telecom delay its plan to buy the rest of Sprint (19.9%) from GTE. It may now look for investors to share the risk.

Annual review

Ad spending by the various dairy marketing agencies was flat to down for 1989 because of the widespread droughts of the late 1980s, but ad and promotional budgets for milk marketers will become $110 million richer this fall when the House gives its expected approval to a farm bill passed this summer by the Senate.

By federal law, raw milk volume determines the total dollars available for dairy product advertising and promotion. Congress first mandated the allotment when it passed the 1983 Dairy & Tobacco Adjustment Act authorizing an assessment to be paid by farmers and co-ops of 15¢ per hundredweight of raw milk produced.

The new farm bill would be funded by a 20¢ fee per hundredweight paid by processors like Borden, Dairymen and Kraft General Foods who buy milk from dairy farmers and then package it for retailers. Funds will be managed by the new National Processor Advertising & Promotion Board (NPAPB) and will focus solely on milk advertising.

The National Dairy Production and Research Board was created by the 1983 act. It is the largest single force in national dairy marketing. It gets at least one-third of the per hundredweight contribution.

Sister state and national dairy-promotion bodies get the remainder, biggest of which is the United Dairy Industry Assn.'s marketing arm, the American Dairy Assn., based in Rosemont, Ill. UDIA is an association of dairy industry sponsors, both farm and processing groups.

The flat landscape for dairy revenues in 1989 resulted in less than a half-cent boost for promotion and research, to $211 million in 1989 from $210 million. Milk funds coming to Arlington, Va.-based NDPRB totaled $75.3 million in 1989, off 2.1%. ADA parent, UDIA, dropped 23.6% in total revenue (including for milk) to $39.6 million.

National Dairy Board led in spending among dairy marketers with $58.9 million in measured advertising. Of the total, network TV dominated at $30 million. Magazines took $12.6 million, and cable and syndicated TV each at $9 million-plus.

By product, NDPRB's biggest expenditure of $20.5 million backed cheese advertising, about half on network TV. Second highest allotment of $14.1 million backed youth milk, with network TV again claiming half.

The ADA's outlays stayed even with 1988 at $48 million, including $31.7 million for milk promotion directed at adults, virtually split between network TV and spot TV. ADA also spends heavily in unmeasured forms, examples of which are its two current-running POP campaigns for cheese: "Cheese Snack Shops," targeted to women, and football-themed "Kick Off the Season With Cheese," featuring TV weatherman Willard Scott.

Other major dairy marketers are California Milk Advisory Board at $18.5 million, down 1%; Wisconsin Milk Marketing Board, $11 million, down 13.7%; Washington Dairy Products Commission, $3.7 million, even with 1988; and the Oregon Dairy Products Commission, $900,000, same as in 1988.

California, which spent $11 million on fluid milk advertising in 1989, hit the market this year with a new milk called Extra Light 1%, containing only 1% butterfat but a high percentage, 11%, of protein and calcium.

■ Annual review

While U.S. Government ad spending rose last year after declining 5.2% in fiscal 1988, most of the increase came from quasi-government advertisers, the U.S. Postal Service and Amtrak, the bulk of whose funds derive from operating revenues, not federal allocations. For that reason, the two haven't been as constrained as the rest of the government from congressional cuts to balance the budget.

The Postal Service raised its spending 9.1% to $49.1 million in fiscal 1989, which began Oct. 1, 1988. The total included $11 million in media spending for philatelic programs, an easy revenue-producer for the USPS. The Postal Service increased TV spending behind popular stamp designs, like dinosaurs.

But the Postal Service has bumpier times ahead. This fiscal year its ad budget fell to $41.9 million and is expected to tumble to $35 million in fiscal 1991. That decrease comes even though the Postal Service next year begins advertising as a worldwide sponsor of the 1992 Olympic Games.

Amtrak continues its "All Aboard Amtrak" campaign via DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, and last year pumped more funding into spot TV. Ad spending rose 45.5% to $35.2 million in 1989.

Remaining the government's largest spender, the Department of Defense in fiscal 1989 increased its recruiting ad budget 1.8% to $205.4 million. That figure includes the Coast Guard. Most of the services' ad spending remained about the same or increased slightly, but the Army, with the largest single service ad budget, saw its spending fall 1.9% to $93.8 million.

The Army is now focusing on budget-stretchers in anticipation of further cutbacks. This year, the Army has a $92 million budget, but in 1991, Army recruiters expect their funding to fall 4.2% to $88.1 million, the lowest level in at least six years.

This fall, because of the impending budget cuts, the Army won't spend as much on TV. Instead, more money will go toward promotional programs, such as a 10-minute video describing the Army experience, which will be shown to school and community groups.

Advertising officials for Army and other Defense Department recruitment don't expect the budget picture to change despite the massive deployment of troops and reserve units to the Persian Gulf. While Congress may ease up slightly on proposed defense cuts, advertising still will be kept lean, they predict.

Of all the services, only the Navy's budget picture has improved dramatically. While funds for 1989 advertising remained stable at $19.4 million (not including Navy reserve spending), in fiscal 1990 the budget jumped 37.1% to $26.6 million. The Navy went back to advertising on TV, a luxury it had been forced to give up several years ago. A new theme, "You and the Navy. Full Speed Ahead," broke in the spring via BBDO, New York. For fiscal 1991, the Navy seeks a $29.7 million budget.

The Marines are currently in the midst of an agency review, to be concluded in January. J. Walter Thompson USA has handled the Marine account since 1946. The budget is sure to shrink. Last year, the Marines spent $17.8 million, a negligible increase from fiscal 1988. For 1990 the budget has fallen to $16.3 million and is expected to decline to $15.4 million next year. Nevertheless, the first new TV spot in three years may be produced this fall, continuing the "few good men" series.

In fiscal 1989, the Air Force's ad budget remained at $14.8 million, but rose 19% this year to $16.3 million. Spending may decline to $15.3 million next year.

The Air and Army National Guard have remained constant in their spending, with $14.3 million allocated to the Army Guard and $3.1 million to the Air Guard in 1989. Spending declined to $13.9 million for the Army and $2.5 million for the Air Guard this year, and will be about the same in 1991.

The Pentagon continues to move away from joint military advertising. The joint campaign's funding dropped 2.6% in 1989 to $26.3 million, and slumped 21.7% in 1990 to $20.6 million. While joint recruiters have asked for $29.7 million in 1991, they said they already know their request won't be honored.

In the past year, joint recruiters shifted more money into magazines, and cut some TV flights.

Annual review

Sam Walton proved his marketing acumen once again with a challenge to manufacturers to provide "environmentally friendly" packaging for products sold in Wal-Mart discount stores.

The challenge was met a month later by a similar promotion by K mart, an indication of the intensity in the marketing battle waged between Wal-Mart, K mart and Sears, Roebuck & Co.—each of which is expected to hit just over $30 billion in retail sales in 1990.

Wal-Mart announced its environmental program last August in ROP advertising in national newspapers. The ad, addressed to vendors, bore the title: "We're looking for quality products that are guaranteed not to last." Wal-Mart supports vendors who implement such packaging with in-store merchandising.

The project is viewed in Bentonville headquarters as less a marketing strategy than a community project. Individual stores, for example, are invited to participate in the environmental project, resulting in such grass-roots programs as tree-plantings and essay contests. Wal-Mart has since tied its TV image spots to the environmental campaign.

This wasn't the first time Wal-Mart has been aped. K mart and Sears, in fact, last year adopted an "every day low prices" strategy. Wal-Mart popularized the concept in the 1960s. Rising sales at Wal-Mart are related in part to its continued expansion from its Arkansas base. This year it will open more than 160 new discount stores, 25 Sam's Wholesale Clubs and four Supercenters, which feature upwards of 190,000 sq. ft. of retail space. In 1989, Wal-Mart opened its fourth, and some suspect its last, Hypermart—a 250,000-sq.-ft. retail/grocery facility and its only venture into food marketing. Wal-Mart moved into Michigan, New Jersey and Wyoming for the first time.

Sales per gross square foot also have advanced with Wal-Mart's expansion—to $250 in 1989 from $231 in 1988.

Wal-Mart maintained a 0.49% advertising-to-sales ratio, the lowest among its retailing peers. Most of the advertising at Wal-Mart is vendor-funded through co-op deals, which holds down ad expenses.

The company concentrated most of its measured spending in 1989 on spot TV, which amounted to $34.7 million, or 68% of total media expenditures. Image and pricing are stressed in TV spots. The medium grew almost 29% in dollar volume in 1989, much of that related to new-market growth.

National Sunday magazine advertising in 1989 more than doubled to $7.4 million, according to LNA/Arbitron. The medium has become a more attractive vehicle as Wal-Mart expands nationally.

In other print advertising, Wal-Mart spent heavily on bi-weekly circulars prepared by its in-house ad department, which also handled newspaper ROP advertising, most typically for markets not covered by Sunday magazines.

Wal-Mart continued to support its 4-year-old "Buy American" campaign with TV image spots and in-store signage and merchandise flagging. Signage reports on the domestic jobs Wal-Mart helps support or restore through its program of finding domestic suppliers for it merchandise.

Annual review

What Warner-Lambert Co. added in media ad support for its major brands in 1988 it took away in 1989 as it extended its marketing presence in below-the-line spending—from sampling to heavy sales promotion and direct marketing programs—that pushed its worldwide advertising and promotion budget to $998 million, up 13%.

Listerine, W-L's leading franchise, grew to 30% of market from 26%, aided by a much publicized study that highlighted the brand's plaque-fighting benefits. A direct mail campaign with Listerine coupons was targeted to Viadent and Plax brand users. The brand pulled $20.4 million in media, down 11.3%.

Listermint, which has a 7% share, debuted a new ad campaign stressing the product's ability to strengthen teeth. Scope held 26% of the mouthwash market in 1989 and Plax 12%. A joint promotion for Listerine, Listermint and Efferdent offered holiday trips to Universal Studios Florida. Listermint was backed with $9.9 million in media, down 6.6%.

W-L introduced Halls with Vitamin C and Halls-Plus and Soothers, the first cough tablets with a soothing syrup center. All Halls products were backed with $7.1 million in 1989, down 2.7%, as Halls kept its 5.5% share of the $215 million cough drop market.

Benadryl Plus Nighttime liquid cold relief medication was introduced in late 1989 to extend the allergy medication across categories into the $178 million nighttime liquids segment dominated by Nyquil. New ad spending for this extension and for Benadryl cream and larger budgets for Benadryl Plus allergy tablets helped boost Benadryl media spending 28% to $26 million. The Benadryl line leads the $140 million allergy-relief medication market with a 45% share.

Sinutab also received significant new media support as it added Sinutab Allergy Formula tablets ($4.7 million in media) to the sinus medication line that claims 30% of the $140 million sinus medication market, well ahead of upstart Tylenol Sinus at 18%. Sinutab brand media spending rose to $13 million, up 25%.

W-L this January launched nationally Fresh 'n Brite toothpaste gel for denture wearers, the first major entry in the $170 million denture cleanser market to compete with Block Drug Co.'s Dentu-Creme toothpaste, which holds a 14.7% share of the overall denture cleanser market. New product samples were distributed along with cents-off coupons, many of them in packages of Efferdent, W-L's market-leading denture cleanser.

A Fresh 'n Brite campaign piggybacked the $9 million ad push for Efferdent denture cleanser. Efferdent is the leading tablet cleanser in the market with a 48% share, well ahead of Polident at 26%.

Rolaids, supported by $14.9 million in media, down 4.5%, aggressively promoted its new cherry flavor and Extra Strength products and the calcium-rich, sodium-free line extensions. It maintained its 13% share and No. 4 ranking in the $890 million antacid market led by Maalox's 38%.

Sales of gums and mints reached the billion-dollar milestone in 1989, abetted by new acquisitions from RJR Nabisco—Junior Mints, Charleston Chew!, Sugar Daddy and Sugar Babies.

Sugarfree Dentyne, launched last year in the $900 million sugarless gum segments of the $1.8 billion U.S. chewing gum market, was supported by $4 million in advertising. Overall Dentyne spending reached $9.4 million, down 19%.

Trident, a line backed in 1989 by $15.7 million in media, down 13.3%, introduced Freshmint in June 1990 with a national TV, radio and outdoor campaign that also included sampling and joint promotions with other W-L products. Trident's new 30-second TV spots steer away from cavity prevention claims. In addition, the three existing Trident flavors were reformulated to contain a new sweetener that helps deliver enhanced flavor. Cristal, a nonstick sugarless gum, went into test in July 1990.

Certs, W-L's largest selling mint, increased market share for the second year in a row as it debuted Mini-Mints, a sugarless product. Last September the company broke 15- and 30-second national TV spots for Certs bringing back the "Two mints in one" slogan and adding a new jingle, "Two is better than one."

Candies in test include Choclairs, a chocolate wafer bar; specialty candies featuring Hanna-Barbera's Flintstones and Jetsons; and Splits, a two-flavor hard-roll candy.

Schick introduced Slim Twin disposable razor in 1989 starring professional basketball players, Jim and John Paxson and their brother Mike, a Denver businessman. Cross promotions with S.C. Johnson's Edge shaving cream and a free razor offer were supported by $12 million. Schick's market share moved from 15% to 16% in the $775 million wet razor category dominated by Gillette at 64%, although Gillette's Sensor entry early this year is bound to slice into Schick's share.

■ Annual review

In August 1990, Wendy's International began testing a TV commercial in which Senior Chairman of the Board R. David Thomas answers the question that put the restaurant chain on the advertising map in 1984: "Where's the beef?"

Reviving that line signals Wendy's confidence that it is ending the slump it fell into after momentum died for the Clara Peller "Beef" campaign which sent Wendy's sales and profits skyrocketing in 1984 and 1985.

But the return of "Where's the beef?" also signals Wendy's need to use whatever tools it finds at its disposal to grow in a very tough restaurant market.

"We own that line and we should use it. We know where the beef is; it's at Wendy's," said Mr. Thomas, who has served since April 1989 as TV spokesman for the restaurant chain he founded in 1969.

His appearance then, using consumer preference polls to declare "Victory"—the campaign title—in the battle among fast-food chains, was to have been a short-term one. But Wendy's ad recall scores jumped when Mr. Thomas appeared, and he has been featured since.

Wendy's made progress in 1989 toward its goal of financial revitalization. Average net sales for U.S. stores was $789,000, up 4% from $759,000 in 1988 but still below the $871,000 average reported for 1985.

Wendy's ranked third in the hamburger/sandwich category in 1985; it since has slipped to fourth. In 1989, it held an 8.5% share, according to trade publication Nation's Restaurant News, still good enough for the No. 4 position (after McDonald's, Burger King and Hardee's). Its share was down slightly from 8.8% in 1988, largely because of the emergence of young but fast-growing competitors like Subway and Rally's.

That very competitive environment in the restaurant industry has forced Wendy's to step up ad and promotion support (up 7% in 1989, compared with a 5% rise the previous year). It followed the industry trend to promotional tie-ins with movies, running programs for its Kids Meals tied to "All Dogs Go to Heaven" in December 1989, and to "Jetsons: The Movie" in July 1990.

Most of Wendy's marketing has been focused on its menu. In October 1989, the chain introduced the Super Value Menu, a selection of items each priced at 99¢. This served two marketing goals: to allow Wendy's to decrease its couponing and to fight a lingering consumer perception that its menu is higher-priced than its competitors'.

Wendy's has cycled several different sandwich options—including hot dogs—on and off the Super Value Menu list to have new items to advertise. In May 1990 it added an item it hopes will be permanent: the higher-priced Dave's Deluxe burger, meant to compete with McDonald's McD.L.T. and Burger King's Whopper.

To meet growing consumer interest in lower cholesterol, Wendy's switched to 100% vegetable oil for cooking fries. Additionally, it planned to add in the fall of 1990 a Grilled Chicken sandwich, and is testing a lower-fat version of its Frosty dessert and low-fat frozen yogurt.

Despite the additions, Wendy's management says it plans to put more ad attention once again on its core menu of burgers.

Robert L. Barney, a top Wendy's exec since the first restaurant opened, retired as chairman-ceo in November 1989. President-COO James Near added the title of ceo.

Whitman Corp. continued to emphasize its Pet Inc., Pepsi-Cola General Bottlers and Midas International divisions by backing each with acquisitions. It also pumped up promotional spending at the expense of media advertising.

Pet Inc. bought Van de Kamp Frozen Foods, the third largest producer of frozen seafood in the U.S., from Grand Metropolitan PLC, and purchased two Canadian companies, Bittner Packers Ltd. and Coorsh Specialty Meats and Salads, the latter complementing Pet's Orval Kent salad unit bought in 1988.

Pepsi-Cola General Bottlers, the largest independent Pepsi bottler in the U.S., acquired three Pepsi and several Dr Pepper franchises that contributed shipments of 5 million cases to total shipments in 1989 of 132 million.

Midas International acquired a chain of Australian muffler shops and expanded to 2,317 shops worldwide in 1989. It has added 39 more shops overseas in 1990.

Whitman reported its worldwide advertising budget increased 5% to $127 million in 1989. U.S. media spending was declining 6.1% to $66.4 million at the same time, according to LNA/Arbitron. The difference was largely U.S. promotional and merchandising activity and some media spending abroad.

Pet introduced in test market last fall a six-item, shelf stable line called Progresso To:Go. The product remains in test.

Whitman snack candy was repackaged into Sampler-style boxes and relaunched with sights on the high-quality snack-candy category. Marketing support included a sweepstakes handled by H.S. Marketing Services, Englewood Cliffs, N.J. and a two-week TV campaign created in-house.

Progresso soups continued to draw the biggest ad expenditures for Pet foods with $6.7 million, same as in 1988. A fall Fiesta promotion for Old El Paso foods included FSIs and POP. Media expenditures for the brand were clipped to $572,000 from $2.8 million in 1988, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Progresso claimed nearly 30% of the $550 million ready-to-serve soup market last year, second only to Campbell Soup. Old El Paso held the lead in the $220 million Mexican food market wth a 31.7% share.

Following the death of Chairman-CEO Karl Bays last November, former Amoco exec James W. Cozad took the helm. Miles L. Marsh, who was elected president-COO, announced earlier this year that Whitman's ad spending for Pet products will nearly triple in 1990 to $41.4 million—most of that in merchandising programs and special promotions.

Breaking tradition, Pet in December named an agency of record for creative work—D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles, St. Louis and Los Angeles. Previously, the company assigned work on a project basis only.

While total media spending declined for the second straight year, Midas International increased its ad expenditures from $41.7 million to $44.7 million. The purchase of Van de Kamp added nearly $3 million to Whitman's spending total for the year. Van de Kamp held a 18.1% share in the 1989 frozen seafood market, behind General Mills' Gorton's with 22.6% and Pillsbury's Mrs. Paul's 20.3%.

Extra, Wm. Wrigley Jr.'s late-arriving entrant in the sugar-free gum category, met with strong sales in 1989 to take the lead in the sugar-free category that now constitutes 42% of the U.S. chewing gum market. Analysts said the new emphasis on sugar-free brands is essential for Wrigley to enjoy continued sales growth.

One of the few gums made with NutraSweet, Extra made its U.S. debut only six years ago. Yet in 1989, it toppled Trident, a 25-year-old Warner-Lambert gum, as the nation's best-selling sugar-free brand.

Extra's U.S. sales were boosted by the introduction of two new Extra flavors, Cinnamon and Winter Fresh, and by a 15% boost in measured ad spending—to $21.5 million—in what was already Wrigley's biggest brand media budget. Trident was supported with $15.6 million in media, down 13.8%.

The aggressive promotion paid off in 1989's third quarter when, as Group VP-Marketing Ronald Cox proclaimed, "We caught 'em (Trident)." Mr. Cox cited market-share gains of 5 points in '89 and another 5 points through mid-1990, and said Extra now holds 43% of the nation's $820 million retail market for sugar-free gum.

Extra's success, according to analyst Richard Elam of Blunt Ellis Loewi Financial, also was spurred by quality improvements such as softer texture, more lasting flavor and lack of unpleasant aftertaste.

The 7.4% drop in Wrigley's measured ad spending for '89 is insignificant, according to Mr. Cox. He said the company buys ads at a longstanding rate tied to sales. "Gum is an impulse-type product. You need constant advertising."

In the sugared gum arena where Wrigley has a 70% share, steady ad spending seems essential if sales are not to drop. Mr. Cox, who claims the company has done better than its competitors in the declining market said, "Our sales aren't down, they're only flat."

Its Amurol subsidiary, which sells novelty gum to children through convenience stores, made a foray into the adult market by purchasing Reed Candy Co.

One topical new campaign touts Wrigley Spearmint gum as a permitted alternative for cigarette smokers. The pilot ads, launched this July in four major airport cities, respond to widespread new smoking retrictions on planes and trains, in offices and public buildings.

Mr. Cox and his colleagues, who are cautiously optimistic about the new campaign, said they take comfort from record sugared-gum sales in Asia, up 25% last year and 39% this year.

Extra, meanwhile, was a hit in Europe and is likely to prove Wrigley's best overseas seller. Analyst Barbara Dirvin of William Blair said, "I expect most of Wrigley's growth over the next five years to be international."

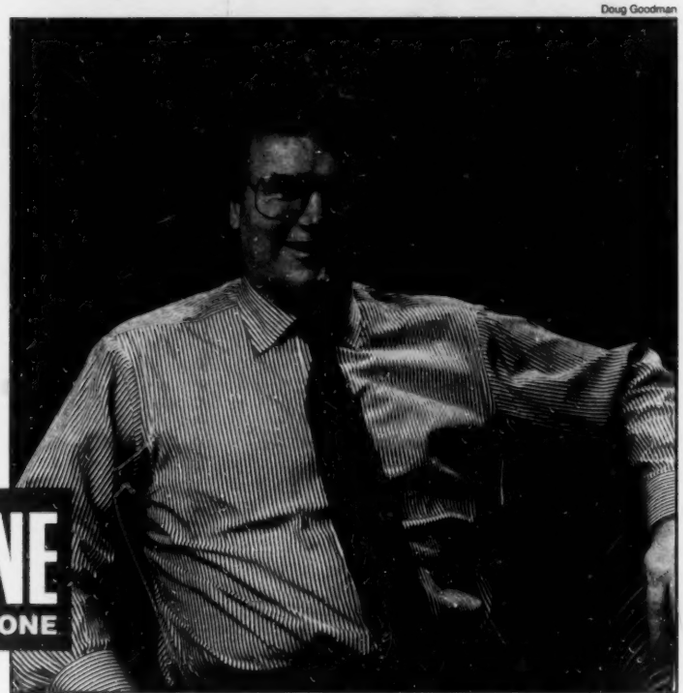
'Underdog' bites back

CBS' Stringer shepherds net to ratings win in premiere run

CBS shocked the TV industry by winning the prime-time TV ratings race for the week ended Sept. 23, the network's first premiere-week victory since 1984. It was also the first regular-season win during Howard Stringer's 25-month tenure as president of the CBS/Broadcast Group.

In the midst of a giddy week "mired in first place," Mr. Stringer, 48, a 20-year veteran of CBS News, talked to Advertising Age Reporter Wayne Walley about the task of rebuilding the one-time "Tiffany" network's tarnished image in a more competitive marketplace.

Doug Goodman



Broadcast chief Howard Stringer: a "staggering" victory for CBS.

Advertising Age: What does the premiere-week ratings win do for morale at CBS?

Mr. Stringer: There were more spontaneous champagne parties thrown in this company than for a long, long time. It's exhilarating. . . . I used to make jokes about being "mired in third place" as if it were one word. Winning the week was so staggering we almost didn't know how to handle it. We were running around with this stream of consciousness involving good news: first in 25-54; no longer first in over 65; women like us now; kids even like us a lot more, up 25%.

AA: Were you caught by surprise?

Mr. Stringer: We weren't sure we'd get first place, but we did see it coming—that we would be very competitive. With "Evening Shade" and "[The Trials of] Rosie O'Neill," we had quality to add to "Designing Women," "Murphy Brown," "Murder, She Wrote" and so on.

We had no way of knowing how good "The Flash" was going to be because with just a script and a few scenes, the special effects and

Saturn takes to the air as debut nears

By Cleveland Horton

LOS ANGELES—General Motors Corp.'s $3 billion-plus gamble to wrest sales from the imports goes public in TV commercials this week—a teaser campaign that shuns cars to focus on the new Saturn subsidiary's philosophy.

Saturn is the biggest and most eagerly awaited new-product launch of the year, with ad spending expected to reach $100 million through the end of 1991.

The teaser spots will yield to product-oriented advertising Oct. 25, when the first cars go on sale in California, the Southeast and Tennessee, said Don Hudler, Saturn VP-sales, service and marketing.

"Our success is going to be judged . . . by our collective key work in advertising to bring in Saturn prospects that have not considered a domestic product for years."

The six commercials emphasizing the company and its new way of doing business will air regionally through next year as Saturn rolls out its cars across the country.

Saturn officials and executives from agency Hal Riney & Partners, San Francisco, screened two of the prelaunch spots before a luncheon last week sponsored by the Advertising Club of Los Angeles. Among those attending were representatives of Saturn's primary competitors—the Japanese imports—and their ad agencies.

As expected, the TV drive emulates the print campaign that broke last month and promotes the tagline, "A different kind of company. A different kind of car."

The spots feature actors portraying Saturn employees. In one commercial, an assembly line worker outlines the recent history of the domestic automobile industry.

"It was the '60s, and of all the things we could be think-

Diamandis out . . . for now

Publisher exits Hachette; may start own company

By Scott Donaton

Peter Diamandis is likely to return to the magazine industry after an abrupt exit last week from what's now Hachette Magazines. And Hachette, publisher of 17 magazines, may be headed for a downsizing.

The 58-year-old executive, who has a passion for fixing, building and launching magazines, will probably be shopping for titles and could return as the head of a new publishing company in several months, a source close to him said.

Mr. Diamandis stepped down as chairman-ceo of Diamandis Communications Inc. because of differences with its French parent, Hachette S.A., over the direction of the publishing company.

DCI was quickly renamed Hachette Magazines and, sources close to the company say, could be headed for a restructuring that will include layoffs. The company denies there's any restructuring planned and that layoffs are imminent.

P. Diamandis

Two other DCI executives would likely join Mr. Diamandis if he returns to publishing. They are Mr. Diamandis' close friends Robert F. Spillane and Arthur Sukel, who also left the company last week. Mr. Spillane was exec VP and Mr. Sukel senior VP-chief financial officer.

"I think Peter will shortly resurface doing something in publishing, something entrepreneurial," said a Hachette Magazines executive who asked not to be identified.

One sign that the 25-year magazine veteran isn't ready to cut his ties to the publishing industry is his decision to stay active in the Magazine Publishers of America.

Mr. Diamandis' two-year term as MPA chairman ends next week, but the MPA said he will keep the title until then and will address the group's annual meeting in Scottsdale, Ariz., Oct. 7 to 10.

"If [Hachette] thinks the timing of this, where he has to go stand before the entire magazine community, is going to hurt him, they're sadly mis-

McElligott sets up shop, leaving Chiat

By Jon Lafayette and Bob Geiger

Creative superstar Tom McElligott resigned from Chiat/Day/-Mojo last week to form a new Minneapolis agency.

In concert with two executives from Chiat and two from another shop, McElligott Wright Morrison White will open its doors Nov. 1.

Mr. McElligott, 47, will be chairman and creative director of the new shop. His partners are President Tony Wright, 30, formerly VP-director of account management at Chiat's Toronto office; Associate Creative Director John Morrison, 38, formerly VP-group creative director at Carmichael Lynch, Minneapolis; Director of Account Planning Rob White, 34, formerly VP-director of account planning at Chiat's home base in Venice, Calif.; and Director of Finance & Administration Claire Canavan, 40, formerly chief financial officer at Carmichael Lynch.

Mr. McElligott couldn't be reached late last week, but a release describing the new agency was sent out. In part, Mr. McElligott said in the release: "Ironically, we believe that the looming recession is the perfect environment for this agency's birth. . . . the maintenance of a brand remains vital."

Although the new agency hasn't chosen office space yet, Ms. Canavan said the building currently housing Chiat's Minneapolis office, created as a base for Mr. McElligott, is a possibility.

The agency had girded for the opening and already had retained an answering service in Minneapolis to handle calls from the media.

"We don't have any clients at the moment," Mr. Wright said last week. "We have a couple of interesting leads. The clients we're talking to are national brands."

He added: "We see ourselves as a national agency that happens to be starting in Minneapolis. Our plan is to go where business takes us."

Mr. Wright said neither he nor his partners had contacted any of their Chiat or Carmichael clients.

Mr. McElligott's exit as Chiat's exec VP-executive creative director, after only nine months, leaves the agency without the big new-business gun it needed to reverse a string of account losses that led to a restructuring of its New York office. Chiat was counting on Mr. McElligott to pilot the attempt to keep the $35 million Royal Caribbean Cruise Line account, now under review.

"Ironically, we believe that the looming recession is the perfect environment. . . ."
Tom McElligott

"We're pretty upset he left just before Royal Caribbean," said one high-level Chiat executive. "He had an active part in that presentation."

"We're really disappointed, and if it were any other reason we'd be hurt," said Chiat founder and Chairman Jay Chiat. "He's taken a few of our people, so we're not thrilled about that."

Mr. Chiat said Mr. McElligott decided to leave Chiat because he wanted to run his own agency. Mr. Wright also insisted the departures weren't a slap at Chiat but a result of an entrepreneurial spirit among the executives, which had been brewing for some time.

Mr. McElligott's reputation bloomed in Minneapolis, where he co-founded Fallon McElligott Rice in 1981. Fallon was named Advertising Age's Agency of the Year in 1984 and attracted such national advertisers as Federal Express Corp. and Lee Apparel Co.

Mr. McElligott left Fallon in 1987, after "creative differences" with agency Chairman Pat Fallon, though the agency said "personal reasons" were behind Mr. McElligott's departure. At the time, Mr. McElligott acknowledged he's an alcoholic and had spent time at a treatment facility.

Mr. Chiat said there were no plans to replace Mr. McElligott.

"The reason Tom was here is that he was available," he said. "We created a spot for his talent."

Chiat Vice Chairman Lee Clow will now oversee the creative operation in the New York, Toronto and London offices, which had reported to Mr. McElligott.

Mr. Chiat has also taken a much more active role in the agency's New York office, which has lost about 40% of its billings this year as the Reebok International, Sara Lee Corp., Bissell, Arrow Shirts and Soho Natural Soda accounts all left.

"The real issue is that it's really not an individual's situation here," he said. "We've had a ton of people through here. The real issue is that the work has remained pretty good." □

NutraSweet starts review

By Julie Liesse

NutraSweet Co. is reviewing an estimated $60 million to $70 million in business at Ogilvy & Mather offices worldwide.

NutraSweet last month alerted O&M that it plans to ask "a group of selected agencies" to pitch various accounts now handled by the agency, said Richard Nelson, NutraSweet VP-public relations.

"This is part of our continuing process to examine the changing needs of our businesses," Mr. Nelson said.

O&M will be included in the review, but NutraSweet declined to identify other agencies and said it hasn't set a timetable for the process.

But sources close to the review say another NutraSweet agency, FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, has been approached about the O&M business.

This summer, NutraSweet named a new chairman-ceo, Robert Flynn, to replace longtime leader Robert Shapiro.

After taking office, Mr. Flynn put a hold on employee hires, saying he planned to thoroughly review the company's businesses, say sources close to NutraSweet.

Of the O&M offices that handle NutraSweet accounts in 30 countries, the Chicago office has the most at stake. It handles more than half the spending under review, including the $25 million NutraSweet ingredient account; the $3.5 million Sugar Delight tabletop sweetener account; and the Simplesse fat substitute account.

NutraSweet is the second-largest account for O&M's Chicago's office, behind the Sears, Roebuck & Co. Merchandise Group's $150 million account. The Chicago office has worked with NutraSweet for more than 10 years.

O&M executives declined comment on the review.

O&M's New York office has handled Equal tabletop sweetener since 1987, when it won the account from Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago. Equal's measured media spending totaled $9.1 million last year, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

In August, Ian Miller, VP-management supervisor on the NutraSweet business at O&M, Chicago, left to become a managing partner at Tatham-Laird & Kudner, leading to speculation Mr. Miller might attract NutraSweet back to that agency. Mr. Miller, who headed the NutraSweet business for more than five years, was unavailable for comment at press time.

NutraSweet broke its exclusive relationship with O&M in 1988 when it started working with FCB/Leber Katz to develop an introductory strategy for Simplesse fat substitute and Simple Pleasures frozen dessert.

Last year, the company began parceling out projects to other agencies, awarding undisclosed projects to Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif., and J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. None of those products is included in the current review.

Steve Bowen, JWT USA president, said his agency's NutraSweet work is "inactive." He wouldn't comment on whether NutraSweet had approached JWT about the current review, but said he'd "be interested if they're interested in us." □

PM seeks bang with Bucks

By Judann Dagnoli

Philip Morris USA is putting out 20 million "bucks" behind e rollout of its newest smoke. Bucks, a value-price cigarette eviously tested in Birmingham, a., and Phoenix, Ariz., hits na-onal retail shelves this week, d a Philip Morris executive said e brand will get about $18 mil-n to $19 million in the fourth arter for print and outdoor ad-rtising.

That much spending in a single arter is unusual in the value-ice segment, where support rely extends beyond point-of-rchase ads.

Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, is e agency.

Although the company said cks isn't targeted to any partic-ular group of smokers, the new product has a decidedly male appeal. The brand's symbol, appearing prominently in ads and on packaging, is a drawing of a big-antlered buck.

"Bucks is primarily meant to be a man's cigarette—it's cork-tipped, and it's a good, strong smoke," said the Philip Morris executive, who asked not to be identified. "But Marlboro also uses macho imagery, and it's the biggest-selling women's cigarette."

Ads play on the word "bucks" as a synonym for "dollars."

"Beat inflation—buy a Buck," says one headline, while another cro.s, "Buck the system." Other taglines used in the market test included "Save a Buck, buy a Buck" and "The Buck stops here."

Trade (l.) and consumer (above) print ads are part of the $18 million to $19 million fourth-quarter effort backing the rollout of Bucks, Philip Morris' new value-price cigarette.

Bucks is priced similarly to Philip Morris' Cambridge, which places it among the higher end of value-price cigarettes. Below Bucks in pricing are entries such as Liggett Group's subgeneric Pyramid and Philip Morris' own subgeneric Bristol, a regional

One new Honda spot shows a volley of arrows aimed at the Accord, but missing the marque.

Honda's pointed response

New ads target competitors, return to basics

By Cleveland Horton

American Honda Motor Co. drove past a milestone this year when the Accord sedan became the best-selling car in the U.S. It thus became the car to beat.

In new advertising for the 1991 model year, Honda is answering the many comparative campaigns that have matched competing models to the Accord.

A TV commercial called "Arrows" from Rubin Postaer & Associates, Los Angeles, opens with an Accord against a neutral backdrop. Soon an arrow whistles by the car and sinks into the wall behind it. Then several more arrows zip by the car, follo[illegible]y a continuous volley.

The voice-over, spoken by actor Jack Lemmon, tells how other carmakers try to copy the Accord but can't. As the last arrow shoots across the screen, Mr. Lemmon says, "Nice shot."

Mr. Lemmon replaces actor Daniel J. Travanti, who became the voice of Honda in 1987. He followed Burgess Meredith, who performed Honda voice-overs for 10 years.

"Arrows" carries a "good lick of humor," said Eric

Bozell inks accord with Soviets' Tass

By Gary Levin

NEW YORK—Bozell last week signed an exclusive agreement with Tass, the Soviet government news agency, to represent each other in the U.S. and Soviet Union.

Under the deal, Bozell and Tass will provide numerous services for each other, including arranging introductions for officials, placing advertising, doing market research and investigating corporate sponsorship opportunities.

Recently, Tass helped secure outdoor board space on Pushkin Square in Moscow for Bozell client Samsung Corp., though only a few Samsung products are available in the Soviet Union.

The news agency has also promised to assist Bozell in such seemingly mundane tasks as getting building permits or hotel space.

In the U.S., Bozell supplied Tass with cars from Bozell client Chrysler Corp. for the news agency's coverage of the Bush-Gorbachev summit, and will help Tass find sponsors for the Soviet entry in the America's Cup yachting race.

"The real idea was to find a group that could help us in the Soviet Union with information, research, whatever," said Murray Smith, president-international at Bozell. "We think it's potentially good for our clients. It's not a traditional ad agency-to-ad agency deal, but Russia's not an advertising country at this stage."

Bristol pops up in surging antacid market

By Patricia Winters

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. is ving into the $1 billion antacid rket with Medacid, claimed to superior to other brands be-se it's in caplet form.

The product, now testing on the st Coast, could roll out nation-y in a year if successful, an in-stry source said.

A Bristol-Myers spokeswoman d Medacid bills itself as "easy swallow" and providing "fast, ective relief without the chalki-ss, grittiness or unpleasant af-taste of some chewable tablets liquids."

Medacid "contains an ingred-t that helps it dissolve faster" an other brands, the spokeswo-n said.

In one TV spot from DDB Needham Worldwide, New York, live action is mixed with special effects to show a man crumbling into chalk after chewing an antacid tablet, then melting after trying a liquid. He's finally relieved when he takes Medacid with water, said Richard Taylor, a director at Image Point Productions, which did the spot.

Medacid is testing in Seattle and Spokane. Wash.; Portland, Ore.; San Francisco; Los Angeles; and Salt Lake City. The TV spot broke last month in some of those markets.

Competing brands aren't named in the spot, but leading liquid and tablet antacids include Procter & Gamble Co.'s Pepto-Bismol, which leads the overall $970 million market with a 15.6% dollar share; Rorer Pharmaceuticals Corp.'s Maalox, with 15.5%; SmithKline Beecham's Tums, with 13.7%; Warner-Lambert Co.'s Rolaids, with 13.1%; and Johnson & Johnson/Merck Consumer Pharmaceuticals' Mylanta, with 11.7%. The share numbers are for the year ended in April, from scanner tracking data.

The antacid market is hot, not only because it's huge but because it's expected to see new growth as marketers of prescription ulcer drugs introduce over-the-counter antacids within the next few years.

SmithKline Beecham, which markets the prescription drug Tagamet; Glaxo, which markets Zantac; and Marion Merrell Dow, marketer of Carafate, are all developing OTC formulations.

"For Bristol not to be in the [antacid] category is crazy," said a pharmaceutical industry executive.

Gourmet coffee stirs market

NEW YORK—Gourmet and premium coffee sales buoyed the $6.5 billion retail coffee market last year with its first growth in five years, according to a new study by Find/SVP. Retail coffee sales rose 1.6%.

The research company's study, titled "The Market for Gourmet Coffees & Teas," concludes that "the decline [in coffee consumption] has bottomed out" and coffee volume will grow 3% to 5% annually over the next several years.

According to the study, 52.5% of the U.S. population over the age of 10 drank an average of 1.75 cups of coffee a day in 1989, up from 1988's average of 50% of consumers drinking 1.67 cups a day.

Find/SVP attributes most of the increase to gourmet coffee brands marketed by specialty companies and premium coffees, which Find/SVP defines as upscale versions of mass-marketed brands.

The study estimates sales of gourmet coffee at $676 million for 1989, premium coffee sales at $277 million and decaffeinated gourmet/premium coffees at $283 million.

Premium and gourmet coffees accounted for 19% of all coffee sales in 1989, up from 10% five years earlier, the study said.

Find/SVP expects gourmet and premium coffee sales to reach 30% of the U.S. retail coffee market by 1994.

Retail tea sales have been declining since 1986 and are expected to continue downward despite the popularity of iced tea, the study says.

Almost 80% of all tea consumed in the U.S. is iced tea, Find/SVP says.

The study also finds that tea drinkers will continue to shift from regular to herbal and specialty teas, rather than increasing consumption of tea in general. By 1994, herbal and gourmet products will account for 21% of the total market, up from 15% in 1989. □

Crush's double duty

Single ad campaign to cover U.S., Canada

By Patricia Winters

Agencies for Crush soft drink in the U.S. and Canada are competing for the brand's creative assignment by developing a single TV campaign that can be used in both countries.

But Ammirati & Puris, New York, which won the U.S. Crush account six months ago, already has a head start: Its new TV campaign for Crush is currently testing in both countries.

Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, Toronto, handles Crush in Canada.

"We were intrigued by what Ammirati & Puris put together," said Randy Papadellis, VP-marketing in the U.S. for Cadbury Beverages' Canada Dry, Crush and Hires brands. "If it does well, then theoretically it will run in both Canada and the U.S."

Cadbury will break a new Crush campaign next spring in both countries, marking the first time the brand has been advertised in the U.S. since Cadbury acquired it from Procter & Gamble Co. last year.

Mr. Papadellis said Cadbury Beverages in Canada has agreed to examine the results of the Ammirati test ads, but regardless of whether it runs the spots, Saatchi will continue as the Crush agency of record for the Canadian company.

Saatchi also still has the opportunity to develop a new Crush TV campaign, but Mr. Papadellis said that "it just so happened that Ammirati had a campaign ready."

"We're hoping that between Saatchi and Ammirati we will come up with one campaign to run in both countries," he said.

And whoever wins next year's creative won't have it forever.

Instead, Ammirati and Saatchi will compete for the Crush creative business each year.

"It's a situation where we know we need agencies in both Toronto and New York [for media buying, radio, point of purchase and other localized efforts], but we also know we'd like to have a common look" in the two countries for the TV campaign, Mr. Papadellis said. "Our interest isn't to have one agency in North America. . . ."

Cadbury is looking for a single North American image to save money on production costs and to avoid confusing Canadian consumers with different TV images. Mr. Papadellis said some studies show that up to half of all media seen in Canada comes from the U.S.

The unified look will extend to North American promotions and packaging, he said.

Mr. Papadellis called the unified approach an "evolving" process and said ideally the company would like to provide a single image for Crush worldwide.

In North America, Crush is grappling with conflicting images as a teen soft drink in Canada but as a wholesome, all-family drink in the U.S., an image Mr. Papadellis said Crush wants to maintain.

Cadbury also plans a unified look and image for Hires root beer in North America, but since the brand isn't getting TV support next year, it doesn't affect ad assignments.

Crush is the leading orange soft drink in Canada and Hires is the No. 2 root beer, behind A&W Brands' A&W. In the U.S., Crush is the nation's fourth best-selling orange soda behind Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Mandarin Orange Slice, Coca-Cola Co.'s Minute Maid orange soda and Cadbury Beverages' Sunkist orange. Hires root beer ranks behind leader A&W, Barq Inc.'s Barq's and Pepsi-Cola Co.'s Mug.

The Crush and Hires account in the U.S. is estimated to be worth $6 million to $8 million. □

Varietals put some punch in wine sales

By John C. Maxwell Jr.

There's a silver lining for the wine industry in the overall trend of consumers drinking less: They're drinking better.

Wine volume continues to drop, hitting about 512 million gallons last year, down 8% to 9% from 1988 levels. There are several reasons for the decline, but foremost among them is society's changing attitude toward consuming alcoholic beverages in general.

But the varietal segment has been a big success, with domestics up an estimated 15% to 20% last year. In contrast, generic wines were down 5% to 8%.

Varietals, characterized by mid- to high-price brands, now comprise 25% to 30% of the wine industry's volume, up from an estimated 12% five years ago.

Industry experts, however, do expect varietals' growth rate to slow to 7% to 9% over the next few years as importers continue to price aggressively and as the overall industry keeps heading downward.

A second factor in the industry's decline is that wine coolers are turning out to be more of a fad than a trend.

Wine cooler volume fell 15% to approximately 82 million gallons in 1989, about the same rate of decline as in 1988. The cooler decline came primarily at the expense of secondary brands, with Jos. E. Seagram & Sons and E&J Gallo Winery strengthening their positions.

Seagram appears to have taken the lead in this segment with a 36.5% share, up 6.5 points from 1988. Gallo has about 35.2% of the cooler segment, up 5.2 points.

For 1990, volume declines in wine coolers should stabilize, and varietal growth will moderate. The wine industry can anticipate another 8% to 9% decline.

The breakdown of domestic wine by types indicates white is the growing preference, achieving a 71.3% share of the market.

Ten years ago, red wine accounted for 22.5% of the market, substantially larger than the 13.3% it has today. Rose accounted for 24.5% of the market 10 years ago and has declined to 15.4%.

In company market share, Gallo increased 1.8% in volume last year from 1988, moving its commanding lead up 3.3 points to 31.9%.

Heublein rose a notch to second place in 1989, past Vintners International Co. Heublein, helped by its acquisition of Christian Brothers, increased 7.9% in volume last year and now holds about 7.7% of the market. Vintners International was up 0.4 of a share point last year to 7% market share despite being down 2.7% in volume.

Imported wine volume dropped almost 6.25% to 76 million gallons in 1989, but total share of the U.S. market was up slightly, from 14.4% to 14.8%.

Italian imports fell almost 10% last year and now comprise 41.5% of the import market. France increased slightly last year and now holds 29.4%. Imports from Spain (7.9% of the import market), West Germany (6.9%) and Portugal (3.9%) also declined last year.

Banfi Vintners continues as the leading wine importer, though its leading product, Riunite, saw volume drop to 4.7 million cases last year.

Brown-Forman Beverage Co.'s Bolla was second with an estimated 1 million cases last year. □

Pepsi outpaces Nike

By Kate Fitzgerald

Nike gave Pepsi a run for its money in the race for ad awareness in August, but the cola managed to stay No. 1.

Pepsi had a 3.9% share of first mentions in Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey, and Nike garnered 3.8%.

Nike first appeared in the top 10 in March and has been among the best-recalled advertisers since, apparently on the strength of its continued barrage of TV spots featuring Bo Jackson.

Coca-Cola finished third for the second straight month.

Automobile advertising maintained higher than average awareness. Ford placed fourth, while General Motors Corp.'s Chevrolet shared fifth with Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser and general grocery store ads. Automobile ads in general ranked No. 8, followed by a tie between McDonald's Corp. and Toyota for ninth.

When asked specifically about car and truck ads, 21.9% of those surveyed said Ford came to mind first. Chevrolet was second with 18%, followed by Toyota, 9.8%; Nissan, 4%; and GM's Buick, 3.7%.

AdWatch survey of advertising awareness Top 10 in August

In August, 1,000 people were asked: Of all the advertising you have seen, heard or read in the past 30 days, which advertising first comes to mind?

In the tire category, Goodyear was first with 30.6%, followed by Michelin, 21.5%; Firestone, 6%; BF Goodrich, 4.3%; and Uniroyal, 1.2%.

Alpo led the pet food category, named first by 14.8% of those surveyed. Ralston Purina Co.'s Purina was second with 11%, followed by Carnation Co.'s Friskies, 4.2%; Quaker Oats Co.'s Kibbles 'n Bits, 2.7%; and Kal Kan, 1.8%.

AdWatch is a joint project of Ad Age and Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

Gatorade, cable net team

NEW YORK—Quaker Oats Co.'s Gatorade isotonic sports drink has signed as a sponsor of SportsChannel America's "National Federation High School Game of the Week."

The $500,000 deal is for one year.

Gatorade also becomes the first major corporate sponsor of the National Federation of State High School Associations, which markets TV rights to a weekly package of high school football, basketball, hockey and other sports. Three more sponsors are being sought.

Also, SportsChannel is expected to announce signing Miller Brewing Co. for a $500,000-plus sponsorship of the cable network's "Sports Nightly" updates about National Football League franchises. □

'Conde Nast Traveler' rising fast in a hot field

By Scott Donaton

Three years after its launch, Conde Nast Traveler is still growing at a rapid clip and is now looking to close the gap with longtime category leader Travel & Leisure.

"I think we'll be able to pull up alongside them in the very near future," said Ronald Galotti, publisher of Conde Nast Publications' monthly travel magazine.

In a year when most magazine publishers are singing the blues, Conde Nast Traveler saw its ad pages reach 636.3 through August, up 15.8% from the same issue last year. Its October issue, marking the magazine's third anniversary, is the largest in its brief history with 126.5 ad pages, a 6.6% gain over the same issue last year.

Circulation is also on the rise. Conde Nast Traveler will hold its rate base at 600,000 next year—largely to avoid hitting media buyers with double-digit rate increases—but according to the latest Audit Bureau of Circulations report, the magazine's first half average circulation was nearly 757,000, a 26% bonus.

Conde Nast Traveler is already the undisputed No. 2 book in the travel field, but it still has a long journey before it can catch the highly profitable Travel & Leisure, which pulled in $85 million in advertising and circulation revenues last year.

Through August, the American Express Publishing Corp. title's ad pages were down 5.3% to 855.9, but the drop was due more to a change in the way it counts advertorial pages than to the overall softness in the magazine industry.

Travel & Leisure's rate base of 1.1 million places it firmly atop the travel field.

"Traveler has done well in three short years. They produce a good product," said Bob Zach, senior VP-media director at Chiat/Day/-Mojo, New York. "But I think Travel & Leisure is still more of a core buy, and the beauty of it is its access to an upscale American Express cardholder."

Some 90% of the monthly's 1.1 million subscribers are AmEx cardholders.

Conde Nast Traveler "is second, but they're a distant second," said James Berrien, Travel & Leisure VP-publisher. "I think it will be a while before there's a real strong second in this category."

With the $300 billion travel industry booming, the travel field currently ranks among the hottest in the magazine industry. Much of the field's recent success, though, can be directly traced to the launch of Conde Nast Traveler, a fact not lost on Mr. Berrien.

"They legitimized the field for some of the advertising categories Conde Nast always had a strong franchise with in the past," primarily cosmetics and fashion advertisers, he said. "We had not been able to convince as many of those advertisers as we would've liked to come into the travel field."

But Mr. Berrien said Travel & Leisure is in the best position to capitalize on the newfound success of the travel category.

"Any time you've got a market people are talking about, it's going to be good for the strongest books," he said. "It's been good for our business."

Conde Nast Traveler was born in October 1987 after Conde Nast acquired Signatures from Citicorp Diners Club for a reported $25 million and spent another $15 million revamping and relaunching the magazine.

The monthly was built around Editor in Chief Harold Evans' "truth in travel" editorial motto, which cost it some advertising in the beginning but eventually earned it the respect of both readers and advertisers.

Conde Nast Traveler won National Magazine Awards in 1988 and 1989 and was nominated for three awards this year.

"I think it's done well because it takes a different editorial approach; it's not just a puff piece for travel," said John Grey, senior VP-director of media planning at J. Walter Thompson USA.

Conde Nast Traveler was also able to expand the advertising categories traditionally open to travel magazines because of its treatment of travel as one compo-

Alpo eats into cat food market

By Julie Liesse

Alpo has clawed its way into the $2 billion cat food market with a vengeance.

In its first nine months on supermarket shelves, Alpo cat food registered $100 million in sales, says the company, quoting Arbitron/SAMI figures.

Alpo chalked up a 10% share of the premium canned cat food segment led by Heinz Pet Products Co.'s 9-Lives and achieved a 4% share of the fragmented dry cat food category dominated by Ralston Purina Co., in the SAMI four-week report ending in August.

Only four brands—9-Lives, Kal Kan Foods' Whiskas, Carnation Co.'s Friskies and Purina Cat Chow/Kitten Chow—surpass Alpo in the cat food market.

"Everything has come together better than we hoped," said Debbie Nellson, director of cat food marketing for Alpo Petfoods, a Grand Metropolitan unit. "Once we put the Alpo name and its heritage together with [cartoon spokesman] Garfield, we came across with a successful taste and nutrition story."

Heading into Grand Met's new fiscal year, starting today, Alpo is readying a line extension and new ads.

The company this fall will add to its 28-item line with Sliced Varieties, canned versions in beef, chicken and turkey flavors. Dry cat food or cat treats are two other possible expansion areas, Ms. Nellson said.

"A 10% share is good, but still not one of the top three or four—which we think is a realistic target," Ms. Nellson said.

Second-year marketing support won't equal the $70 million in ads promotions Alpo committed to the introduction, but Ms. Nellson said spending would be at "competitive levels." Alpo planned to spend $20 million on first-year advertising; it spent $12 million through March, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

New TV commercials will be shot this fall for an early 1991 break date, Ms. Nellson said. Weightman Advertising, Philadelphia, handles.

Garfield, Jim Davis' cartoon cat licensed by United Media Licensing, will be back in the new TV spots.

Garfield has been a selling point with retailers, which were wary of adding 28 items to an already crowded pet food aisle.

"We've been very fortunate, because we shocked the heck out of [retailers] when we presented the line," Ms. Nellson said. "They've been very supportive." □ as added three new coffee machines to its line. Also, the company is ambitiously branding many of its machines with the Helikon name.

Media advertising has been put on hold until distribution s secured, but Helikon did use a West Berlin ad agency to produce a product brochure for distribution to its sales force.

Seifenwerk Riesa

"We've picked up the glove that was thrown at our feet by the West," asserted Frank Weiss, an engineer working as a sales manager for Seifenwerk Riesa. Seifenwerk was virtually the sole supplier of bar soaps in East Germany and had valuable contracts to manufacture soaps for distributors in West Germany.

To compete in a united Germany, Seifenwerk has added perfumes from Western suppliers to two of its 12 soap brands and launched a new beauty soap called Cree and a bar soap for infants called Baby. Bars have been reshaped to fit more easily into the hand, and simple, utilitarian wrappers have been replaced with packaging more like that in West Germany.

"We are bringing the products closer to the needs of our customers," Mr. Weiss said, adding that retailers have responded favorably to new Seifenwerk products.

However, media advertising is out of the question at the moment, he said, because of financial considerations.

He said the company recalled about 200,000 bars of soap in East Germany last spring because bars arriving from the West, including Beiersdorf's Nivea, Colgate-Palmolive Co.'s Palmolive, Unilever's Lux and Henkel's Fa made the old bars unsalable.

Seifenwerk believes it can survive unification by undercutting prices of established West German marketers. Mr. Weiss said Baby will retail for about 88¢, compared with West German infant soap brands selling at about 25% more.

Pepe Kunstoffverarbeitung

"Our biggest adjustment now is to distribution," said Hermann Voss, managing director of Pepe Kunstoffverarbeitung, manufacturer of Pepe plastic toy building blocks. "Distribution was never a topic with us. Now it is a constant [worry]" because under the old system the state was responsible for export sales.

Nearly a third of Pepe's blocks used to be sold in Western Europe, including West Germany, through East Germany's state export organization.

Mr. Voss said Lego filed legal proceedings five years ago for copyright infringement in West Germany, forcing the company, then known as VEB Plastica Bad Koesen, to alter the system or lose customers in the West. Pepe adjusted its blocks then to make them incompatible witn Lego and hopes new, color packaging will help establish the brand as a low-price alternative to Lego.

The toy company must rely on its price advantage as a selling point because it can't afford to advertise.

Pepe last year had revenues of about $8.2 million. Among Pepe's largest export clients were the Soviet Union and West German mail-order company Otto, which is still a customer. □

'Traveler'

nent of an overall affluent lifestyle.

In 1988, Conde Nast Traveler's first full year, the magazine carried 628.9 ad pages. That figure rose 52.7% to 960.35 ad pages last year. Mr. Galotti said he expects to finish 1990 with 1,100 ad pages, a 14.5% increase.

Travel & Leisure carried 1,412.8 ad pages in 1988, up 15% from the previous year, and 1,516.2 ad pages in 1989, a 7.3% gain. Mr. Berrien said the magazine's ad pages dipped this year because it discontinued counting editorial pages in special advertising or advertorial sections as ad pages.

As Travel & Leisure and Conde Nast Traveler vie for the top spot in the travel field, a number of smaller entries in the field are being rejuvenated.

Reader's Digest Association recently redesigned its Travel Holiday monthly and has been giving its special-interest publications group more of a presence on Madison Avenue. Murdoch Magazines' monthly European Travel & Life and a revamped every-other-monthly Endless Vacation are also getting more aggressive in their pursuit of readers and advertisers.

Six-year-old National Geographic Traveler may also become a threat now that it's decided to expand its circulation efforts beyond the membership of the National Geographic Society. The every-other-monthly has a rate base of 700,000 and carried 184.16 ad pages through August, a gain of 58.7%. □

P&G, Lever back new detergents

By Laurie Freeman

The battle of the detergent giants becomes more agitated this month as Procter & Gamble Co. and Lever Bros. expand distribution of superconcentrates.

Both P&G and Lever believe superconcentrated powder detergents will eventually replace many of the regular-density powders now on the market.

P&G began shipping Ultra versions of Tide, Cheer, Gain and Oxydol into California, Colorado, Idaho, Nevada, Utah and Wyoming on Sept. 17.

Lever completed distribution of Wisk Power Scoop in much of the South and West last month. The product will be available in most of the same areas as the P&G detergents, along with the Pacific Coast, Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana, said George Yuen, senior product manager for Wisk Power Scoop. He said Wisk Power Scoop will expand into the rest of the U.S. next year.

Advertising for the new detergents will break by midmonth.

Mr. Yuen said Lever is backing Wisk Power Scoop with the largest ad budget—more than $52 million—of any detergent in the $3.8 billion category (AA, Sept. 3). J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, is handling the network and cable TV, magazine and free standing insert campaign, themed "Change what you mean by clean."

P&G won't reveal budgets for its superconcentrates. The company backed all its detergents with $94.5 million in measured media spending last year. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising is the agency for Tide and Oxydol; Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, handles Cheer; and Wells, Rich, Greene, New York, is Gain's agency.

The new detergents will get 30-second spots on network, cable, syndicated and spot TV. Ultra Tide will also be supported with magazine ads and outdoor boards.

The P&G products have done well since they began testing last fall in Arizona and expanded to Texas and New Mexico this summer.

"In Arizona, 50% of our powder detergent business has converted to the Ultra detergents," said P&G spokeswoman Jennifer Bailey.

The Tide brand alone gained more than 4 share points in Phoenix, Ariz., said Jay Freedman, household products analyst at Kidder, Peabody & Co. "They've converted more than 80% of their detergent volume to the superconcentrates."

P&G is the U.S. detergent leader with a 53.5% share; Lever is second with 23.5%.

Ads don't position the superconcentrates as being better for the environment. However, Lucky Stores, a West Coast supermarket chain, heralded their arrival with page ads from Grey Advertising, Los Angeles, headlined "New products for a cleaner environment."

Both companies' superconcentrates are packaged in containers made of recycled paper. The products have recyclable plastic handles and scoops, and use only one-third to one-half cup per washload compared with 1½ cups of regular detergent.

Colgate-Palmolive Co., the No. 3 U.S. detergent marketer with an 8.4% share, has said it has no plans to expand distribution of Fab Ultra superconcentrated detergent, which began testing earlier this year in Memphis, Tenn.; Phoenix; and Oklahoma City. A repackaged version of Fresh Start superconcentrated detergent is testing in Texas.

FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, handles both brands. □

Medacid

in the top two OTC categories—analgesics and cough/cold remedies.

The company tried to get into the market before, having test-marketed an effervescent antacid called Resolve in the 1960s. In the mid-1980s, it won OTC marketing rights to Tagamet but the deal was later negated, said a Smith-Kline Beecham spokesman.

Recent activity in the market underscores its importance to pharmaceutical companies.

Last year, J&J/Merck acquired Mylanta antacid from Stuart Pharmaceuticals and in May the company began investing heavily in advertising via Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising, New York.

P&G and Rorer had announced a deal to transfer Maalox marketing rights in the U.S. to P&G, but the deal was canceled in August after opposition from the U.S. Department of Justice.

In addition to Mylanta, J&J's McNeil Consumer Products Co. is test-marketing Tylenol Extra-Strength antacid, an effervescent antacid that competes directly with Miles Inc.'s Alka-Seltzer, which holds an estimated 11% share of the antacid market.

Bristol-Myers' new Medacid isn't the first antacid in pill form. In 1987, Miles tested Maxion, positioned as "easy to swallow with water." The product was later dropped.

One problem such a product could face is the consumer perception that a person should feel an antacid working, such as when a liquid goes into the stomach, said the pharmaceutical industry executive.

Bristol-Myers is said to be emphasizing convenience and speed in sales demonstrations to retailers, dropping Medacid and a chewable tablet into a glass of water—seemingly to show how quickly Medacid dissolves.

Working in Medacid's favor, the industry executive said, is the convenience of a pill. Sales of chewable antacids are growing in double digits because of the convenience, while liquids have had single-digit declines through April, the executive said. □

GM weighs cuts of $200 million in ad spending

By Raymond Serafin

General Motors Corp. is considering slashing its 1991 ad budget by as much as $200 million from this year's estimated $1.4 billion, say sources familiar with ongoing budget discussions.

Corporate officials haven't formally notified divisional ad directors and ad agencies of the spending levels for next year. But a consultant to one of GM's agencies said that, though cuts haven't been put in writing yet, they would be across the board and total up to $200 million, or a 14.3% cut.

One highly placed agency official, who asked not to be identified, agreed the cuts would probably be about $200 million, based on information he had been told informally about his divisional client's budget.

A GM corporate spokesman, Harold Jackson, said, "I don't know of any cuts," but added, "We never talk about our ad expenditures."

Various divisional and agency officials said they hadn't been notified of budget cuts but wouldn't be surprised if GM tries to put a lid on spending in the face of economic uncertainty.

Several agency officials said budget cuts would affect all media but would hurt magazines the most because much of GM's TV buys have been made upfront.

Some executives speculated GM would take a conservative approach to 1991 spending plans for now but would release more funds later if the economy is stronger than predicted or if market situations demand more spending.

"We've sent our budget recommendations, but I haven't heard anything in response," said Richard O'Connor, chairman-ceo of Lintas:Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich. "I would be very disappointed [if GM cuts its budget]. I see no signs of the Japanese cutting back."

Lintas:Campbell-Ewald handles more GM business than any other agency, more than $400 million in billings for Chevrolet, GMAC, Delco and AC-Delco.

GM's other agencies for national car and truck advertising are D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles for Cadillac and Pontiac; McCann-Erickson Worldwide for

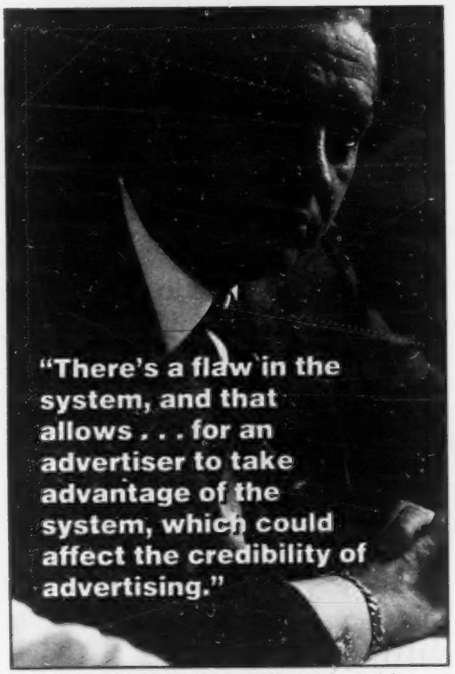
Coke seeks tough TV ad watchdog

Herbert criticizes comparative claims

By Patricia Winters and Wayne Walley



"There's a flaw in the system, and that allows . . . for an advertiser to take advantage of the system, which could affect the credibility of advertising."

Coke's Ira Herbert sees a problem with ad claims.

Coca-Cola Co. is spearheading a drive to change the way the Big 3 TV networks judge comparative advertising.

Ira Herbert, president of Coca-Cola's North American soft-drink sector, has met with top executives at each network to discuss what he believes to be a growing problem: false ad claims inadvertently slipping by network scrutiny and getting on the air.

A dramatic rise in the use of comparative advertising, paired with network staff cuts, has hampered the networks' ability to judge the validity of comparative advertising, Mr. Herbert told Advertising Age.

"There's a flaw in the system, and that allows—either purposely or by accident—for an advertiser to take advantage of the system, which could affect the credibility of advertising," said Mr. Herbert, who was quick to point out he's sympathetic to the network's overwhelming task.

"I think we have a basic structural problem here," he added. "It's not fair to competitors and it's not fair to consumers."

RICO false-ad suits rock industry

Use of racketeering statute could slow down resolution of disputes with FTC

By Steven W. Colford

WASHINGTON—A controversial anti-racketeering statute is being used against national advertisers that are paying multimillion-dollar out-of-court settlements rather than contest false-advertising charges.

Ralston Purina Co. and North American Philips Corp. have already paid more than $3 million combined rather than risk losing class action suits filed under the 1970 Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act.

The controversy may also have a chilling effect on the Federal Trade Commission's efforts to reach consent agreements on false-advertising cases. Advertisers could find that such consents open them up to RICO suits later from aggressive lawyers.

The roster of national advertisers involved in RICO-inspired false-advertising suits includes Mobil Corp., Perrier Group, CPC International and Prudential Insurance Co. of America, according to legal papers and attorneys close to the cases.

Advertisers are settling out of court because of the high cost of losing—triple damages, all legal fees, consumer redress and, perhaps worst of all, the stigma of being branded a mobster.

"The word 'racketeering' is an enormously serious stigma," said Dan Jaffe, exec VP of the Association of National Advertisers.

The RICO statute, designed to attack or-

Chiat loses Royal Caribbean

MIAMI—Royal Caribbean Cruise Lines moved its $42 million account to Rosenfeld, Sirowitz, Humphrey & Strauss from Chiat/Day/Mojo, both New York. The account was the largest in Chiat's New York office, which installed new management and laid off more than 30 staffers after the cruise line announced its review in July. Robert Perkins, president of the office, said he was disappointed with the loss but wouldn't say whether more changes or layoffs were expected. Since April, Chiat has lost the Reebok, Soho soda, Bissell, Sara Lee and Cluett, Peabody & Co.'s Arrow shirt accounts. Two other accounts, American Express Gold Card and New York Life, are said to have cut back spending, leaving the office with billings of less than $100 million compared with 1989's $210 million. The Royal Caribbean loss follows the departure of Exec VP-Executive Creative Director Tom McElligott, which also resulted in the loss of a Pilisbury assignment at Chiat's Toronto office (see stories on Page 4).

Interpublic talks to Wyse

NEW YORK—Interpublic Group of Cos. is in talks to buy Wyse Advertising, a $140 million Cleveland-based agency with a small office here. If a deal is struck, Wyse would be an independent unit of Interpublic, possibly reporting to Lintas:Worldwide, sources said. Executives at Interpublic acknowledged the discussions but said no deal has been struck. Interpublic and Wyse ear-

TWA looks in-house

Cost cutting leads Y&R to resign

By Jennifer Lawrence and Jon Lafayette

Trans World Airlines likely will take its $45 million domestic ad business in-house after Young & Rubicam, New York, dropped the entire $70 million account for cost reasons.

The nation's No. 7 carrier said it may use free-lance services from a creative project shop formed by Martin Solow, Bert Steinhauser and Herb Strauss, tentatively called Solow, Steinhauser & Strauss, though no formal deal has been signed. TWA last week also talked to Bob Veder, former group creative director at Della Femina, McNamee, New York, and now a freelancer.

But the $20 million European ad account will be put in review, said Shelly Kravitz, TWA's VP-advertising-leisure marketing. He said the airline has already had discussions with two agencies but declined to identify them. Lintas:Worldwide may be under consideration, said agency sources familiar with the situation.

TWA hasn't decided whether to seek an agency for direct marketing, which also was under Y&R's wing.

"We've pretty well made up our minds to create a domestic in-house ad agency," Mr. Kravitz said. "There's a 95% chance that will happen. We are doing no active solicitation for a domestic agency."

Mr. Kravitz said all domestic print buying will be handled in-house; the carrier will use a buying service for broadcast media.

Y&R prompted TWA's agency realignments when it bailed out of the $70 million worldwide account, which it had held since 1986.

Joe DeDeo, Y&R president-ceo, said Carl Icahn, TWA chairman-ceo, asked the agency to consider a significantly reduced level of compensation. "Carl made us an offer we could refuse," said Mr. DeDeo.

TWA had estimated the cost of handling the account in-house and wanted Y&R to match it. "The difference was several million in revenue," Mr. DeDeo said.

Although Y&R resigned primarily over financial issues, it said changes at TWA made servicing the business more difficult.

Mr. Kravitz said the move to go in-house was inspired by Mr. Icahn in an effort to cut costs.

TWA's ad department has been undergoing change since Mr. Kravitz's arrival last March. At that time, the department began reporting directly to Mr. Icahn.

Mr. Kravitz's predecessor, Tracy Britton, reported to Robert Cozzi, senior VP-marketing. Mr. Cozzi resigned last week over differences with Mr. Icahn, company insiders said. Mr. Cozzi confirmed he had left the company but declined to elaborate. □

Schick to nick Sensor

By Alison Fahey and Gary Levin

Warner-Lambert Co. is going after razor giant Gillette Co. with a new Schick shaving system called Tracer.

The new product, designed to go head-to-head with Gillette's Sensor in the $870 million-plus U.S. wet-razor business, will be unveiled at an Oct. 10 news conference, nearly one year to the day after Gillette introduced the new razor technology of Sensor.

Invitations to the conference didn't identify Tracer but called it the "single largest new-product introduction in the history of Schick."

Ads for the shaver will break late in the fourth quarter with a $15 million marketing budget via J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, said sources familiar with the plans.

Gillette last week said it's boosting Sensor ad spending for 1991 to $50 million, from $35 million to $40 million this year. BBDO Worldwide handles.

Schick said the new product uses innovative technology. Industry sources say Tracer is a razor system, rather than a disposable, with flexible blades. Sensor's blades are also flexible.

"Flexible . . . blades are a major similarity [to Sensor], and Warner-Lambert has found a way to do it a lot cheaper."

"The concept of flexible and floating blades is a major similarity [to Sensor], and Warner-Lambert has found a way to do it a lot cheaper," said a source close to Schick.

Tracer has plastic parts that would make it less expensive than Sensor, say retail sources familiar with the product. The product will be on store shelves by early 1991.

The Warner-Lambert division had about a 16% dollar share in the wet-razor category as of the July-August period, compared with Gillette's 61.7%.

Sensor, introduced in January, now has a 7.9% share of the wet-razor category. And though part of Sensor's growth is due to cannibalization of other Gillette systems, "Sensor's strength has pulled Gillette's total market share up," said Andrew Shore, VP-analyst at Prudential-Bache Securities.

Gillette said by yearend it will have spent $35 million to $40 million on measured media for Sensor. The company last year said it would spend $50 million in 1990.

However, the supply of Sensor razors fell short of demand and the company moved ad dollars out of the first half of 1990.

Some of the money went into retail promotions as supply began to catch up to demand last month, said Bruce Cleverly, Gillette's VP-marketing, North Atlantic Group. □

Penney's theme draws suit

By Christy Fisher

J.C. Penney Co. has been sued over its new "Fashion comes to life" advertising theme.

Charming Shoppes, a chain that operates more than 1,000 Fashion Bug women's clothing stores, filed suit last month in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, claiming Penney's new theme infringed on its service mark "Come to life." That theme is used in print advertising.

Charming Shoppes is charging Penney's with unfair competition and seeking a preliminary and permanent injunction against Penney's use of "Fashion comes to life."

Penney's introduced the theme line Sept. 9 in a $10 million multimedia blitz that included network TV (AA, Aug. 27). "Fashion comes to life" replaces Penney's 7-year-old theme, "You're looking smarter than ever."

The line is being used in all the company's estimated $407.5 million in advertising and corporate communications materials.

Charming Shoppes is asking that all advertising, banners and promotional materials bearing the theme line be recalled and destroyed.

Also, it seeks an undetermined amount of actual and punitive damages for the allegedly willful infringement.

"We do not believe there is any basis for their claims," said J. Duncan Muir, public relations program manager for Penney's. "Our [theme line] is quite a bit different."

Penney's agency, N W Ayer/-Southwest, Dallas, wasn't named in the suit. However, agency President Tom Hooke said a service mark search was conducted.

"We do not think there is a copyright infringement," he said.

Charming Shoppes claims in the lawsuit that it filed an application on or about March 30 with the U.S. Patent & Trademark Office to register "Come to life." The retailer then began using the theme in its advertising on or about Aug. 1.

Penney's filed an application for its new theme on May 4, the suit says.

Confusion between the two retailers is likely, the lawsuit says, because of the similarity between Penney's "Fashion comes to life" and Charming's "Come to life" theme lines and also because both retailers target the same customers, women.

The court hasn't yet set a date for the hearing on the injunction request. □

Backer big winner in pan-Euro derby

By Elena Bowes

More than $840 million in pan-European business was assigned between June 1, 1989, and June 30, 1990, according to an Advertising Age survey.

As multinational advertisers consolidated spending by brand or product category at a single agency, 46 accounts worth at least $10 million apiece were assigned during the 13-month period. Twenty-seven are new assignments.

Saatchi & Saatchi Co.-owned Backer Spielvogel Bates Worldwide won the largest dollar amount—$109 million from seven accounts. Almost half came from two accounts—a $25 million assignment for 3M's Olympic sponsorship program and a $23 million assignment for Canary Islands Tourism.

"I think what we are seeing is a desire on the part of clients for more centralization."

"I think what we are seeing is a desire on the part of clients for more centralization," said Brian Johnson, J. Walter Thompson Co.'s London-based European new-business director.

To qualify for the chart, an account must be worth a total of at least $10 million and run in more than two countries. Accounts reviewed but remaining with the incumbent and accounts with unknown budgets weren't eligible.

DDB Needham Worldwide was the next biggest winner, gaining $100 million in new business. Work for Jos. E. Seagram & Sons and Henkel accounted for nearly half of DDB Needham's new business gains.

JWT, Ogilvy & Mather Worldwide and Lintas:Worldwide also performed well, each picking up about $80 million. JWT won the biggest single account, scoring Heineken's $50 million beer assignment—the Dutch marketer's first pan-European agency assignment.

While the number of pan-European accounts is increasing, the average size appears to be shrinking.

These 46 accounts were worth an average of $18 million. In a similar Ad Age survey conducted in May 1989, covering 17 months, 36 accounts were assigned with an average value of $27 million. Four accounts in the previous survey exceeded $50 million; this year, there were none. □

P&G cleans up in Europe with 2 in 1 shampoo

By Dagmar Mussey

DUESSELDORF—Procter & Gamble Co. is looking to expand its dominance in Europe's shampoo market while competitors play catch-up.

The company has scored big in what was West Germany with the introduction of Vidal Sassoon Wash & Go, a shampoo-conditioner combination known as Pert Plus in the U.S. It's also sold in 13 other European countries.

Within 10 months of its May 1989 West German launch, Wash & Go became the No. 3 brand with a 7.5% share in the $370 million shampoo market. Schwarzkopf's Schauma was No. 1 with 13.7%, and Beiersdorf's Nivea was second with 9%.

Leo Burnett International handles the account worldwide, including spending of an estimated $5 million in West Germany alone. In the U.S., P&G spends an estimated $15 million annually on Pert Plus via Leo Burnett USA, Chicago.

Based on Wash & Go's success, P&G this summer introduced in West Germany a shampoo-conditioner extension to its Shamtu line. Shamtu is a low-price brand from P&G subsidiary Blendax and holds a 6% market share. The Shamtu combination product is backed by an estimated $3 million TV campaign through DMB&B Imparc here, agency for the entire Shamtu line.

Eyeing P&G's success, rivals Schwarzkopf, Beiersdorf, Henkel, Unilever, Colgate-Palmolive Co. and L'Oreal are fighting back.

"You can bet that in a couple of months all shampoo producers will have similar products out," an industry source said.

In fact, competitors have already started to make their moves. In January, Colgate launched Gard New Style Wash & Care in West Germany, backed by commercials via Young & Rubicam, Frankfurt. The same month, Dralle, Hamburg, followed with Dralle Beauty Double Effect, supported by a print campaign. Heye & Partner, Hamburg, handles. Market shares are not yet available, but agency executives said the product is performing well.

These moves are helping P&G achieve its goal of becoming a major player in the European health & beauty aids market.

Health & beauty aids sources here predict more activities throughout Europe will come from Blendax brands which in the past have been sold in West Germany only.

"P&G has an old policy which says instead of having to fight with a competitor, we rather have our own competing brands within various segments," said Bernd M. Michael, ceo of Grey Germany.

The rivalries also have extended to other countries. In France, L'Oreal introduced Duo, a shampoo-conditioner; P&G markets Pantene Plus 2 in 1 there. Unilever's U.K. subsidiary now is introducing Dimension as a two-in-one product. Originally marketed as a normal shampoo, Dimension has been repositioned country-by-country as a two-in-one shampoo in the U.K., Spain, Belgium, the Netherlands and Italy. Lintas:Worldwide handles in Europe.

In the U.S., Pert Plus became the market leader, currently holding a 12.5% share of the $950 million category. □

French fight alcohol ad limits

By Anika Michalowska

PARIS—French alcohol marketers are offering to spend up to $6 million for an ad campaign warning against alcohol abuse, if the government rejects a proposal to restrict industry ads.

The new Association of Enterprise & Prevention will run ads urging consumers to drink in moderation if the proposal is rejected, said Thierry Mantoux, the group's spokesman and ceo of champagne marketer Champagne de Venoge.

Association members include BSN Groupe, Pernod Ricard, Seagram France Distribution, United Distillers France, Louis Vuitton Moet Hennessey and Martini & Rossi France, representing about 80% of the $280 million spent annually on alcohol advertising.

The Senate on Oct. 10 will debate the proposal, which also includes a complete ban on tobacco advertising (AA, July 2).

Under the bill, alcohol ads would be banned from cinema and outdoor boards, and the visuals in print ads would be limited to a bottle shown against a plain background. The proposal also would require 20% of the ad be devoted to a health warning.

"The new law is so restrictive . . . that it will not be interesting to advertise," Mr. Mantoux said.

Research by the association showed alcohol print ad spending would fall 67.7% to about $40 million if the measure succeeds, he said.

As an alternative, the association proposed a joint commission of alcohol marketers and the government be formed to set and maintain ad standards, Mr. Mantoux said. The industry now follows voluntary guidelines.

Grey France is preparing sample ads to show lawmakers how restrictive the proposal would be. □

Survey researchers study unity options

By Alison Fahey

NEW YORK—Survey researchers are banding together to maintain consumer confidence and distinguish telephone interviewers from telemarketers.

"This is a high-pressure time for the survey research industry. We need a more unified identity," said Diane Bowers, executive director of the Council of American Survey Research Organizations, a 140-member industry group.

Ms. Bowers, who spoke at the Advertising Research Foundation Quality Workshop here late last month, decribed the climate as "increasingly restrictive and less amenable to research."

In response, the council has formed a task force to investigate the practices of survey researchers. The task force will announce results of its investigation this week.

Ms. Bowers also urged research companies to follow the council's code of standards and called for participation in the Research Industry Coalition. The year-old umbrella group outlined unacceptable research practices to help distance survey research from telemarketing. Unacceptable practices include offering money to survey participants; offering products or services to gather sales leads; and revealing respondents' identities without their permission.

This is a high-pressure time for the survey research industry. We need a more unified identity. . . . The climate is increasingly restrictive and less amenable to research.

Researchers are fighting rising refusal to participate in surveys as consumers guard their privacy and their time.

Answering machines and other telephone technology allow consumers to carefully screen calls. This, coupled with concern about telemarketing that masquerades as research, has survey researchers worried.

"There are more constraints on people's time, and I'm concerned that some [less scrupulous] telemarketers might do things to [align] themselves with survey researchers," said Harry Sunenshine, president-ceo of Walker Research, Indianapolis. Every other year, Walker conducts an Industry Image Study that measures consumers' attitudes toward survey researchers.

Since consumers rate survey researchers more favorably than telemarketers, researchers want to protect their image from "sugging," telemarketers selling or soliciting under the guise of research (AA, June 11).

Walker's study this year showed 42% of respondents who received a telemarketing call considered their last call an unpleasant experience. Only 11% said the last survey research call was unpleasant.

"Survey research is consistently rated more positively than telemarketing on all image statements—reinforcing our conclusions that the public understands and appreciates the value of survey research, while the value of telemarketing is seriously in doubt," said the study, which is conducted by phone.

Walker recommends the industry set up a toll-free number consumers can call to verify that a call is from a researcher and not a telemarketer, Mr. Sunenshine said.

Researchers also should shorten interviews, he said.

"The longer the interview is, th harder it will be to get consume to cooperate [in the future]," h said. "The interview length i something we can work at."

The average length of surveys i 11.8 minutes, up 13.5% from 198 and 34% from 1980, Walke found. □

Simmons gauges kids' media use, buying power

By John Wolfe

Simmons Market Research Bureau this fall will conduct a study measuring the media habits and purchasing influence of children ages 6 to 14.

Results are expected to be released in February.

"People wonder how we'll do it. This is a challenge that has faced researchers for a long time," said Exec VP Pamela Baxter.

The national study will include in-person interviews with 2,000 children as well as questionnaires and a TV diary filled out by children and their parents.

"The Kids Study" will gauge children's use of products and media including comic books, magazines, newspapers, Sunday comics, TV and radio; children's purchasing influence on parents; and general attitudes and activities. A child psychologist will help write the questionnaires.

Part of the survey will probe specific TV viewing habits, using a diary filled out by parents and children to gauge viewing preferences.

Simmons has conducted studies of the teen market and recently completed a customized survey of younger children for Marvel Comics. "The Kids Study" is the first time the company will collect national, multimedia data on such a young demographic group.

Whittle Communications and ad agencies Foote, Cone & Belding and Young & Rubicam, both New York, have contracted to subscribe to the syndicated study. Other interested agencies are J. Walter Thompson Co. (Kraft General Foods and Nestle); DDB Needham Worldwide (General Mills); and Griffin Bacal (Hasbro).

The age group may make results less precise than surveys of adults, she said, but that won't hinder the "national probability study" from giving a broad look at general trends among young children.

Regarding the controversy such a study could generate among activist groups opposed to marketing to children, Ms. Baxter acknowledged the issue is sensitive but not if the material is used responsibly.

"I don't think the measurement of behavior is controversial," she said. "As long as [the children] are there, one can try to quantify it." □

. . . Johnny would rather read surveys

CHICAGO—Researchers surveying kids don't need to baby their subjects.

That's the conclusion of a yearlong study conducted by Peryam & Kroll Marketing & Sensory Research. The company found children ages 5 to 7 were more responsive to words read aloud to them than to the pictures generally used in surveys of preliterate children.

Participants 8 to 10 preferred reading the questions themselves, rather than having an interviewer read them aloud. This semiliterate group seemed to understand the questionnaire and responded better than through one-on-one interviews.

"This could be a big cost savings since one-on-one interviewing isn't required," said Peryam & Kroll principal Beverly Kroll. "Kids don't need hand holding."

A sample questionnaire was used with 516 children recruited from the company's roster of consumer panelists. The 212 5-to-7-year-olds were given a list of verbal responses as well as pictures of faces depicting their best response; the children preferred words to pictures. The questionnaire was also presented two ways to the 304 8-to-10-year-olds, who preferred to read it themselves. □

'National' not for sale

NEW YORK—Peter Price, president and publisher of The National, last week denied the sports daily is for sale. But he acknowledged an unauthorized inquiry about a possible sale had apparently been made to Gannett Co., publisher of USA Today. Sheila Gibbons, Gannett's director of public affairs, said the company was approached by Wasserstein Perella & Co., an investment banking company. Executives at Wasserstein Perella denied they had been retained by The National, but a source confirmed an unidentified Wasserstein representative approached Gannett. Publishing industry sources said companies like Wasserstein routinely make unauthorized inquiries to generate new business.

Della Femina: I'm out if Eurocom won't act

By Jon Lafayette and Laurel Wentz

NEW YORK—Jerry Della Femina last week said he's so disappointed with the French agency group that bought his agency he's considering leaving the business.

Mr. Della Femina, chairman of Della Femina, McNamee, said he's concerned that Paris-based Eurocom, his shop's parent since October 1989, is no longer serious about spending money to help the agency grow in the U.S.

"There has been more talk and less action than I would like there to be," said Mr. Della Femina, whose bald head and quick wit have made him a Madison Avenue legend. "I'm not going to hang around with a loser."

When asked to comment on Mr. Della Femina's remarks, Pierre de Plas, Eurocom's VP-chief operating officer, laughed and said, "That's Jerry."

"There was a board meeting last week and [Mr. Della Femina] said, 'You've got to go fast,' and he's right," Mr. de Plas said.

Eurocom has identified three potential partners in the U.S. and is having "very big discussions with them," Mr. de Plas said. But no date has been set for announcing a deal.

"Jerry would like us to reach an agreement in a minute. . . . It is obvious we are committed to grow in the U.S. We

The gospel of advertising from Rev. Jesse Jackson

ONE ON ONE

The Rev. Jesse Jackson—civil rights activist, founder of Operation PUSH, former presidential hopeful and ambassador without portfolio—has added a new title to his collection, that of TV talk show host.

"The Jesse Jackson Show" made its debut last month in more than 100 markets, with discussions ranging from the plight of the American Indian to the savings & loan scandal. The program, syndicated by Warner Bros. Domestic Television Distribution, counted Procter & Gamble Co. among its early sponsors, along with Kellogg Co. and Nestle, a Warner official said.

Before taping his third installment, the Rev. Jackson, 49, talked to Advertising Age Washington Bureau Chief Steven W. Colford about TV, advertisers and advertising, particularly as they involve minorities.

Advertising Age: Operation PUSH, the Chicago-based civil rights group you once led, is boycotting Nike. What criteria are there for determining whether an advertiser will be targeted?

Rev. Jackson: Usually we look at an industry where there is heavy black consumption. In return for that, a reciprocal relationship is that we want fair employment—no jobs, no dollars. Then we look at economic development. In other words, additional jobs, horizontally, at the base, and vertically, at the board of directors, vice presidents, key positions.

Where are they banking? Insurance companies, law firms, ad agencies—the range of economic development. . . .

When Operation PUSH, for example, took a look at the athletic shoe industry, there was this whole crisis of kids killing each

Publishers see bad times getting worse

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz.—The magazine industry's advertising sales slump is likely to worsen next year, agreed publishers gathered at the annual American Magazine Conference here last week. But they're divided on how to survive the downturn.

Some publishers are talking about defensive measures such as strategic alliances between media companies to turn around flagging ad pages.

Others are blaming the economy and not themselves for the industry's woes and insisted the only way for publishers to survive the soft market is to "hunker down," stick to their knitting and wait it out.

"This is a tough time, maybe the toughest time I've seen. [But] we have no choice but to wait it out," said Thomas O. Ryder, president of American Express Publishing Corp. "We're not going to run counter to a difficult economic environment. There is no magical solution."

Saatchi London ceo exits to start shop

By Laurel Wentz

LONDON—Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising Worldwide's office here has been hit with another executive departure.

Paul Bainsfair, 37, who filled the No. 2 slot as joint chief executive and managing director at the U.K.'s largest ad agency, quit last week to start his own shop.

His partner is expected to be former Gold Greenlees Trott Creative Director Dave Trott, but Mr. Bainsfair declined to name his partners.

"All that's happened so far is I've resigned from Saatchi," he said. "I'm going to start what I hope will be a major new agency."

Mr. Trott was fired this summer from Gold Greenlees Trott, the agency he founded in 1980 with Michael Gold and Michael Greenlees, both now joint chairmen.

Mr. Trott has been seeking partners and backing for a new agency for several months. He couldn't be reached for comment.

Paris-based BDDP Group reportedly is considering backing the new agency. John Sharkey, the chairman of BDDP U.K., is a former Saatchi executive and has worked with Mr. Bainsfair. BDDP executives didn't return calls.

Mr. Bainsfair confirmed he's bound by the usual non-competition clauses, restraining him from approaching Saatchi clients or staff. He pointed out, however, they're free to approach him.

Mr. Trott faces no such restrictions because Gold Greenlees Trott broke his contract, Mr. Greenlees said. Mr. Trott continues to own a 6% stake in that agency.

"I genuinely think [Paul Bainsfair's departure] has nothing to do with the pressures of running [Saatchi] and has everything to do with Dave Trott being available."

In addition to Mr. Bainsfair's departure, one of the U.K.'s top copywriters will leave Saatchi this week. Graham Fink will become deputy creative director at Gold Greenlees Trott. And two weeks ago, Saatchi Media Director Alec Kenny quit to start his own media buying company, Kenny Lockett Booth.

Mr. Bainsfair joined Saatchi as a junior account exec in 1975 and worked his way up through account director and group account director jobs before becoming managing director in 1986. He and Bill Muirhead became joint chief executives in 1988.

The only time Mr. Bainsfair was tempted to leave Charlotte Street, as Saatchi's London agency is usually called, was when Mr. Trott tried to hire him in the early 1980s, said an advertising executive who's worked with Mr. Bainsfair.

"Although there is an obvious frustration working for Charlotte Street in [Saatchi's] current situation, to a large extent Charlotte Street has been insulated [by its success] from Saatchi's problems," the advertising executive said. "I genuinely think [his departure] has nothing to do with the pressures of running Charlotte Street and has everything to do with Dave Trott being available."

In Saatchi's earlier days, valuable staffers who tried to leave were wooed back with a combination of emotional pressure from Charles Saatchi and money. It's a sign of the increasingly leaner U.K. ad industry and the agency's own deep financial problems that Saatchi no longer resorts to such tactics.

To replace Mr. Bainsfair, Saatchi is promoting two of the six chief operating officers who oversee account groups and are the next layer of management below Mr. Bainsfair. David Kershaw and Peter Watkins will become joint managing directors, reporting to Mr. Muirhead, the chairman-ceo.

Saatchi said last week that Derek Bowden, media director of Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising International, will replace Mr. Kenny. □

AmEx works 'Weekends'

By John McManus and Alison Fahey

American Express Co. this week will launch a massive TV blitz promoting its Weekend Privileges program with commercials featuring a $10,000-a-day giveaway contest for cardholders.

The contest is a major component of the program, which will be supported by a $25 million advertising and direct mail campaign aimed at attracting more leisure spending.

Another part of the program, to be announced this week, is a new 800 number cardholders can use to get leisure activity information.

The $25 million fourth-quarter campaign is part of AmEx's $90 million annual marketing budget for merchant tie-in, special offer and discount promotional programs, said David Beeman, VP-cross-industry marketing.

AmEx will start promoting the sweepstakes, dubbed "Dream Weekends," with a commercial airing on cable TV networks tonight and during the World Series game Oct. 17 on CBS. The spot, themed "Now you've got Weekend Privileges," was created by Ogilvy & Mather, New York.

Starting today and running each day through yearend, an AmEx Green, Gold or Optima cardmember who uses the card that day will be selected randomly to receive $10,000 in credit.

"With the $10,000 prize, cardmembers will be able to put together their own 'dream weekend' package," said Nancy Muller, VP-public affairs.

The commercial will highlight fantasy weekend ideas and mention AmEx's many promotional partners, Ms. Muller said. Spurning the use of celebrities, the commercial features a "typical family" scenario.

A heavy national TV network and spot media schedule will run through Christmas, supported by print ads.

"With this campaign, we expect to establish American Express as the official card of the American weekend."

"With this campaign, we expect to establish American Express as the official card of the American weekend," Ms. Muller said.

AmEx declined to reveal details about the 800 number service. But sources familiar with the program said it's to be called Privileges on Call and is an interactive telephone program.

Callers will be addressed by name and instructed to enter digits on phone touchpads corresponding to the locale in which they are interested, the sources said. Callers will then be guided to more specific information on entertainment options, including restaurants, theaters, shopping and special events.

AmEx introduced the Weekend Privileges program Sept. 10 with a print campaign. It's the "largest multimedia marketing program ever conducted with establishments that accept the card," the company said.

The program offers cardholders special deals and values from hundreds of establishments ranging from Walt Disney World to Hertz rental cars to Hilton hotels and hundreds of local restaurants and stores.

The fourth-quarter push comes as all major credit card brands vie with one another to persuade cardholders with more than one credit card to use theirs rather than a competitors'.

AmEx's share of charge volume declined last year, said Kurt Peters, publisher of Credit Card News.

In 1988, AmEx charge volume totaled $58.5 billion with a 22.6% share of the credit card market, Mr. Peters said. In 1989, its charge volume rose 11% to $65 billion, but share fell to 21.9%.

In the same period, MasterCard and Discover both lost almost a percentage point of their share, while Visa recorded more than a percentage point increase.

"What American Express is trying to do is make a push out of the [business] travel and entertainment mode into a more general-purpose mode," Mr. Peters said. "They need to pump up their effort for broader usage, because Visa and MasterCard have started cutting into American Express' traditional turf of travel and entertainment." □

Nets don't sweat ratings yet

A ratings and demographic analysis of TV programs.

Instead of simply giving advertisers make-good units when TV shows underdeliver guaranteed ratings this year, the Big 3 networks first will check the reported levels of homes using television and persons using television in key demographic groups.

Then the networks will compare the numbers to a controversial NBC-designed viewer counting plan, using viewing habits for the last eight years to estimate what the 1990-91 HUT and PUT levels should be each month.

So far in this young TV season, HUTs and PUTs are living up to expectations, nearly matching last season's level. But the networks say they need the formula as protection from volatile, unexplained fluctuations and drastic declines in reported viewing levels they say could be attributable to Nielsen Media Research's methods.

When usage levels inexplicably plummeted in February and March, the ensuing proportional ratings shortfall forced the networks to give away as much as $200 million worth of commercial inventory as make-goods.

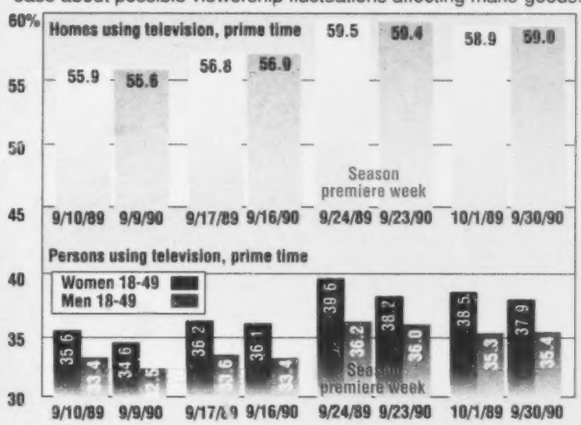
Advertisers and agency executives reluctantly agreed to accept the formula as part of advertising buys during the network upfront selling season last summer, but TV viewership has since rebounded (AA, July 30).

With fourth-quarter sales soft, few believe the formula will actually be used, even if HUT and PUT figures dip below expected levels. That's because advertisers may be more amenable to buying more time if the controversial formula isn't brought up.

Tracking Shares will periodically compare Nielsen's 1989-90 and 1990-91 season HUT and PUT levels. □

Season viewership on track

Nielsen's figures are steady with last year, putting the networks at ease about possible viewership fluctuations affecting make-goods.



Figures are percentages of the 93.1 million U.S. households and the 59 million men and 60.3 million women ages 18-49 in the U.S. Viewership figures for men and women 25-54 also were relatively flat.

SPOT CHECK

Elections boost October

Spot Check is a monthly survey of purchasing activity in the top 20 TV markets, compiled by Horizon Media, New York. Markets are ranked by spot availability after September sales.

Top 20 overlook: TV stations predict spot sales will be flat or down, perhaps creating the softest fourth quarter in several years. Political spending has helped tighten a number of markets during October, but there's little else contributing to healthy sales.

Tight—Time available but demand keeps prices stable.

Los Angeles: Political spending could reach more than $20 million. Auto import spending is outpacing domestics.

San Francisco: Banks and foreign cars are spending more than last year; heavy political spending keeps the market tight.

Seattle: Local bank spending is up to compete with new entry Bank of America. Fast-food spending is double last year.

Tampa, Fla.: Financial services, automotive companies, retailers, fast-food restaurants and politicians have boosted spending.

Negotiable—Time available at negotiable rates.

Chicago: Heavy political spending made October tight but will fade in November. Automotive spending is down at least 8%.

Cleveland: Political spending keeps the market tight. Local auto spending is down. Fast-food is strong; movies are up.

Denver: Auto spending is strong, especially foreign. A new mall has sparked retail spending; fast-food wars are on.

Houston: Fast-food, political and auto spending are heavy.

Miami: Auto spending is very high. Mobil Oil has resumed advertising; more oil spending could return.

Minneapolis: Politics and the lottery keep the market strong.

New York: Business is up about 7% from last year, after some marketers held spending in case the Mets made the playoffs.

Phoenix, Ariz.: Financial services, retail and politics are heavy.

Pittsburgh: Auto is up and fast-food spending is heavy; financial services spending is flat and retail is down.

St. Louis: Fast-food chains are spending more than ever; retail is up. Movies are expected to be strong.

Washington: Politics keep the market busy; auto spending is heavy.

Very soft—Much time available, possibly at discounts.

Atlanta: Financial services spending is up about 35%; domestic auto spending and retail are down.

Boston: Political spending has tightened all dayparts except daytime; all other spending is flat or down.

Dallas: Financial services spending is down, and the market will soften more when political spending ends.

Detroit: Advertisers are watching how revamped early-fringe lineups on three of the five stations fare.

Philadelphia: Credit card and political spending are heavy. □

TBS-Gannett build ad package

Cross-media sports deal targeted at Xerox Corp.

By John McManus and Janet Meyers

Turner Broadcasting System and Gannett Co. are forging a dramatic new alliance to offer cross-media packages to marketers.

The two media companies recently pitched a multimillion-dollar cross-media ad package to Young & Rubicam, New York, and the agency is considering taking the idea to client Xerox Corp., said sources familiar with the pitch.

If such a deal is concluded, it would be the first significant cross-media package to be forged between separate national TV and print media.

The package TBS and Gannett are offering involves the sponsorship of a weekly Cable News Network-USA Today top 25 college sports poll. Results would be carried in both CNN's sports reports and USA Today's sports section.

If the package is approved, the poll will be launched during the first and second quarters of 1991, one source said.

Pat Haegele, senior VP-advertising for USA Today, said she recently participated in a presentation on the package to Y&R. She said the agency is expected to decide within a few weeks whether to propose the combination buy to a large client, which she declined to identify.

But other TV and advertising executives said Xerox is the target client and a package has been designed specifically for it.

Michael Kirby, Xerox's director of advertising and promotion worldwide, said he hasn't been approached about the plan but the concept seemed "very logical."

"We've worked with both media before, and I would certainly look favorably on anything that combines the two," Mr. Kirby said. "Conceptually, I have no problem with it; in fact, I welcome it. I would be receptive to looking at any multimedia package."

Consumer pessimism rises in the fourth quarter

Times are tough...

Forty-one percent of the people surveyed between Oct. 11-14 said they're financially worse off now than they were one year ago. That's the highest percentage level since 1982, when the U.S. was in the grip of a recession.

...and they're going to get tougher

Thirty percent of the people surveyed said they expect to be financially worse off in a year, the highest percentage of pessimism since March 1980.

Rushing the season

Dour consumers lead retailers to push early

An Ad Age roundup

Jittery retailers worried about plummeting consumer confidence and the Persian Gulf crisis are changing their pre-Christmas selling strategies this year.

What has retailers most worried are consumers. In the latest Gallup Poll, released last week, 41% of those surveyed said they're financially worse off now than they were one year ago. That figure represents a 14 percentage-point jump in only three weeks and is a level of pessimism not recorded by Gallup since August 1982, at the end of the last U.S. recession.

Thirty percent said they expect to be worse off financially a year from now, a 13-point jump in three weeks and a level of pessimism not recorded since 1980 and 1982, during the last recession.

"That suggests that psychologically, rightly or wrongly, many people feel we're in a recession," said Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll. "This is a world of self-fulfilling prophecies, and if people batten down the hatches and cut consumer spending, it just might help bring about a recession."

Some retailers hope to induce a premature holiday shopping season by putting out Christmas displays earlier than usual, looking to stir early sales and lessen the impact should sales

Kraft GF shifts agencies, pay

By Julie Liesse

Kraft General Foods shifted $150 million in ad agency assignments last week and instituted a broad incentive-based compensation system.

The compensation plan is based on a brand's performance, a measure that some in the industry have considered to be unfair since factors in addition to advertising affect sales.

Kraft General Foods' initiative standardizes the way the company deals with its agencies on not only compensation but conflicts, and shifts accounts to fit a new category-based system of agency relationships. The reorganization completes the marketing merger of the two companies.

The most significant account change was the move of Maxwell House coffee's $80 million to $90 million U.S. and U.K. business back to Ogilvy & Mather. O&M lost Maxwell House to D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles last year.

Yellow Pages group to fight N.J. ad tax

By Steven W. Colford

The board of the Yellow Pages Publishers Association last week voted to challenge in court New Jersey's imposition of a 7% sales tax on directory advertising.

This initial step toward forcing a court ruling on the constitutionality of a state tax on commercial speech was taken at the group's annual meeting in Palm Springs, Calif.

"We believe the tax has no rational basis as it applies to one advertising medium and will challenge it on that basis," said Don MacKenzie, YPPA board member and chairman of the association's public policy committee.

The specific grounds for a legal challenge won't be determined until a law firm and a specific legal strategy are chosen, Mr. MacKenzie said. But he acknowledged the YPPA had received several legal opinions suggesting that violation of the First Amendment might be a possibility.

Mr. MacKenzie, who's also president-ceo of Nynex Information Resources, said he hopes the suit will be filed by yearend in state court in New Jersey. He declined to say whether the board's vote meant the legal challenge would go all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"It's safe to say that YPPA agreed to take step one, state court, but not beyond that because we don't have to worry about any more than that now," he said.

New Jersey and Oklahoma are believed to be the only states with a current sales tax on directory ads. The Oklahoma tax, reaching back several decades, was enacted as a broad tax on newspaper, magazine and broadcast ads, Mr. MacKenzie said, and was scaled back over time to apply only to directories.

He said the YPPA doesn't plan to challenge the Oklahoma tax.

"The New Jersey tax is more challengeable," he said.

Various other industry and media groups have been actively involved with the YPPA in fighting the New Jersey tax, which took effect July 1. Some of them are considered likely to join in the suit.

"I think there's a strong likelihood that we might want to do so," said Hal Shoup, exec VP of the American Association of Advertising Agencies. "Any taxing of advertising at any state—or even local—level is a matter of concern and establishes what we would consider a dangerous precedent.

"We might do it in conjunction with other groups or unilaterally."

When Florida implemented a 5% tax on all local and national advertising in 1987, various ad groups sued. The legal challenges were withdrawn after Gov. Bob Martinez and the state Legislature repealed the tax under considerable pressure from voters and business.

Many of those suits raised questions of whether government can tax commercial speech and whether a state tax on advertising violates the due process and interstate commerce clauses of the Constitution. □

Finding Nielsen glitch

Nets cite sample for disputed ratings shortfall

By Wayne Walley

The Big 3 TV networks believe they've uncovered a major cause of the first-quarter drop in TV use reported by Nielsen Media Research.

Executives at ABC, CBS and NBC said last week an independent, six-month study by the Committee on Nationwide Television Audience Measurement detected "a leading contributor to misreporting" Nielsen data.

"The problem is with a fundamental characteristic of the sample," said Nicholas Schiavone, VP-media and market research for NBC and chairman of Contam, a committee of representatives from the Big 3 and the National Association of Broadcasters. "If a correction had been made, you might not have seen the steep declines.

"This is something Nielsen should have seen. It's an error and a systematic flaw that should have never gone out of whack."

Mr. Schiavone and network executives declined to provide more details but said the study's findings would be made public within two to four weeks.

A Nielsen spokesman said the company couldn't comment until it had reviewed the findings.

Contam's discovery explains the drop in household TV use and provides a "good indication" the same cause affected TV viewing levels of key demographic groups, Mr. Schiavone said.

The unexplained drop in reported TV use during the first quarter and ensuing ratings shortfall forced the networks to give away an estimated $150 million worth of inventory in makegoods to advertisers.

The networks blamed Nielsen, alleging faulty methodology, but offered no evidence to support their claims at the time. Nielsen maintained an internal investigation proved nothing was amiss.

TV use has since returned to expected levels.

The networks and Nielsen are expected to meet sometime in the next two weeks to discuss the Contam findings before Contam shares the results with other Nielsen clients.

The Nielsen response could have a bearing on the future relationship between the ratings company and its key network clients. The networks' contracts with Nielsen expired in September but remain in force until a network either cancels or renews.

Nielsen has already presented the networks with proposals for various improvements to the people-meter system and the costs associated with changes as part of a new contract, but little progress has been made.

"We've been back and forth trying to set up a meeting to pick the elements that make sense and those that don't," said David Poltrack, senior VP-planning and research for CBS.

He said Nielsen's proposals include experimenting with multiple panels and tracking viewing in vacation homes.

Mr. Poltrack said he expects the networks and the ratings company to come to some form of agreement on a new contract soon.

Some network executives privately said they're also disappointed with Nielsen's lack of response to Contam's set of guidelines issued last month (AA, Sept. 24). Those call for a broad-based structure with more resources devoted to measurement and a range of studies that don't require regular measurement but give insights into the dynamics of TV viewing. □

Nissan starts regional plan

By Cleveland Horton

When Nissan Motor Corp. USA begins its 1991 model-year advertising today, it starts an unprecedented experiment in regional marketing.

The estimated $100 million regional budget, previously directed by Nissan headquarters in Carson, Calif., will now be spent at the discretion of the company's 11 regional general managers.

"We've been building [the regional reorganization] for two years," said Brian Barrett, Nissan's national manager-regional marketing. "All eyes of the corporation are on it."

"With this [new arrangement], we'll be able to react much faster and bring more dealer input in," he said.

The first bits of regional advertising will start today, coinciding with Nissan's national ads. For example, Philadelphia dealers will begin with a cross-promotion with Coca-Cola Co.

This new regional approach is central in the effort to turn around Nissan's slumping sales, down 6.4% in the just completed model year. In the first nine months of 1990, Nissan's share (excluding Infiniti) of the 7.2 million-unit U.S. car market dropped to 4.7% from 5.2%. Its share of the slumping 3.6 million-unit light-truck market, however, rose to 3.8% from 3.4%.

But sales are only part of the goal. The region

Crowded shelves

Kraft rolls into growing shelf-stable category

By Julie Liesse and Judann Dagnoli

Kraft General Foods is rolling national with shelf-stable entrees, as retailers wonder if the category ever will live up to its potential.

The company has already moved Kraft Microwave Entrees into 17 new markets around the U.S., including Chicago, Pittsburgh and Colorado Springs, Colo.—everywhere but the West Coast and New England.

Kraft General Foods is telling retailers the product will be national early next year, supported with an estimated $20 million campaign.

The product is a reformulated version of Impromptu, introduced in test markets by General Foods USA four years ago. General Foods slowly expanded Impromptu into eight markets, and the new line will be in those markets by Nov. 1, retailers said.

Kraft General Foods executives and agency Grey Advertising, New York, refused to comment.

Kraft Microwave Entrees seem destined to affect Top Shelf, the Geo. A. Hormel & Co. line that pioneered the shelf-stable meals category in 1986.

The category, including tray, tub and pouch-packaged foods, is now at $240 million and could reach $400 million by yearend, said Katherine Roberts, a consultant with researcher Find/SVP.

The new product is packaged in a recyclable tray, which some retailers say will give it an advantage with consumers; Impromptu was in a domed plastic container slipped into a cardboard sleeve.

Priced at $1.99 to $2.69 in varieties very similar to Hormel's product, the Kraft line is already forcing Top Shelf to drop its prices, retailers report. In some markets, including Chicago, retailers are dropping some or all of the 14 Top Shelf varieties to make room for Kraft's products.

"Sure, we're worried, in the sense of maintaining our market position," said Rick Bross, director of marketing for Hormel's prepared foods division. "But we're glad Kraft's coming, because it endorses the concept of shelf-stable meals and should help solidify the concept with the trade and consumers."

Still, he said, with the introduction of Dial Corp.'s Light Balance and now the Kraft entry, "The number of new [products] is outstripping any reasonable activity to keep up in terms of shelf space."

Hormel will break a new Top Shelf TV and print campaign, sans spokesman Dick Cavett, from BBDO Worldwide, Minneapolis, in November, Mr. Bross said. The company last year spent a little more than $10 million on measured media for Top Shelf, according to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service.

"Top Shelf is an important product for Hormel, and I'm sure they'll defend it aggressively," said Timothy Ramey, an analyst with County NatWest Securities USA analyst. "If shelf-stable truly is a no-growth category, Kraft will win a head-to-head battle. But if there's real category growth, I don't see why there

COMMUNICATIONS MARKETING

900 numbers and Caller ID make for interesting sideshows, but the real war is an unrelenting salvo of ads

Edited by Adrienne Ward

Hello? Is anybody listening?

Astonishing amount of advertising bombards consumers, who don't seem to be responding

By Kate Fitzgerald

The Big 3 long-distance carriers have been going after each other for a year now with all the subtlety of pit bulls wearing pinstripes.

Despite a big increase in ad spending, market share figures indicate they're still getting the same piece of the bone as when their fighting started.

While there's no end in sight to the battle, phone marketers contend that they would like to shift into a softer, less attack-dog tactic.

For now, however, they are going full guns with comparative advertising.

Never before have consumers been bombarded by so many TV campaigns about telephone use, using tactics that range from warmth and humor to seriousness, direct comparisons and downright intimidation.

The result is that advertising spending by the major players in the category—AT&T Co., MCI Communications Corp. and US Sprint Communications Co.—has increased significantly from last year's levels (see chart at right).

But the inflated spending hasn't done much to alter the companies' market share. AT&T still controls about 70% of the $55 billion long-distance telephone industry in the U.S., followed by MCI with about 16% share and US Sprint with about 10%, according to sources at the companies.

Analysts say market share hasn't shifted visibly because the long-distance telephone market changes slowly.

Also, the recent brisk pace of counter-advertising by rivals has offset the effects of increased media spending by any single player.

"Since heavier marketing efforts by long-distance phone marketers began, market share data has lagged behind. We have yet to see any major market share shifts," says George Dellinger, a telecommunications analyst with County NatWest USA. "Also, whenever AT&T steps up advertising, MCI and Sprint tend to follow."

Growth in the telecommunications market has come from higher usage of long-distance telephone services by the growing U.S. population, along with increased facsimile transmission over phone lines and an explosion in the number of cellular telephones, Mr. Dellinger says.

"What's happening is that all the players are advertising more in order to keep pace," he says.

That trend has been a boon for ad agencies, which are scrambling to meet the demand for more—and better—advertising.

Although advertising from the top three companies has evolved into a bitter comparative ad war based on rude sniping and put-downs of competitors, marketing and ad directors claim they want to move away from the back-biting.

"You can win the battle by being more creative and by being smarter. The guy with the most guns doesn't always win," says Jorge Rodriguez, VP-advertising and direct marketing at Sprint. "All along Sprint has been willing to 'put it in writing' 30 different ways," he says in reference to the highly effective AT&T campaign that was launched last May via N W Ayer, New York.

Mr. Rodriguez says it was never Sprint's long-term goal to become entangled in a shouting match.

"Responding to AT&T was a short-term plan. All along we had a much bigger idea in mind, and we will continue to take a higher road toward more creative approaches," he says.

To prove the point, on Oct. 8 Sprint broke a new network and national spot TV campaign via J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco, that features Candice Bergen and introduces a new theme line, "Sprint has a better way."

According to LNA/Arbitron Multi-Media Service, Sprint spent $29.3 million on long-distance consumer, business and overseas advertising, an increase of 55.9%.

However, Sprint's new campaign still features a direct comparison with AT&T, so clearly the trench warfare among the various telephone marketers is far from over.

While Candice Bergen chimes, "Sprint has a better way," AT&T continues to hammer at consumers to "Get it in writing."

AT&T's attacks on its competitors also continue with fresh executions of the "Get it in writing" effort expected to air by yearend.

Despite this aggressiveness, AT&T says its game plan remains producing "honest, straightforward advertising that entertains," says David Robertson, director of consumer advertising for the No. 1 long-distance marketer.

"We have to stay out in front by concentrating on what our customers are thinking, not on what our competitors are thinking. We're in constant dialogue with consumers in focus groups, and what they say goes directly into our advertising," he says.

For the first half of the year, AT&T spent $146.7 million in nine measured media for long-distance advertising, an increase of 38.9% from the same period in 1989, according to LNA/Arbitron.

Another key factor in AT&T's strategy is its close, long-term relationship with its ad agencies. AT&T's shops include Young & Rubicam, Ogilvy & Mather and McCann-Erickson, all New York, in addition to N W Ayer.

MCI currently is looking for additional ad agency help. In September, the company announced plans to review its estimated $51 million account, currently handled by Wells, Rich, Greene, New York.

Agency sources say MCI is likely to split its account between two agencies to gain more creative leverage, but Judy Ranzer, director of advertising, refuses to comment on the speculation.

MCI's strategy is to woo new customers with advertising that's "warm, human and friendly," she says.

According to LNA/Arbitron, MCI has increased its long-distance ad spending 23.4% to $25.4 million for the first half of the year.

"When your competitors outspend you as massively as AT&T does, you have to be clever in order to break through the clutter of their advertising," Ms. Ranzer says.

"The response we get to our advertising is very positive—that's why we went from zero in 1980 to an $8 billion company today, and we did that by taking market share from AT&T," she says. "We'll continue to do that." □

SEPTEMBER AD RESULTS

Tobacco ads burn away

By Scott Donaton

September may have marked the beginning of the end of tobacco as a leading ad category in magazines.

Tobacco revenues fell 15.9% to $25.4 million for the month as the category dropped from Publishers Information Bureau's top 10 for the first time in more than 20 years.

Magazine advertising overall continued its downslide. Ad pages fell 4.5% in September, leaving PIB-tracked titles down 3.3% after nine months.

Tobacco finished 11th for the month and after nine months was in eighth place overall with $223.8 million in revenues, a 26.3% decline from the same period last year. The category's September performance seemed to confirm publishers' fears that tobacco spending will continue to decline and permanently disappear from the top 10 in the coming years.

Tobacco rose to be magazines' leading category in the 1970s, as TV advertising was banned. Its recent decline coincides with the nation's growing anti-smoking sentiment and congressional efforts to ban tobacco advertising in all media.

September brought good news from automotive, the current leading category. Automotive revenues rose 30.4% to $68.6 million for the month, the third consecutive monthly gain for the category. The boost left automotive virtually flat after nine months, with revenues up a slight 0.24% to $626.4 million.

The ad page slump continued to take its toll on weeklies. Business Week held onto the top spot with 2,845.15 ad pages, down 8.2% from the first three quarters of 1989.

Forbes' ad pages continued to rise, totaling 2,485.10, up 4.8%. Fortune was down 9.2% with 2,320.36 ad pages.

Time's ad pages fell 3.1% to 1,793.96 through September. Its sister weeklies, People and Sports Illustrated, posted declines of 6.3% and 12.7%, respectively. People carried 2,494.61 ad pages for the period, while Sports Illustrated carried 1,806.71.

Time Warner's monthly Life was down 10.8% with 482.34 ad pages. Despite the decline and overall problems weeklies have had this year, Time Warner is moving ahead with plans to test a weekly version of Life.

Newsweek, with 1,542.73 ad pages, was down 4.8%. U.S. News & World Report, boosted by a strong September performance, was down just 0.5% after nine months, with 1,324.73 ad pages.

TV Guide carried 2,186.78 ad pages through September, down 9.4%. And, after a strong first half, The New Yorker saw its pages fall 0.6% to 1,472.83.

The health field, one of the fastest-growing magazine categories of the 1980s, is looking a little pale after the first three quarters of 1990. American Health's ad pages dropped 41.3% through September to 327.78. Health, with 290.45 ad pages, was down 1.2%, and Prevention's 418.34 ad pages were down 10% from the same period last year.

GQ remained the ad page leader in the men's field despite an 11.2% decline to 1,403.82 ad pages. Esquire, with 879.72 ad pages, was off 1.5% through September. Playboy carried 505.51 ad pages for the period, a 6.6% decline, while Penthouse, with 467.95 ad pages, was up a slight 0.3%.

M Inc., the merged M and Manhattan,inc., carried 151.67 ad pages in September, up 11.8% from the combined totals of both magazines for the same month last year. In the first nine months, the magazines together carried 620.25 ad pages, down 1.3%.

Not all magazines are singing the blues this year. Titles showing gains include: The Economist (1,953.38 ad pages, up 15.3%); Conde Nast Traveler (732.07, up 15.1%); Cooking Light (295.03, up 14.9%); The Atlantic (475.41 ad pages, up 13.3%); Business Month (315.37, up 13%); and Art & Antiques (553.24 ad pages, up 8%). □

NBC, shops set Olympian effort

By John McManus

NEW YORK—"The fire behind the flame" umbrella theme for NBC's 1992 Summer Olympics pay-per-view package was created by N W Ayer, but that's just the beginning of agency involvement.

DDB Needham Worldwide, Chicago, will produce the multimedia image and awareness campaign for the package, while Ayer and Della Femina, McNamee will do campaigns for two separate target audiences.

That's not all. Saatchi & Saatchi Advertising's marketing services unit will handle direct response advertising to support Ayer's work, and Communications Diversified will do direct response to support Della Femina's work.

And D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles will handle media placement.

Behind this $40 million, 17-month marketing flurry is a $200 million gamble that the shops will create enough sizzle to attract audiences who normally watch the Olympics for free.

In fact, some coverage will still be free. NBC plans to broadcast 160 hours of free programming from the Games in Barcelona, more than ever before.

But the pay-per-view package, tentatively dubbed the "NBC Olympics Triplecast," offers cable subscribers a three-channel special of 600 more hours of live and taped coverage for $149.95.

"The Olympic spirit is the brand," said Marty Lafferty, NBC's VP-Pay-Per-View Olympics. "We're literally selling the Olympics as a brand. . . . We're thinking of it in terms of what intensification of the attractiveness of the Olympics experience is needed to get you to act."

Mr. Lafferty and two other NBC executives will be responsible for coordinating the agencies' efforts.

NBC paid $401 million for broadcast and cable TV rights for the Games. Of that amount, $100 million was allocated for pay-per-view rights, Mr. Lafferty said. The pay-per-view package's total cost will be about $200 million, he said.

"We'd be happy to break even on this one," Mr. Lafferty said.

First, NBC must woo cable operators to clear channel space for the two-week event. One top 10 operator, Cablevision, is a shoo-in, since the company is a partner in the venture with NBC.

NBC hopes to attract 2.5 million viewers and has segmented potential subscribers into two groups.

Ayer and Saatchi are targeting a broad-based segment for whom NBC says the Olympics hold a deep-rooted emotional appeal. Ads will promote buying the package as a holiday gift.

Sports enthusiasts will be targeted by Della Femina and Communications Diversified.

All the agencies will split $40 million allocated for mark ing costs on a fee basis, and si the event is a one-shot campai the shops consider the assignm a no-lose situation.

Still, some TV and agency ex utives say the multiagency proach could wind up in turf w and confusion.

Officially, at least, the shops volved see no problems w crossed signals or overzeal egos.

"No one's pretending that is a common relationship," s Joe Aniello, a management sup visor at Saatchi. "To get int power struggle among oursel could impact the potential pay-per-view as a business yond the NBC event.

"But if we pull it off as a te we would be viewed in the ind try as the team of agencies made this unique thing work. A the business returns into the ture could be tremendous." □

Sprint splits in double-header with NAD

By Janice Kelly

NEW YORK—US Sprint won one and lost one in separate actions before the National Advertising Division last month.

In its September report, the self-regulatory arm of the Council of Better Business Bureaus took issue with a direct mail promotion for Sprint Dial "1" basic rates and Sprint Plus discount rates, but found the long-distance service had substantiated ad claims for its Foncard service.

Sprint's direct mail and airline-ticket folder promotions, created by Devon Direct Marketing & Advertising, Malvern, Pa., were challenged by AT&T Co. for stating, "When you come over to US Sprint Dial '1' service, you'll save on every call over AT&T," and for claiming Sprint offered "Savings around the clock over AT&T's card."

Sprint conceded not every call produced savings. NAD required the "savings on every call" claim be limited to comparing Sprint's basic rates with AT&T's basic interstate service.

NAD also noted that the "save around the clock" claim referred to discounts and recommended future ads make this clear. It also asked that future comparative savings claims between Sprint Plus and AT&T basic service identify clearly just which users will benefit from Sprint Plus.

Sprint agreed to make the recommended clarifications.

In another case brought after a consumer complaint to the Better Business Bureau in Phoenix, Ariz., NAD said Sprint had substantiated a revised Foncard ad claim in a direct mailing that offered new customers "30 free minutes of Foncard long distance."

Sprint revised its Foncard application form before the original ad was challenged.

Other ad claims discontinued or modified:

Denny's (Flintstones Fun Meals premium; D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowles): NAD's Children's Advertising Review Unit questioned a TV spot that showed Flintstones minicars as a premium toy offered with Denny's Flintstones Fun Meals. CARU said the commercial focused on the premium because it didn't show the meals. Denny's disagreed, saying the premium wasn't shown until the last frame. Although the spot was no longer in use, Denny's agreed to include a product shot in future similar spots.

Topps Co. (baseball cards; Tarlow Advertising): Leaf Inc., marketer of Donruss baseball cards, challenged a Topps TV spot that claimed, "The two Topps baseball cards I bought for 6¢ are already worth $3" and "Topps . . . preferred by professional baseball card collectors . . . and professional kids." Leaf questioned the preference claims.

NAD ruled that Topps' research didn't support the preference claim for professional card collectors and suggested a different wording for children's survey results. Topps agreed to reword future ads to specify more children card buyers prefer Topps "over any other brand." It also agreed not to say professional collectors "preferred" Topps cards. The value increase claims were substantiated.

Lever Bros. (Sunlight dishwashing detergent; BBDO Worldwide): Colgate-Palmolive Co. challenged several magazine ads, TV spots and free standing inserts claiming, "Sunlight, the only brand with real lemon juice." Colgate claimed some Sunlight dishwashing detergents contain little or no lemon juice.

NAD concluded Lever's data substantiated the "real lemon juice" claim in automatic dishwashing powder and hand dishwashing liquid ads but not for the automatic dishwashing liquid ads. Lever said it will delete the lemon juice claim in future automatic dishwashing liquid advertising and packaging.

Kellogg Co. (Frosted Flakes cereal; Leo Burnett USA, Chicago): CARU criticized a TV spot entitled "Kickball." The commercial implied a boy who had been rejected was later accepted on a kickball team after eating Frosted Flakes. Kellogg disagreed, claiming Tony the Tiger inspired the boy to do his best and he was accepted solely for his ability.

But Kellogg told CARU the TV spot had completed its flight and the marketer doesn't intend to run it again.

American Airlines (non-stop serv to Hong Kong; Bozell): United Airli challenged newspaper, trade magaz and direct mail ads that claim "American Airlines to Hong Kong the only non-stop from Los Angel and "You'll fly to Hong Kong on a operated by Cathay Pacific Airways

NAD was concerned the ads m tioned Cathay Pacific only once, some claims might imply the non-s Hong Kong service was exclusive American Airlines. In future a American said it would take into c sideration NAD's concerns over placement of Cathay Pacific in b copy, and over clarifying the relati ship with Cathay Pacific.

Adolph Coors Co. (Coors beer; Fo Cone & Belding, Chicago): Anheus Busch Cos. challenged claims in ne paper, radio and TV ads that Coor made entirely from Rocky Mount spring water. NAD noted that so Coors beer is sent to Virginia to blended with local water, and rec mended the claim be revised. Coors agreed but agreed to review the c mercial with a view to modification.

SmithKline Beecham Consur Brands (Ecotrin coated aspirin; house, consumer-directed; Lave Wolff/Swift, New York, professio directed): Sterling Drug challenged s eral FSIs promoting the value of Eco for relief of arthritis pain with claim: "Better than Bayer because E trin is safety-coated to protect aga stomach upset, irritation and damag

Other ads in professional journals w headlined: " . . . more cardiologists, w concerned about aspirin irritation, r ommend Ecotrin over Bayer aspir NAD recommended the comparat claims be modified since side-by-s clinical testing hadn't been provided the stomach upset claim and because cardiologist survey was interpreted broadly in the headline. SmithKline d greed, but agreed to clarify the pro sional journal ad if it's used again. company said it had already told Ster it would modify Bayer references.

Claims substantiated:

North American Philips Co (Norelco 950 RX men's electric raz D'Arcy Masius Benton & Bowl Challenged by the Metropolitan Ho ton Better Business Bureau for a spot depicting the action of the raz lift and cut system, Philips was abl substantiate the illustration.

Glidden Co. (paint; Meldrum & Fe smith, Cleveland): Sherwin-Willia Co. challenged and NAD substantia Glidden's claim: "Over the past years, more people have switched Glidden than any other paint." □ couldn't be two national players."

Although Kraft General Foods had been marketing Impromptu Lite, a low-calorie, low-sodium and low-cholesterol version, in some test markets, it's believed the Kraft Microwave Entrees rollout won't feature a light variety initially.

The new line has nine varieties, mostly mainstream items such as lasagna and salisbury steak.

Kraft General Foods wouldn't discuss ad plans, but it's believed the company will stick close to its test-market campaign for Impromptu. That campaign, showing a woman popping the dinner into a microwave oven, was tagged "The simple solution."

The company also is said to be planning local promotions such as the one it began in Phoenix, Ariz., last February.

That effort offered local retailer tie-ins, live commercials broadcast from stores, sampling events and a "Mystery Shopper" contest.

Kraft General Foods spent about $1.7 million in measured media on the product last year, LNA/Arbitron reported. □

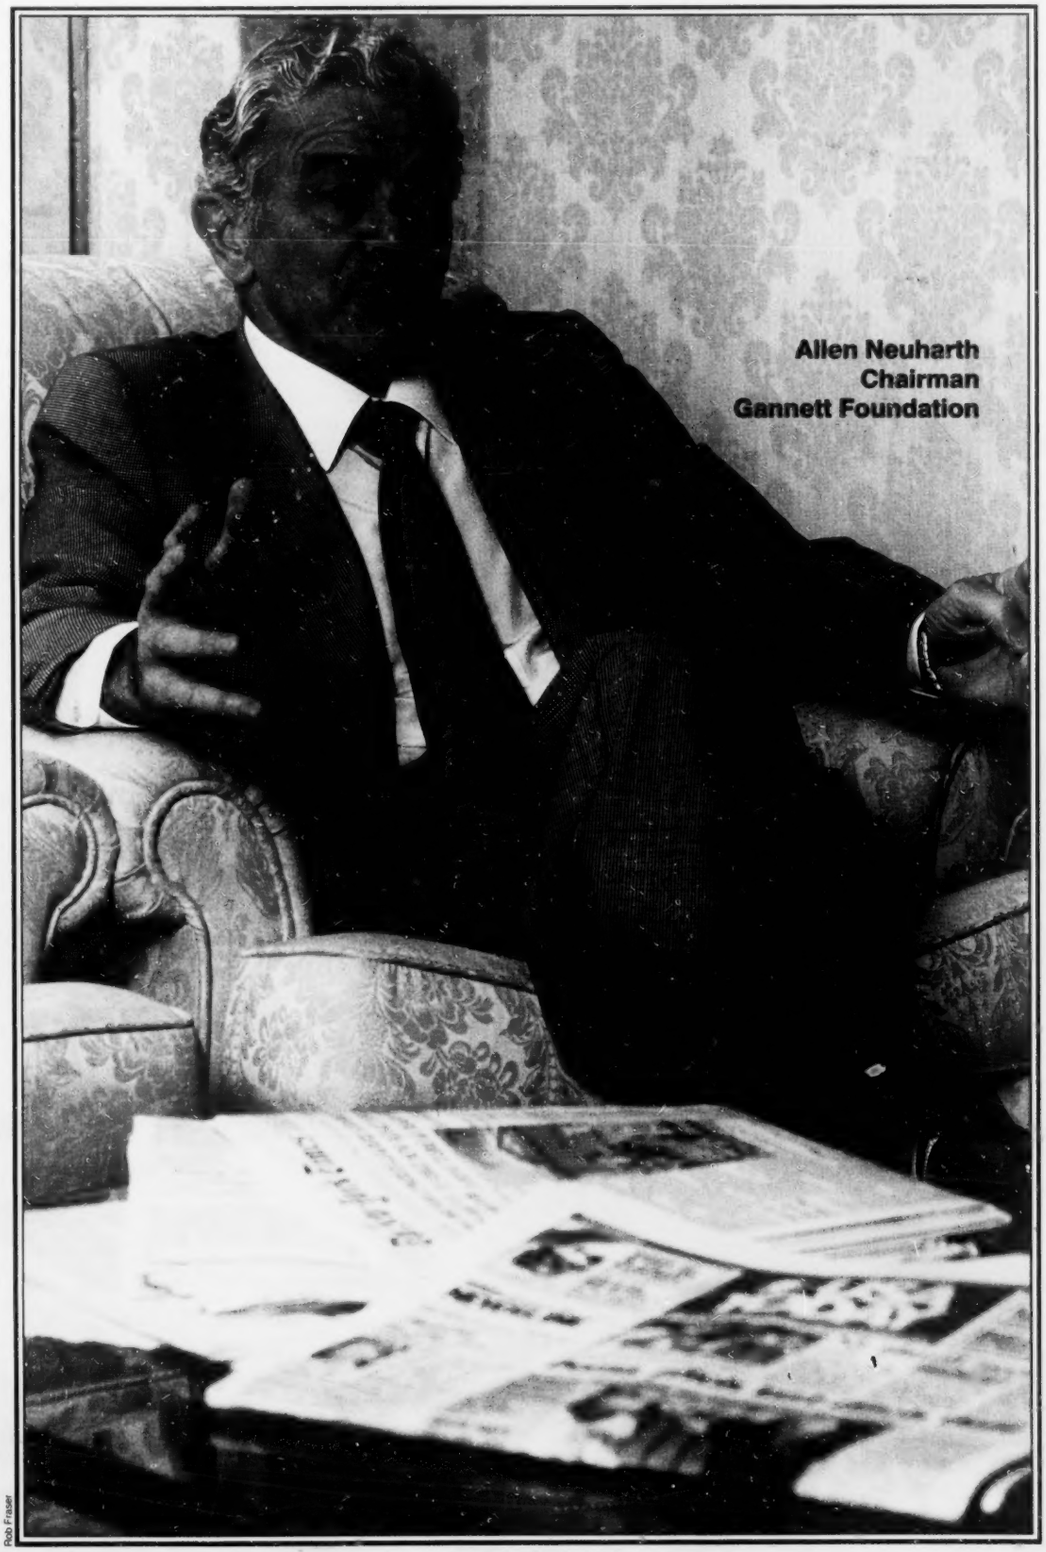
Ad slump is temporary—Neuharth



Allen Neuharth
Chairman
Gannett Foundation

Rob Fraser

Bright spots are in Europe, Asia; 'I plead guilty to going first class'

ONE ON ONE

Allen Neuharth stepped down as chairman of Gannett Co. 18 months ago, ending a 26-year career at the company that owned 16 newspapers when he arrived, 87 when he retired. Since then, he's served as chairman of the Gannett Foundation, a charitable organization that serves journalism education.

He's also authored a best-selling autobiography, "Confessions of an S.O.B."

Mr. Neuharth, 66, recently talked to Advertising Age Washington Bureau Chief Steven W. Colford about the state of the print media.

Advertising Age: What do you make of the shakeout in publishing, especially magazines?

Mr. Neuharth: Magazines can get hot quickly on hype and stay hot for a while, but they cool off unless they develop a reader loyalty. And I think it takes five to 10 years for print products to develop a reader loyalty where you can say the franchise is no longer fragile.

If during that period of fragility you run into economic problems, then you are more likely to go belly up than if you

L.A. Gear looking

No. 3 shoe marketer seeks agency

By Marcy Magiera

L.A. Gear, once adamantly opposed to hiring an outside agency to create its ads, is now talking to agencies about the creative portion of its $68 million advertising and promotion account.

Agencies believed to have been approached are BBDO Worldwide, Los Angeles; Chiat/Day/Mojo, Venice, Calif; and Goldberg Moser O'Neill and Goodby, Berlin & Silverstein, both San Francisco.

Hiring an agency would seem out of character for L.A. Gear's flamboyant co-founder and Exec VP Sandy Saemann. Mr. Saemann has single-handedly directed L.A. Gear's marketing functions, serving as copywriter and creative director for the company's ads and director for its TV commercials since it was founded in 1983.

But Mr. Saemann's hold on L.A. Gear's marketing may be relaxing. To pull together L.A. Gear's loose-knit marketing department, Mr. Saemann earlier this month hired Michael Albright, 34, as creative director.

Last month, he named Gary Patrick VP-advertising and promotion. Mr. Patrick was formerly senior VP-management representative at Vitt Media, L.A. Gear's media buying service.

Mr. Albright, who still holds a principal position in Los Angeles creative boutique Albright/-Labhart, is heading L.A. Gear's search for an advertising agency. He was in Utah last week shooting TV commercials featuring Utah Jazz basketball player Karl Malone for L.A. Gear's new Catapult shoe.

S. Saemann

L.A. Gear executives refused to comment. Watts & Sedler, Los Angeles, is acting as a consultant in the review.

The No. 3 athletic shoe marketer behind Nike and Reebok, L.A. Gear has taken a beating on Wall Street because sales are up but earnings are down.

L.A. Gear's sales for the first three quarters of fiscal 1990 rose 58% to $712 million, vs. the same period a year earlier, and the company increased its share of the $5 billion branded athletic shoe market to 13% to 15%, from 11% at the end of 1989.

But L.A. Gear has sacrificed profit for volume. Earnings for the first three quarters of 1990 dropped 11.5% to $38.4 million.

Company sources say Mr. Saemann is looking for an agency with the creative firepower to compete with No. 1 Nike's ads from Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., and large enough to lend L.A. Gear some credibility on Wall Street.

L.A. Gear flirted with an agency once before. The company in 1986 hired Ogilvy & Mather, Los Angeles, but Mr. Saemann severed that relationship after several weeks.

Meanwhile, L.A. Gear's relationship with Vitt also may be subject to change. Mr. Patrick, said in an earlier interview that he plans to review L.A. Gear's media buying and its international account (AA, Sept. 10).

Saatchi & Saatchi DFS/Pacific, Torrance, Calif., handles L.A. Gear's estimated $7 million international account. □

'Men's Life' stops

By Scott Donaton

Murdoch Magazines has suspended publication of its much-hyped Men's Life after publishing just one issue.

Leslie Hinton, president of the News Corp. division, said in a statement issued late last week that reader response to the first issue was "very encouraging." But, he said, "it will take time to build the necessary circulation and advertising, and it is too costly to go ahead in the present economic environment."

Men's Life Publisher Leo Scullin said the magazine's staff of about 10 full-time employees, "received their two weeks' notice" last week. He said that he and Publication Director-Editor in Chief Barry Golson signed one-year contracts last March and plan to "stay around and see what we can do."

"We needed to invest heavily in [Men's Life] to make it go, but the economy is not on our side," Mr. Scullin said. "From the day we opened our doors, it just never got better."

A publishing industry source estimates Murdoch Magazines spent $7 million to $10 million on the magazine.

Messrs. Scullin and Hinton said Murdoch Magazines plans to relaunch Men's Life when the economy rebounds but declined to speculate on the timing.

Men's Life is the second casualty in the months-old men's magazine war. Men, a magazine being developed by Cook's founder Christopher Kimball, was sold and folded into Owen Lipstein's Smart in September before it ever published an issue.

Rupert Murdoch's highly leveraged media empire has been under growing pressure in recent months to reduce its debt burden, estimated at more than $8 billion. Murdoch Magazines this year already pulled the plug on a planned video system for beauty salons and Eyewitness, a weekly magazine being developed by former US and Self Editor Anthea Disney.

Despite "very encouraging" reader response, Men's Life ceased publication last week after only one issue.

Rumors making the rounds in the publishing industry in recent weeks had Murdoch shopping its monthly Premiere and pulling the plug on Men's Life. Company executives have denied Premiere is on the selling block.

Men's Life's first and only issue, dated October/November, earned decent reviews from media buyers and publishing industry observers, who seemed surprised by its early demise.

"That probably says more about News Corp. than it says about Men's Life," said Daniel McNamee, president of McNamee Consulting, who said he thought the first issue was "terrific."

"Everybody's been talking about the fact that News Corp. is under debt pressure, and I guess they're just not in a position to invest in a new venture," he said. "Start-ups require a lot of money."

Men's Life was the brainchild of Mr. Golson, who developed the magazine—aimed at the "upper end of the baby-boom generation"—while executive editor of Playboy. After Playboy Enterprises decided against launching it, he sold the idea to Murdoch Magazines earlier this year.

Mr. Scullin, former senior VP-director of print relations for Young & Rubicam, New York, said he was happy with the results of the first issue, which he said sold 250,000 newsstand copies after six weeks on the racks and attracted more than 10,000 subscribers. The magazine's rate base was 250,000.

But Men's Life failed to excite advertisers. The first issue carried a little less than 30 ad pages and the second issue, which closed to advertisers earlier this month, sold a little more than 30 ad pages, Mr. Scullin said.

He said earlier plans called for the magazine, launched as a quarterly, to be published monthly next year.

Men's Life was one of a slew of new men's magazines launched this year. The others include Conde Nast Publications' revamped monthly Details; M Inc., a monthly produced by the merger of Capital Cities/ABC's M and Manhattan,inc.; and Forbes FYI, a quarterly lifestyle spinoff of the business magazine.

In addition, Smart will be relaunched in January as Smart for Men, published 10 times a year. Jann Wenner's Straight Arrow Publications is planning an as-yet-untitled men's magazine for a fall 1991 launch. □

Buyers explore growing cornucopia of options

Marketing dollars 'shifting dramatically out of traditional media to everything from trade shows to event sponsorship'

By Kathy Martin

Business-to-business advertisers aren't putting all their budgets in one basket these days.

Having historically clustered advertising in specialized business publications, advertisers are starting to split up the pile and move it to—for them—new media and marketing options.

Every medium has its place, and the effective marketer uses all of them, says Kirk Jewett, VP-advertising at Pitney Bowes.

Many media sellers maintain advertisers are scaling back their ad efforts. The Beta Research survey shows that isn't the case.

"Budgets as percentage of sales aren't really declining at all," says Elizabeth McMahon, manager-cor-

A letter to our readers

You are reading an historical document.

For the first time Advertising Age and Business Marketing, both owned by Crain Communications, have joined forces to cover a critical topic: business-to-business media buying and selling.

We feel the subject has been given too little attention for a marketing discipline that accounts for well over $4 billion in advertising revenue.

There have never been more challenges to business media; never more confusion in the relationship between business media buyer and seller; never more uncertainty over the direction of business-to-business budgets.

To get at the root of the shifts in business media and budgets, Advertising Age and Business Marketing commissioned Beta Research, New York, to conduct a geographically dispersed, random-sample telephone survey of 100 advertisers, 101 agency media directors and 75 media sellers.

The survey found the rules are changing.

Media sellers, insisting business-to-business budgets are declining, will be surprised to find the dollars aren't drying up but shifting to a wider array of business marketing options.

The survey also found the tenuous relationship between buyer and seller is in perhaps its most critical phase.

We feel the survey is the most up-to-date, complete look at the critical issues affecting business media buying.

Media buyers expect more for their money, and it shows.

To show how belt-tightening is affecting media planning, Advertising Age and Business Marketing went to media buyers and asked what effect the current environment is having on their jobs, spending plans and media expectations.

The Power Buyers were selected by contacting the leading business publication in each of 14 categories and asking them to identify their leading advertiser. Alicia Lasek, a frequent contributor to Advertising Age, then tracked down the person most responsible for overseeing each advertiser's budget.

Robert Crittendon, communications director, Beckman Instruments

A continuing slowdown in the laboratory systems industry is prodding Mr. Crittendon to tread carefully with his media plans. "Some books are down 100 pages, and with the dilemma of advertising costs going up and possibly postal rates, I would predict a cautious 1991," he says.

Beckman Instruments is adding corporate image advertising to its media schedule to make up for a lack of new product introductions this year, Mr. Crittendon says.

But one result of the slowdown may be positive in terms of helping deliver a better ad prospect.

"In the past, publications justified their continuing rate increases with boosted circulation. Now it looks like there is a reduced focus on the extraneous audience and increased focus on the core with some of the publications," he says.

Kelly Clark, media supervisor, J. Walter Thompson USA, New York, for client The Wall Street Journal

J. Walter Thompson USA is looking to non-traditional media vehicles to target junior-level media buyers, says Mr. Clark.

"Our primary concern is changing attitudes in the younger media planning community. We've evaluated some non-traditional media vehicles . . . like transit advertising and telephone kiosks," he says.

"Certainly there's going to be a significant amount of waste [in consumer vehicles], but if you're reaching a more attentive group of people in an environment where they're going to notice your ad, it's certainly worth considering."

Anne McIntosh, marketing communications supervisor, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., for its textile fibers department

"We don't just run ads. We have a communications program.

"We look to the [business media] to work with a group of products at Du Pont, not just one product. In home furnishings, there are four publications dealing with the textile end of it, and then a handful on the furnishings side. It's rather close.

"We don't just buy on price, but if the price isn't competitive, we're certainly going to look twice."

Such placement strategy doesn't stem from a tight budget, Ms. McIntosh comments.

"It's a question of expanding our market base every year. And the dollars can't all go to the same place they were going the previous year, and [they can't] go to all the new places. It's a question of being really efficient." □ porate marketing communications at 3M.

A Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing confirms Ms. McMahon's suspicions. The survey shows 40% of clients' 1990 business-to-business budgets will be greater than 1989's budgets; 39% say this year's spending will mirror 1989's. More than 42% of agency media directors say their shop's business-to-business billings will be up, while 40.6% say they'll be the same as last year's.

Ms. McMahon says marketing dollars aren't diminishing, "they're shifting dramatically out of traditional media into everything from trade shows to event sponsorship to new packaging."

Westinghouse Electric Corp. is one of the companies leading the way into print alternatives.

"We made that switch into non-advertising space because we saw more value in the short-term returns for our dollars," says Bob Fayfich, director-corporate internal communications at Westinghouse. Mr. Fayfich says more than 60% of his budget now goes to non-media activities.

"It's not that print media were the least effective. But the correlation between the money spent and the results received was more difficult to draw with print than with direct response and sales support," he says.

Mr. Fayfich ranks marketing effectiveness in terms of how often a media or marketing strategy allows him to meet customers face to face. As such, salesmen and sales support are at the top of his list, followed by direct response because of its specific targeting capabilities.

"Anytime I can get to my customer one on one—that's my top priority," he says.

Mr. Fayfich says media clutter is becoming a factor in a lot of fields and is working against this objective. "[Clutter] is a weakness in the trade press in general," he says.

John Casteel, manager of marketing communications at Dow Corning Corp., says people are turning less to print media. "The industry is getting less of the information they use from reading nowadays—there's television, broadcast, more face-to-face contact," he says. (An Association of Business Publishers survey challenges Mr. Casteel's contention; see story on Page 8.)

Publishers on a new page

As ad pages sag, events such as trade shows grow popular

By Sarah Polster

What's the difference if you're robbing Peter and paying Paul?" asks John Emery, president of the Association of Business Publishers.

Nothing is wrong with it, say more specialized trade publishers. Anxious to keep ad revenues in their companies rather than see them shift to other media and marketing options, publishing companies are broadening their base of options to meet advertisers' desire to get closer to the customer.

"If we can't sell as many display pages, we don't go home," says Terry McDermott, president of Cahners Publishing Co. "We think of new reasons to participate in the client's mix." In 1985, display ad pages accounted for about 90% of Cahners' revenue. By 1991, he expects it will be 75%.

Publishers agree diversification is imperative.

Bob Burton, president of Capital Cities/ABC's publishing division, says the tight economy is leaving only enough dollars to support the top books in specific niches.

"So while we sell advertising, we're also going to be selling the whole value-added concept, research and trade shows for example," he says.

The trade show/magazine combination has gained publishers' greatest attention.

ABC's trade show involvement has grown from one or two shows in the early '80s to acquiring an exhibition management company in 1986. Since then, it has added four other shows. "It's an area we're very committed to," Mr. Burton says.

At Gralla Publications, President Bob Bouchette earlier this year combined the display ad sell with trade show booth space for two new publications, Action Sports Retailer and Outdoor Retailer.

The interest in trade show activity is not surprising. More than 9,800 business publication subscribers responding to an ABP survey said specialized business publications were their primary source of information on products or services they purchase or specify. Trade shows came in second, followed by sales staffs, conventions and seminars, direct mail, directories and reference books, and general business publications and newspapers.

"Most publishers can be active in five of the top six sources and can offer packages of clients' most preferred ways," says Mr. Emery.

President Gerry Hobbs redefined BPI Communication's mission to accommodate non-magazine ventures. "We say the business is communicating specialized information. The mode of delivery for that information is not critical to our purpose."

Trade shows are no panacea, however, he says, adding the cost of producing them and companies' restricting travel budgets argues against relying on them as the answer to revenue problems.

"The publications still represent the lion's share of our business, but the greatest growth prospects are in research and information," he says. "People are willing to pay a higher rate for that information." □

"added a dynamic to business-to-business marketing," says Ms. McMahon, "and the dollars have to come from somewhere to fund this."

The assumption is they're coming from specialized business print.

John Emery, ABP president, says specialized business publications' 1990 revenues will increase 4% to 5% over the $4.23 billion he estimates was spent in 4,200 trade books last year. However, ad pages will drop about 2%, he predicts.

The long-term view espoused by buyers indicates a still-dominant, though smaller, role for traditional trade media. Increasingly, advertisers appear to be looking for more direct contact with prospects following smaller initial print efforts.

"We can do some advertising to introduce or predispose customers to a certain line, then go in with a targeted one-on-one selling opportunity like direct response or a trade show," Ms. McMahon says. "It's a better way to use our dollars."

Harry Davis, director of communications at E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. and chairman of the Association of National Advertisers business-to-business committee, says there's no simple answer where media dollars are being redirected.

"Marketing dynamics are producing all these buzz words: focusing, targeting, segmentation," he says. "I suppose this has led in some degree to redirecting dollars to direct marketing . . . rather than advertising in an umbrella fashion."

Not surprisingly, every group surveyed by Beta Research for Ad Age and Business Marketing agrees an increase in product sales is the most important indication of business-to-business advertising effectiveness.

But the next most important factors were positive feedback from sales forces and customer direct re-

Direct-response and specialized books leave the field in the dust

The battle for a greater share of business-to-business media budgets is narrowing into a two-horse race between specialized trade publications and direct-response media.

Of those clients responding to the Beta Research survey for Advertising Age and Business Marketing, 24% say by yearend specialized trade magazines will be given a greater percentage of their company's 1990 business-to-business budget. Direct-response activities will receive a greater share of the budget at 18% of client companies.

There's bad news for every other medium, however.

Regional business publications will grab a bigger budgetary share at only 3% of client companies surveyed; local newspapers and general business magazines will command more dollars as a percentage of total budget at only 2% of the companies.

Agency media directors in the survey show a bit more variety in moving their dollars around among the various options, primarily to the benefit of regional business publications.

Although specialized business publications will account for a greater percentage of billings at 21.7% of the agencies surveyed, regional business publications place a close second.

Regional business publications will generate a bigger share of billings at 19.8% of agencies surveyed.

Direct-response activities will be a bigger factor at 13.9% of agencies surveyed, while local newspapers will move ahead at 11.9%. □ sponse devices. Because results from direct response tend to be more concrete and those from trade shows are offered directly to the sales force, these marketing tools can seem more effective in the short run.

"Because of a trend toward customer focus, we're seeing dollars go to promotional activities with direct impact on the customer instead," says Mr. Casteel.

Others say it's impossible to generalize about budgetary shifts.

"It's not so much that we take money away from one for the other, but all of us respond to different hot buttons," says Mr. Jewett.

Elinor Biggs, director of advertising at New England Telephone, says marketers have to think of new ways to use media.

"In a less competitive time, people did just what they were comfortable doing," she says. "There's so much more competition today, you can't be traditional or laid-back." □

'Biz Week' the narrow favorite

In the race for bragging rights, it's Business Week by a nose.

In the Beta Research survey, Advertising Age and Business Marketing asked client advertisers and media directors which media title they personally felt was the most effective business-to-business property.

In general business magazines, Business Week with 16% of client/advertiser votes edged out Forbes and its 15% of votes cast. Fortune trailed with 5% of the votes, just ahead of Industry Week's 4%. In perhaps the strongest indictment, 45% of advertisers responding to the survey didn't prefer one title over another.

Media directors made it a tighter race: 14.9% selected Business Week, 12.9% picked Forbes and 11.9% named Fortune.

The Wall Street Journal is the clear newspaper favorite of both sets of respondents, grabbing 45% of advertisers' and 46.5% of media directors' votes. The New York Times and USA Today ran a distant second and third.

Although a whopping 73% of client respondents couldn't name the most effective cable TV network for business-to-business messages, 15% voted for CNN, which also garnered 31.7% of agency media directors.

News/information programming was seen as the most effective radio format, grabbing 20% of client votes and 20% of media director ballots. □

Just the ticket to win over the young media planner

Put on the back burner, media sales reps are forced to try creative ways to get big agency buyers' attention

By Kathy Martin

At first glance, the connection between plumbing fixtures and the San Francisco 49ers may seem convoluted at best.

But for Bill Everham, the link was diagrammed clearly early in his career as a business-to-business space salesman in the late '70s by a young media planner at a large agency.

Mr. Everham, now VP-sales for Supply House Times, was pitching for some business from a major plumbing advertiser. The planner first laughed at the ads for toilets in his publication. But then she bluntly said she was much more inclined to hear presentations from space reps who could produce 49ers' tickets.

Mr. Everham insists variations of this scenario are repeated constantly. "This is my experience still —more so than ever," he says.

Although client companies typically are more active in business-to-business media decisions than consumer advertisers, which give their agencies a bigger role in handling media buying, business media sales reps—much to their chagrin—find themselves knocking at the doors of large, consumer advertising-oriented agencies. There, they say, they often find business media buying is put firmly on the agency's back burner.

"The typical young individual just out of college crunching numbers with no appreciation of the subtleties of the marketplace is the one in consumer agencies that handles the business-to-business accounts," Mr. Everham says. "And someone coming up on the consumer side will undoubtedly try to apply consumer principles to trade [buying and planning].

"I get the feeling they hire people and pay them a salary to screen some of us out."

So he may screen out some agencies in response.

"The consumer agencies have just become irrelevant for us in some cases. We tried to play the game by the rules, but now, where it's possible, we bypass the agency and go to the client."

The Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing found that while media approval generally comes from a high level—typically a corporate ad director, VP of marketing or agency media director—the media sellers actually are making pitches to all levels of agency personnel—from media planners to account executives to account managers.

An agency's size can have a lot to do with its relationship to business media.

"It all really depends on the size of the agency," says Paul Lightfoot, advertising coordinator for Telecommunications. "At Young & Rubicam, we might see a media person straight out of college, while at smaller agencies, we might see the director of marketing."

Mr. Lightfoot says most agency employees he calls on seem knowledgeable about their clients' businesses. But he does sense a certain impatience with trade advertising at some consumer agencies.

"Sometimes I get the sense of being put on the back shelf, put on hold while I have to go through five people," he says. "I think that's because trade magazines are less important to them than consumer magazines."

John Emery, president of the Association of Business Publishers, says agencies simply are buying the revenue-producing products.

"Agencies are being driven by the same forces that drive clients: Quarter-to-quarter earnings per share,"

Power buyer

Mark Edelman, media supervisor, FCB/Leber Katz Partners, New York, for client AT&T Co.

"We're fortunate, our budgets are remaining stable or [are] going up. We've got pretty good indications that things will remain constant and upbeat with the markets tight out there," he says.

"My clients recognize the need to keep re-establishing their name and their image.

"One of the things we go for is getting as much value as we can out of the dollar—maybe business reply cards, focus groups, something to help the sales force gain entry to see their clients.

"With the shrinking dollar, I think the clients and the advertisers have a little bit more clout.

"A lot of magazines are offering buy-one-get-one deals, where you buy one [ad] and pay for color on the second one.

Doug Goodman

"Some people look at that as a sign of weakness [among the media]. But if you can afford that, depending on what priority those books fall into in your marketing scheme, that's a great thing to take advantage of and a great way to expand your continuity and your reach." □ he says.

Harry Tropp, associate media director at BBDO, New York, says he doesn't look down on business-to-business media.

"When I do work on business-to-business accounts, I give each salesman as much attention as any other," he says.

But the time allotted and degree of attention relate directly to what the business warrants, he says.

"The average planner has to deal with consumer, business, TV, radio," Mr. Tropp says. "Business-to-business is maybe 5% of our total budget, so it gets about 5% of our time."

The result of business media being put on the back burner is a less informed buyer, Mr. Emery says.

A large number of agencies buy business-to-business media like they buy television, says Michael Kolowich, publisher of PC Computing. "They say, 'We'll run the numbers' and treat the readers of magazines as interchangeable targets without understanding the market."

Mr. Kolowich says it's important for an agency to keep a business-to-business specialist on staff to evaluate business-media opportunities.

But belt-tightening agencies have made this one of the first positions to be eliminated. "We've seen the passing of the old-line business publication buyer," Mr. Emery says.

Media directors at larger consumer agencies say the charges leveled against them are unfounded.

There is no business-to-business specialist at Warwick Baker & Fiore in New York, says Exec VP John Meskil, because the account directors prefer to be involved in every aspect of media on their accounts.

He calls media sellers' cry for attention at larger agencies "an easy cop-out for a salesperson.

"If anyone comes to pitch us, they certainly get a hearing," Mr. Meskil says. "But agencies are in the business to serve the client," he says. "We can't deny there are bigger commissions on TV programs, but if that's all we recommended, we wouldn't have any clients."

Mr. Kolowich, who was VP-marketing of Lotus Development Corp. before he switched to the publishing side to fill what he calls "an important gap" in the available computer industry media, didn't want to award his account to an agency with too high a mix of consumer business. He says he felt media planners at those agencies wanted to work on consumer accounts rather than trade.

"Frankly, I didn't want my account to be a training ground, lost in a consumer agency," he says.

Mr. Kolowich says he thinks a media buyer must be much more sophisticated to understand business-to-business rather than consumer—"and to truly make it work for the client."

"The irony is that the culture of the typical large agency rewards more—psychologically and financially—to their consumer buyers than their business-to-business buyers. There's probably more ego gratification in buying big network TV schedules, in being entertained and catered to in ways that the mass media know how to entertain," Mr. Kolowich says.

"In business-to-business marketing, you tend to be buying media in $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000 chunks," he says. As long as the buys are that size, 49ers' tickets will continue to help open some agency doors. □

Sales triangle or 3-headed monster?

No end to complaints about 'high turnover,' 'fewer sales calls' and 'uneducated' staff

By Kathy Martin

There's no shortage of finger pointing in the business-to-business media marketplace.

Media planners say sellers aren't educated about their client's marketing goals. Sellers retort that buyers aren't knowledgeable about trade media.

Factor in high turnover rates on both the media department and trade rep sides and a frustrating relationship emerges between business-to-business media sellers and buyers, who often must re-educate each other annually about clients' goals and media resources.

High-level contacts between publishers and agency management may stay constant, but it's not uncommon for media buyers and sellers to meet a new face across the desk each planning season.

With tight advertising and continuing profitability pressures, some agency buyers say the reps are a shadow of their former selves.

"Salespeople are not as influential because they're not making as many calls as they used to," says William Mackay, director of media and planning at Rumrill-Hoyt, Rochester, N.Y.

"I understand that economics and smaller staffs dictate fewer visits. Still, it's more difficult to do business with publications when I have to rely heavily on my past experience with people and the materials they send," he says.

"We are less informed about the intricacies of the markets—and it's the job of the salesperson to interpret the market for the account," Mr. Mackay says.

In the long run, cutting staff and trimming travel budgets makes the buying and planning process more difficult and labor intensive for all involved, says Mike Walsh, senior VP, media director at Ketchum Advertising, New York.

"If we only see someone once a year, they don't know the client's business as well as they should," he says. Not only will buyers see a rep only once a year, he says, but a rep typically stays with a publication for only one or two planning cycles.

The disparity between agency and client views of media sellers and their self-image is predictable.

The Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing reveals 90% of media sellers believe their recommendations are very influential or somewhat influential in the media buy. Only 63% of agency media directors and 54% of client respondents agree. And 12% of media directors and 20% of clients say the business-to-business media salesman has no influence on the media decision

Most media directors agree, however, that experienced business-to-business sellers have the potential to be more influential than their consumer media counterparts. An informed salesman can provide insight beyond the few numbers available and show how a media property can fit into a marketing plan.

"The more successful salespeople do their homework on the client," says Joe Ostrow, corporate director of media at Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, adding that too many focus on their specific property and not on the industry category.

"If they spent more time thinking of strategies rather than statistics, they might be more important," he says. "They should use numbers as one part of it; use understanding of strategy as another part of it."

According to the survey, media directors and clients say this combination is rare.

Only 25% of media directors and 16% of clients surveyed believe media sellers are very aware of the client's specific marketing needs. While the majority—almost 60%—of these two groups say sellers are somewhat aware of client marketing needs, a sizable portion—17% of media directors and 22% of clients surveyed—claim reps are not aware of client company marketing needs and category position. Reflecting a surprising degree of candor, even 12% of media sellers say this about themselves.

"If [salesmen] spent more time thinking of strategies rather than statistics, they might be more important. They should use numbers as [just] one part of it."

Joe Ostrow,
Foote, Cone & Belding

"Some reps do come across as not knowledgeable about the industry or the client," says Bill Besch, associate publisher, Tour & Travel News.

He also says blaming shrinking sales staffs is a bogus excuse. "There's no excuse for not knowing the client's business.

"Education doesn't have to do with the load on a salesperson. It has to do with the salesperson having the insight and doing homework before he or she goes in to see the agency. It's a problem within management of the publication, or the quality of the salesperson," Mr. Besch says.

The need for an educated salesperson intensifies when calling on large and medium agencies that deal with a variety of accounts, he says.

"[They] don't have the opportunity to learn everything about so many industries," Mr. Besch says. "With the expertise you bring [to them], some agencies are very open to learning a lot about the industry from you."

The idea of educating agencies doesn't thrill many media sellers, particularly when they feel the client is the key to the buy.

According to the Ad Age/Business Marketing survey, 48% of media sellers say the job title of the person who eventually signs off on ad placements is corporate ad director, ad manager, marketing communications manager, marketing director or VP-marketing and sales.

"There's an old saying in business-to-business: Sell the account [client], and tell the agency," says John Emery, president, Association of Business Publishers.

"At consumer agencies, sometimes there are wide gaps in market knowledge," says Stephen Donahue, national sales manager for ENR. "We want to go in and say, 'Here's what we do, how we reach them.' But sometimes we have to start a fair distance away from where we want to end up. When someone is already well-versed, we can talk about the client's product right away."

Sellers also say they may have to spend part of the sales call educating buyers on the difference between consumer and business media.

"Education doesn't have to do with the load on a salesperson. It has to do with the salesperson having the insight and doing homework before he or she goes in to see the agency."

Bill Besch,
Tour & Travel News

Cari Kelly, director of advertising at Meetings & Conventions, says she always plans to focus on the travel market and hospitality industry when she visits large consumer agencies, but often has to explain to planners that costs-per-thousand and huge circulation figures are not the key criteria.

In the Ad Age/Business Marketing survey, 42.6% of agency media directors say CPMs are a very important factor in evaluating a business-to-business publication. Only 20% of media sellers agree.

"People are more used to working on consumer accounts and evaluating everything on CPM rather than buying power and decision-making responsibility of the reader," Ms. Kelly says.

Mr. Walsh believes his agency has nurtured a healthy relationship with the trade media because he looks at the salesman as a key part of a triangle between the client, agency and media.

"When all three work together, the product really moves," he says. "To exclude reps from that doesn't do justice to what they can bring to the party." □

Rate negotiation—no longer a dirty word

Now that buyers 'expect' a deal, there's no stopping them

By Alicia Lasek

Rising ad rates, saturated markets and a soft economy are turning business-to-business media negotiations into a feeding frenzy for buyers—with the media acting as host.

A Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing clearly indicates ad rate negotiation—virtually nonexistent a few years ago—is now standard operating procedure.

More than 66% of media sellers say the practice is becoming more frequent—only 8% say it's dropping off—while 57.4% of media directors and 55% of advertisers say rate negotiation is on the upswing.

Most respondents in each group say the average discount is between 10% and 20% off published rates.

The increase in rate negotiation simply reflects the state of business marketing. Although 73.3% of media sellers surveyed say 1990 ad revenues will be greater than 1989 totals, dollars are up thanks to rate increases and not page volume.

With 60% of clients reporting 1990 business-to-business budgets won't exceed '89 spending, buyers are predicting modest ad rate increases for 1991. Even if published increases are high, they say negotiation will bring them down.

"There's a lot of talk about substantial [rate] increases next year. But what the publishers really get is another story," says Frank Massaro, media director at Brouillard Communications.

Robert Coen, senior VP-director of forecasting at McCann-Erickson, New York, says some trade publications will brave 1991 with little extra padding against postal rate increases and strong competition.

Next year's business-to-business rates may climb only 4.5% to 5.5%, and even less in crowded media categories, he predicts.

Buyers and publishers agree rate breaking is hitting the hardest in highly competitive, financially stagnant markets such as food, retail, computer and financial.

Once a publisher breaks rates, buyers say, competitors follow.

A spotty outbreak of rate cutting in 1989 resulted in a 1990 rate-slashing epidemic in the foodservice category, says Mike Charlton, associate publisher of Nation's Restaurant News.

"Everyone's asking if this is your best price," he says. "[Some buyers] are flat-out saying, 'I've got X number of dollars and I want to run four pages.' "

Many publishers still bravely insist they won't tamper with published rates. Because advertisers expect some negotiation, however, they often introduce value-added merchandising as an enticement to purchasing ad space.

In the Beta Research study, 82.7% of media sellers, 81.2% of agency media directors and 61% of advertisers surveyed say value-added marketing support programs are a very important or somewhat important factor in influencing business media placements.

Dee Creighton, director of business-to-business media at Mintz & Hoke, Avon, Conn., says this year some books are bringing the value-added concept a little closer to rate negotiation by offering free ad placements if buyers commit to advertise in a specified number of issues.

Publishers are still working to keep clients that primarily focus on consumer advertising—"the Heinzes, the Tyson Chickens, Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola"—on the rate card, Mr. Charlton says. "If [these advertisers] had an idea of what some publishers are offering to six, seven and eight-time advertisers. . . ."

The on-the-card, off-the-card debate is straining relationships

Controlling one's circulation destiny

What's better, paid or controlled? As one exec asks: 'Can you have a horse of two colors?'

By Sarah Polster

Daniel Orum, MacWorld VP-circulation and marketing, had a problem two years ago.

The paid-circulation magazine had 268,639 readers, but too few were big-time advertising prospects. So MacWorld added a controlled circulation audience of 15,000 subscribers who had overseen the purchase of 10 or more Macintosh computers.

Adding controlled subscribers created a few problems—the primary one being the task of teaching media planners and advertisers the value of delivering more prospective buyers, regardless of how they receive the magazine, Mr. Orum says.

Confronting that issue is worth the aggravation, he says. MacWorld's ad revenues jumped 29% from 1988 to 1989, and the publication's circulation has climbed to 340,641, of which 50,000 now are controlled subscribers.

MacWorld is not alone in this strategy. "The biggest ballyhoo right now is the question of controlled [circulation publications] trying to add paid [readership] and vice versa," says Virginia Cooper, media director at TFB/BBDO Business Communications, San Francisco.

Agency media directors and clients responding to the Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing clearly indicate audience is important: 85.1% of media directors and 84% of advertisers say audience is a "very important" criterion in evaluating business-to-business media.

But opinions are mixed on whether that audience should be paid or controlled circulation. Among media directors, 49.5% prefer paid, while 42.6% favor controlled. Clients are almost equally split with 42% preferring paid audiences and 48% leaning toward controlled.

"It's a real piece of work," Ms. Cooper says. "Can you have a horse of two colors in the same book?

"The paid books in the industry need to reach the decision-makers who aren't used to paying [for subscriptions] and aren't willing to," Ms. Cooper says. "And they're finding it more expensive to keep their paid [circulation] up.

"But then the books like Data Communications and Electronic News are trying to go paid," she says.

"I'm much more comfortable with controlled adding paid," says Ms. Cooper. "If a controlled book's ediamong competitive media.

For example, a recent Forbes ad claimed Fortune was sending "letters to prospects and clients accusing Forbes of making special deals not included in our rate card for certain advertisers."

Headlined, "Why is Fortune fibbing?" ad copy said Forbes' "rate card is our bible, and we never make special deals for any advertiser."

Some say business media simply are catching up with their consumer counterparts.

"We're looking for a fair deal where everybody goes away happy," Mr. Massaro says—particularly the buyer. □

"The books are pretty competitive so they're more willing to let you know what's available," Mr. Karakas says.

"It used to be that you couldn't get a list or research unless you were running quite a few pages. Now it's just part of the standard operating procedure."

Strassman

"If we purchase a magazine, we will negotiate with the publisher that not only will we buy a page, but that [the publication] will do an extensive merchandising program to the resort general managers. We don't just plop the money down and get an ad." □ torial is becoming so important that people are paying for it, it's very valuable so I will pay a higher CPM if they're adding paid. But I'm very leery of paid books adding controlled because I can probably get that controlled somewhere else."

Paid publications typically are assumed to have more reader interest, says Peggy Nordeen, president of Starmark Inc., Chicago.

But better editorial in controlled circulation publications and the fact that most companies cover the subscription cost of work-related titles mute paid circulation publications' claims of having a more interested and a more involved reader, she says.

"[It's] not a function of gross numbers anymore," says Mary Lisi, account manager at CPM, a Chicago-based media-buying service. "It's a matter of how qualified is that circulation to start with."

As ad costs are tied more closely to circulation than ever, Ms. Cooper says it's necessary to keep five to 10 years worth of audit statements for both types of audiences to track the vitality of the audience.

Some media directors say the paid vs. controlled issue is overblown.

"It doesn't matter as long as it's covering our specific target audience and can demonstrate that it's being read," says Chris Czeskleba, media director at Bader Rutter & Associates, Brookfield, Wis.

Paid books still win out for broader, consumer-oriented campaigns, and in some buyers' minds indicate genuine reader interest.

"In the general business magazine area, there's a definite advantage to being paid. It shows a true desire on the part of the reader," says J. Kosanke, senior VP-group media director Lintas:New York.

But in vertical markets with a top paid vs. a top controlled—a rare scenario—several buyers say they would buy both publications. Most buyers say they'll simply put their clients' ads in the best editorial environment.

"The Journal of Commerce, a paid publication for the shipping field, has been around for a hundred years," says Bob Storch, media director, Poppe Tyson, New York. Its major competitors are controlled circulation publications that define their reader immediately, something the Journal of Commerce can't do, he says.

However, "You know the Journal of Commerce has been around, everybody pays a lot of money to get it," Mr. Storch says.

The readers may not be qualified, he says, but "you want to buy it, because you know it's read." □

New ad-editorial bridge goes up

As ad pages slide, some publishers grow cozier

By Alicia Lasek

Specialized trade magazine publishers are proud to trot out the analogy that editorial and advertising are as separate as church and state.

However, advertisers' desire to increase control of editorial projects and publishers' attempts to bring in revenues as ad pages fall off are bridging that chasm.

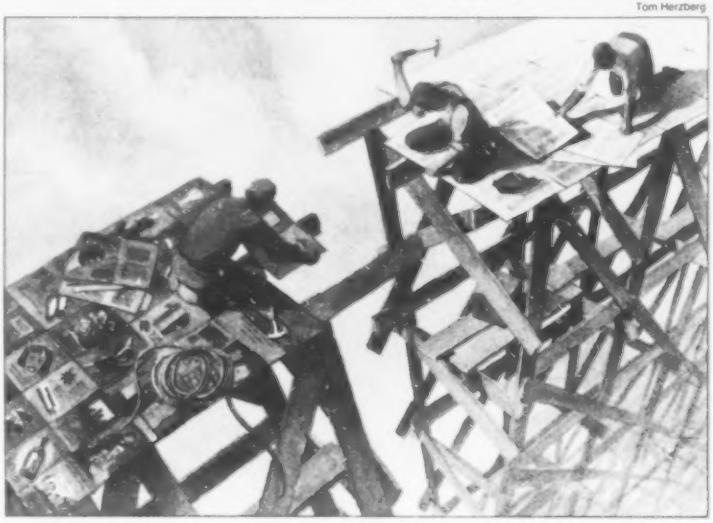
Other advertisers, facing budget cuts that push them out of heavy display space advertising, are turning their attention to providing trade publications with editorial material that touts their products and provides the magazines with low-cost editorial filler.

ICI Films, a raw plastics manufacturer, has cut spending in every department but PR and shifted display dollars to sponsored editorial, says Stephanie Warakomski, communications manager.

The company had been placing three ad campaigns in monthly publications on a nine- or 12-time schedule, but will cut that down to one ad campaign in 1991.

"Our [marketing executives] feel we're getting more value out of our dollar in public relations. We're working with editors on applications articles, bylined articles and technical articles," Ms. Warakomski says.

Tom Herzberg



U.V. Process Supply, a Chicago printing-equipment supplier, originally determined its potential market by sending out 105 press releases each month and noting which publications picked them up.

The company now uses editorial placements to generate sales leads for low-price products that won't support advertising.

"We've evolved into a direct-mail business through this marketing effort," says President Stephen Siegel. "If I'm going to spend $10,000, I'm going to spend it on editorial promotions."

U.V. currently generates about 4,000 leads each year at a cost of "a couple hundred bucks," Mr. Siegel states.

"Most business publications have a 'what's new' section, and they want to keep it filled. It's a mutually beneficial relationship."

Mike Walsh senior VP-media director at Ketchum Advertising, New York, also finds that sponsored editorial enables him to qualify readership.

"But it doesn't have to be a mutual love-fest," he adds. "There's a fine line there. There's a danger of a magazine losing its objectivity and credibility. If the reader isn't interested editorially, they won't be interested in the advertising either."

Many publishers, however, remain protective of editorial's traditionally

Power buyer

Maureen Reichert, VP-media director, Lavey/Wolff/Swift, New York, for client Burroughs Wellcome Co.

Ms. Reichert sees advertisers converting medical journal ad units into inserts to stave off a down market in the pharmaceuticals industry.

"Approximately one-third of the publications' ads are inserts," she says. "Either the publications will have to decrease editorial or increase the cost of inserts.

"Everything is up but ad dollars, and [the journals] are going to try to do everything they can to niche their publication more to certain products as opposed to a broad base," she adds.

Reichert

But such targeting strategies limit Ms. Reichert's ad placement.

"We always try to maintain our target audience, and the most cost-effective way to do that is to decrease the depth of our buys. Three years ago you could purchase a large portion of the marketplace. Today, you really have to fine-tune your buys."

In the future, that fine tuning increasingly may take pharmaceutical advertisers out of business media, she says. "Consumer [marketing] is the next forefront of the pharmaceuticals market," she says. □ sacred territory.

"Every advertiser would love [editorial coverage] but no advertiser at Macworld gets it," says President-CEO-Publisher Jim Martin. "We have always taken the reader's perspective on product reviews, and we never shape product stories to soothe the needs of the advertising community."

But Mr. Walsh notes that publishers are now more willing to allow marketing in the editorial door.

One way publishers have allowed advertisers to become involved in story generation yet maintain the sanctity of the editorial church is to increase their use of advertorials.

In the Beta Research study commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing, 81.3% of media sellers, 72.3% of media directors and 70% of advertisers surveyed say they feel advertorials and special advertising sections are useful media vehicles.

ENR snared about $2 million in ad sales from special advertising in 1990 and will run 12 special sections in 1991, compared with three in 1987. "It's creative publishing," says VP-Publisher Howard Mager. "We don't run the general, all-purpose ad section."

Mr. Martin says Macworld is pursuing joint advertorials that it will create, write and hopefully run in business publications.

"We're working on a couple [joint advertorials] with Apple Computer. We think business buyers of Macintosh computers might find it interesting if they read about them in Business Week or Fortune," he says.

Some media buyers remain skeptical about the value of non-display advertising.

"Some are outstanding, but the majority are not well-designed," says Mr. Walsh. "The reader doesn't read them and the advertising doesn't get exposed."

Frank Kopec, director of media services at Rumrill Hoyt, Rochester, N.Y., questions the editorial vitality of a magazine that will run advertorials.

"If [the client is] paying for something, he's paying for the editor to do his job. [By accepting advertorials], an editor is taking advantage of a client's need to get something before the public."

But continued tight times will further fuel advertorial popularity.

"I'd much prefer an editorial section," says Martin Deutsch, president of OAG Travel Magazines. "But there's greater pressure from not only ad agencies but the clients for advertorial sections. It's not only expected, it's demanded."

"If somebody comes to you and says we'll seed a supplement, it's very hard to send them packing," Mr. Martin says. □

What research?

Tired of the specialized business press 'always' winning, advertisers and buyers scream for unbiased data

By Alicia Lasek

At face value business media research may be helpful, but media buyers say it's often not worth the paper on which it's printed.

More than 66% of the media directors and 37% of the advertisers responding to the Beta Research survey commissioned by Advertising Age and Business Marketing say audited circulation is a very important guide in judging business-to-business print media. Buyers remain skeptical of most data. "You don't seem to see anything [the books] don't win," says Judy Murphy, media director at Alexandre Marketing Services. "We use our own research department as much as possible."

Buyers who base their decisions on what exists today "are probably making the wrong decision because they're basing it on incorrect data," says James Nowakowski, president of consultancy Nowakowski & Associates, which markets an advertising effectiveness measurement service.

Clients' latest demand on media buyers is to get the best possible mix of publications at the lowest possible rates, says Virginia Cooper, VP-media director at TFB/BBDO, San Francisco. "To do that, we need unbiased readership data that goes way beyond circulation."

Ms. Cooper would like to see "more compatible profile studies . . . buying intention studies and accurate analysis of publications' subscribers in certain companies."

Such information is almost nonexistent in those industry categories that aren't covered by research companies such as Simmons Market Research Bureau and Starch/INRA/-Hooper, media buyers complain.

Judi Scrivener, VP-manager of business-to-business media at Noble & Associates, Springfield, Mo., says the accepted universe SMRB provides for her foodservice accounts is invaluable. "In other markets, you can't project frequency because you don't have an established universe."

But even the accepted studies lack the editorial information, psychographic data and response rates the consumer side has had for years, buyers say.

Some agencies increasingly are using in-house resources to find the best buys. KVO Advertising & PR, Beaverton, Ore., has performed its own surveys to pinpoint ideal audiences for high-technology clients.

"We're able to determine which publications best address a prospect on a reach and frequency basis and on an effective cost per thousand," says Steve Karakas, ad director. "We even have psychographic information."

The agency's data base has helped it plan placements more effectively, he says, justifying a cutback in the number of books bought and suggesting an increase in the frequency of placements in fewer books. "We're able to figure out exactly [the value of the] third or fourth book. And the incremental value is not always there."

But many business-to-business agencies don't have the resources to develop in-house research facilities or commission outside surveys. They say business media should bear the burden of providing reliable information, and those who do will reap the rewards of meeting buyers' needs.

"In the old-line business-to-business markets, [publishers] have not realized that they should come kicking and screaming into at least the 1970s to compete for dollars," says Ms. Cooper. The business-to-business industry complains about the research that's out there, she says, but no one is willing to support long-term commitments to bettering the research. "There doesn't seem to be a drive for excellence."

But new research sources are springing up sporadically. Cahners Publishing Co. has funded a joint project with SMRB to create Affinity Index, a qualitative measure of the reader-to-editorial relationship. The index, which was launched in September and draws from a universe of 10,000 readers, gauges factors including ad readership and ad effectiveness in a publication.

Mr. Nowakowski says buyers share some of the blame for bad data. "It all goes back to the interpreter. There's total confusion in business-to-business because no one knows how to use the research on the table and no one's come out and challenged it," he says. □

Judi Scrivener, VP-manager of business-to-business media, Noble & Associates, Springfield, Mo., for client Tyson Food Service.

"In foodservice in general, spending should stay on track for 1991, but with budgets getting tighter, clients are getting more demanding.

"From a media perspective, we're going to have to develop different ways to prove the effectiveness of the dollars we have spent," she says.

"Our media department is not an island—we're an extension of the marketing plan. So we are looking at the entire marketing program that our clients are putting together and how we can support that from a media standpoint.

"What I'm seeing is more and more of the business-to-business industries are trying to become as sophisticated as the majority of consumer-type industries. They're developing more research information, and not just publication directed." □

Boycott of Nike ignored

By Scott Hume

GALLUP SURVEY

Most consumers say they won't heed Operation PUSH's call to boycott Nike athletic products, a national survey conducted for Advertising Age showed.

Of the 1,050 adults surveyed last month by the Gallup Organization, 31% said they were aware of the boycott call. One-fifth said they plan to buy fewer Nike products than they did before; 64% said they will buy about the same amount.

But 39% agreed with the principle that a company that sells its products to minorities has an obligation to return some of its profits to minority communities.

PUSH, the Chicago-based activist group founded by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, in August criticized Nike for its failure to deposit money in black-owned banks, the absence of blacks on its board and the decision not to use a black-owned ad agency despite Nike's claim that up to one-third of its sales come from black consumers.

Wieden & Kennedy, Portland, Ore., is Nike's agency. Its ads have featured black athletes and filmmaker Spike Lee.

Nike responded that three-quarters of the $10 million it spent last year on philanthropic causes was directed to inner city neighborhoods. Further, it charged that PUSH had targeted Nike after rival Reebok International bought a page ad in PUSH magazine.

The organization said it gets no revenues from the magazine and, angered by Nike's request to audit PUSH's finances and membership lists, called for a Nike boycott.

Awareness of the dispute was notably higher among men (40% of whom said they had heard of the controversy) than among women (24%). Awareness also was higher among non-whites (37%) than among whites (30%).

Overall, 39% said they agreed with PUSH's claim that companies that sell to minorities have an obligation to invest profits in minority communities.

Women were more likely to agree (42%) with that statement than were men (35%), and two-thirds (65%) of non-white respondents agreed, compared with one-third (35%) of whites.

Nearly half (49%) the respondents ages 18 to 34 agreed, while 34% of those 35 to 54 and 30% of those 55 and older agreed.

The random telephone survey has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1%. □

Pepsi-Coke ad recall battle goes flat

By Kate Fitzgerald

Pepsi-Cola fizzled from first to 10th last month in advertising recall.

The soft-drink brand had been No. 1 in Advertising Age's monthly adWatch survey of advertising awareness for July and August.

The tumble came at the end of the aggressive summer cola marketing season and capped nine months of Pepsi and Coca-Cola dueling for the top spot in the survey.

Coca-Cola's awareness remained high (the No. 2 spot last month) while Pepsi's dipped, possibly because a new fall campaign for Diet Coke broke early last month and drove up overall brand awareness. That campaign, which broke Sept. 9, features National Football League players.

Pepsi-Cola execs had no comment on its decline in ad awareness.

McDonald's Corp. finished on top in the survey for the first time since February 1989. The fast-food chain's current "Food, folks and fun" campaign includes TV spots announcing McDonald's switch to vegetable oil frying for its french fries and commercials promoting a children's meal tie-in with Nintendo.

McDonald's "McMillions" promotion with NBC didn't start until after the September survey was completed.

Automobile advertising awareness remained high, climbing to third from eighth.

Nike fell two notches to fourth, due to its continuing offbeat TV campaign and back-to-school ad efforts.

Ford dropped a spot to fifth, and there was a three-way tie for sixth among Anheuser-Busch's Budweiser, Chevrolet and Toyota.

Miller Brewing Co.'s Miller and Miller Lite placed ninth, the brands' first appearance in the top 10 since June.

Purina Puppy Chow was back among the top five pet food advertisers in aided awareness, getting 2.7% of first mentions. Alpo led the category with a 12% share, followed by Ralston Purina Co.'s Purina with 10.7%; Carnation Co.'s Friskies with 4.7%; and Quaker Oats Co.'s Kibbles 'n Bits with 3.2%.

The Wine Group's Mogen David made a rare appearance in the wine category, finishing fifth with 1.1% of first mentions. Gallo led with 17%, followed by E&J Gallo Winery's Bartles & Jaymes with 10%; Banfi Vintners' Riunite with 3.6%; and Seagram's wine coolers with 2.6%.

Big O Tires finished fifth in the tire category with a 1.2% share, the company's first appearance in the category's top five in aided recall since October 1988. Goodyear led with 26.7%, followed by Michelin, 24.7%; Firestone, 5.9%; and BF Goodrich, 3.7%.

Adwatch is a joint project of Ad Age and the Gallup Organization. Advertising awareness is measured by asking a nationally projectable sample to name the first advertising that comes to mind from all seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,000 adults were polled by phone. The survey's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1%. □

For more information, contact the Gallup Organization, 301 S. 68th St., Lincoln, Neb. 68506. Phone: (402) 489-0351.

HO!

Writers of all ages. We tend to write over-long copy at Lands' End mostly because we find so much to tell folks about our fine goods. But also because we like the look, feel and sound of our words. What's more, we write in an atmosphere that's as casual as our clothes. (Doesn't hurt either that we're near lakes, rivers and woods.) Interested in joining us? Please send a resumé and copies of your best (and hopefully longest) work to:
